The HISTORY of ITALY.

Eugenius IV. is elected.

a UPON the death of pope Martin V. the fourteen cardinals who were then in Rome entered the conclave on the 1ſt of March, and next day elected Gabriel Condelmero, of an ancient Venetian family, cardinal prieſt and biſhop of Siena, who, aſſuming the name of Eugenius IV. was conſecrated on the 11th of the ſame month (A). Immediately after his election a Franciſcan treacherouſly conſpired againſt his life, by exciting animoſities betwixt him and the Colonnæ relations of Martin, and by endeavouring to ſeize the caſtle of St. Angelo by ſurprize, with the intention of delivering it to that family. The deſigns of the Franciſcan being diſcovered, he was ſeized and put to death: after which Eugenius put an end to the tumults, by concluding an accommodation with the Colonnæ. During this inteſtine diſturbance, the pope had written to cardinal

The cardinal, being deſirous to proceed againſt the Huſſites before he went to the council, earneſtly ſollicited the German princes to ſend the quota of troops to the general rendezvous, which had been fixed upon the former year in a diet at Nuremberg. But altho' the expedition had been appointed for the 24th of June, yet, upon account of the delays of the allies, the army did not aſſemble before the 1ſt of Auguſt; when, according to ſome authors, it amounted to 40,000 horſe and 50,000 foot, while others affirm, that it conſiſted of 130,000 men. Julian in the mean time ſent the auditor of the ſacred palace, and the general of the Dominicans, to Baſil, to open the council in his name, and in that of the apoſtolic ſee, and ſoon after entered Bohemia with a Ger-

But, after they had advanced a conſiderable way into the kingdom, Procopius, who had aſſembled his forces, attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, that, after a weak reſiſtance, they were intirely defeated, with the loſs of their artillery, proviſions, and baggage; amongſt which was the pope's bull, and the legate's croſs and veſtments, which ſerved for ſubjects of deriſion to the victors [a]. After this victory the Huſſites ravaged Moravia, Auſtria, and Sileſia, and likewiſe made an irruption into Hungary. (A) Eugenius came to Rome during the pontificate of his uncle Gregory XII. who made him his treaſurer, and afterwards biſhop of Siena, and then a cardinal.

Spondanus relates, upon the authority of an author of Bourdeaux, that the cardinals, before they proceeded to the election of Eugenius, drew up certain articles which they ſwore to obſerve; among thoſe, that the pope ſhould, for the future, inſert in the apoſtolic letters, not only the words by the advice, but with the conſent, of our brethren; that the pope ſhould not create new cardinals, without the concurrence and approbation of the old; and that the cardinals ſhould enjoy one half of the patrimony of the church.

to the emperor to invite them to the council of Basil; and, soon after arriving at that city, he wrote to the Bohemians from thence, offering them a safe conduct, and a free conference upon the articles of their faith, before the general council. a

A general council held at Basil.

THIS council, according to the decrees of that of Constance and Siena, ought to have assembled on the 2d of March, without any citation: accordingly, on that day, a Benedictine abbot, with some other clergy, assembled at Basil, and declared that they were ready to wait for other prelates, and in the mean time would consult together for the safety of the Christian people. On the 23d of July, the two deputies sent by Julian solemnly opened the council, and the cardinal himself arriving in October, by the authority of the fathers then assembled, wrote to the catholics in the neighbourhood of Bohemia, not to enter into any treaty with the Hussites. The offering a free conference to the Bohemian secretaries, and some other proceedings of the council, began already to give umbrage to the pope; therefore, on the 12th of November, he sent a full power to Julian to dissolve the council, and to summon another to meet at Bologna within eighteen months (B), alleging, as his reasons for this translation, that he was informed few prelates had arrived at Basil; that there was not a safe access to the city, on account of the war betwixt the dukes of Austria and Burgundy; that many of the citizens were Hussites, and persecuted the catholics; and that the Greek emperor and partriarch, who proposed to treat of an union with the Latin church, had desired that the council might be transferred to Bologna. The pope wrote on the same subject to the emperor; but Sigismund, who had entered Lombardy with the intention of receiving the Italian and imperial crowns, returned an answer to the reasons alledged by the pope, and declared, that the reformation of manners, and re-union of the Hussites to the church, ought to precede any treaty with the Greeks, who would even despise the Latin church when they observed it corrupted and divided; that, if the council was dissolved, the Hussites would triumph; and that all Germany would be infected with their doctrines, several of which already began to meet with approbation from some princes and states, who had concluded a truce with the secretaries. Cardinal Julian likewise hesitated to execute the pope's orders; but, considering that the number of prelates and deputies of the kings and princes was daily increasing, and that the continuation of the council was absolutely necessary to quiet the troubles in Germany and Bohemia, he determined to proceed, as the pope had not peremptorily required him, but only given him a power to dissolve the council: he accordingly appointed the first session to be held on the 14th of December, and informed the pope and the emperor of his proceeding; the last of whom wrote to the cardinal and the fathers, exhorting them to persevere in their design, and to cut off as rotten members all those who should endeavour to defer or dissolve the council. Sigismund, before he had passed the Alps, had sent his deputies to Basil, and had appointed the duke of Bavaria as protector and defender of the council. They having arrived at that city, the first session was held according to appointment; in which, after the celebration of mass, and the performance of the usual prayers and ceremonies, the bishop of Coutances ascended the pulpit, and read the decree of the council of Constance for the celebration of general councils, and other writings confirmed by the authority of the popes Martin and Eugenius, appointing the city Basil for the place of convocation of the present council. He then proceeded to declare the purposes for which the present assembly had met, and read several decrees of former councils for the security of the members, for regulating the manner of proceeding in the sessions, and for preventing disturbance and disputes about precedency. The ministers and officials of the council being then appointed, the session was dismissed.

The emperor is crowned at Milan.

MEAN while the emperor, having received the iron crown at Milan, proceeded to Parma, where he spent the winter. Eugenius likewise, continuing fixed in his resolution to remove the council from Basil, on the 18th of December published a bull, with the consent of the ten cardinals who were with him, dissolving that council by the plenitude of the apostolic authority, and appointing another to be held eighteen months afterwards at Bolog- f

(B) Martin, a little before his death, had created four cardinals, who were then absent from Rome. As Eugenius suspected they were not in his interest, he endeavoured to exclude them from the college, and for that purpose, on the 23d of October, published, that those, who were promoted to the cardinalship in a private consistory, should not be accounted cardinals, till they had received the ensigns of their dignity; namely, the red hat, the title, and ring, and that even then they could not have an active voice in the election of a pope, or in any other public affair, till the pope had granted them leave, and solemnly opened their mouth. In consequence of this bull, Dominicus Capranica, one of the new promoted cardinals, was not allowed to enter Rome; but being, nevertheless, received as a cardinal by the council of Basil, Eugenius began to be apprehensive lest his authority should be attacked by the fathers, and himself treated in the same manner as John XXIII. had been by the council of Constance. This shutting of the mouth has since been declared to be only a ceremony, to teach the new cardinals modesty and reserve at their first entrance into the consistory (1).

a na. The reaſon he gave for this proceeding, was the invitation given to the Bohemians to confer upon the diſputed articles, which he alledged was injurious to the apoſtolic authority, and to the councils of Conſtance and Siena, by which theſe ſame Bohemians had been already ſolemnly condemned; and therefore, according to the canons and decrees of the fathers, ought to be denied all farther audience. Eugenius was intreated by the emperor, and Henry king of England, to revoke this decree; and a certain doctor publiſhed a treatiſe, juſtifying the invitation given to the Bohemians. Cardinal Julian likewiſe wrote with great freedom to the pope, urging the neceſſity for celebrating the council at Baſil, declaring that it could not be diſſolved without the greateſt ſcandal, and that it ought to be ſupported, even though Rome and the patrimony of the church were ſure to be loſt; that to b raiſe 30,000 crowns, that were demanded for the Bohemian war, he ought to ſell the croſſes and chalices; and that, if he did not revoke his bull, there was very great danger of a ſchiſm, as the fathers at Baſil were determined to continue the council. Accordingly, the fathers that were there aſſembled, on the 21ſt of January, publiſhed a letter, addreſſed to all the faithful, informing them that they were firmly determined to continue the council which had been lawfully aſſembled, and would not leave Baſil till they had completed the work for which they had come together, deſiring all men to aſſiſt them, and enjoining the prelates, under the penalties of the canons, to haſten to the council.

The pope diſſolves the council by the plenitude of his power. A. D. 1432.

In conſequence of this letter, the clergy of France aſſembled at Berry; and having dec clared, in ſeveral propoſitions, that the council was lawfully aſſembled, and ought not to be transferred, they exhorted the king to ſend ambaſſadors to the pope, to intreat him to order the council to be continued, and in their own name appointed the archbiſhop of Lyons to ſollicit the pope. They likewiſe intreated the king to allow the prelates of his kingdom to go to the council, and to ſend his deputies thither, granting a fourth part of a tythe of the eccleſiaſtical revenues for their expences. A few days before the prelates of France had publiſhed their propoſitions, the ſecond ſeſſion of the council was held at Baſil, on the 14th of February, in which, after maſs, and the uſual prayers, the biſhop of Periqueux aſcended the pulpit, and read the decrees of the council; among which there was one, declaring that, upon the authority of the apoſtolic ſee, and the decrees of the councils of Conſtance and Siena, the ſynod of Baſil was lawfully aſſembled. That no doubt of its authority might remain, d he then read two propoſitions from the decrees of the councils of Conſtance; the one, that a general ſynod, lawfully aſſembled, received its authority immediately from Chriſt, and ought to be obeyed by the higheſt dignity, the pontifical not excepted; the other, that whoever, of whatever dignity, ſhould refuſe obedience to its decrees, ought to be puniſhed. In the third ſeſſion, which was held on the 29th of April, the proceedings of the council with Eugenius and the cardinals were read; how that, upon hearing that the pope, moved by falſe information, had by a bull ordered it to be diſſolved, they had ſent ſeveral nuncios to his holineſs, petitioning, but without effect, the revocation of that bull; the fathers therefore, upon the authority of the decrees publiſhed in the former ſeſſion, warned the pope to revoke the ſaid bull, and to come perſonally to the council within three months, or, upon a lawful ime pediment, to ſend his legates with a full power; they likewiſe cited the cardinals to come to Baſil within the ſame time, otherwiſe they would provide for the neceſſities of the church as the Holy Spirit ſhould direct.

The prelates of France declare for the council;

During theſe proceedings of the council, their legates, who had been ſent to Germany to invite the Bohemians to ſend deputies to the ſynod, after ſeveral difficulties, at length prevailed with the Huſſites to appear at the diet at Egra, which was held on the 27th of April. The Bohemians, after complaining of the unjuſt war which they had been obliged to ſuſtain for ſo many years, declared their willingneſs to appear at the council of Baſil, to prove their four propoſitions by the authority of the ſcripture and the doctors of the church; but they demanded ſeveral princes and nobles as hoſtages for the ſecurity of their deputies at the coun-
f cil. The catholics thought the demand of hoſtages diſhonourable, and inſiſted that it was a preſumption in the Huſſites to undertake to reform the church; but that they ought implicitly to ſubmit in every thing to the deciſion of a general council; which laſt propoſition was rejected with diſdain by the Huſſites, who thought it abſurd, that divine and ſelf-evident truths ſhonld be ſubject to human deciſions, or that they ſhould chuſe their moſt bitter enemies for their judges, who had already unjuſtly condemned them and thoſe truths unheard [b]. At length it was agreed, that, for the ſecurity of the Bohemian deputies, the council ſhould grant a ſafe conduct, in the moſt ample terms, and the princes and deputies of the cities then preſent ſhould engage their word of honour for their ſafety.

mians (C), and appointed a nuncio to go to the emperor in Italy, to deſire him to grant them his imperial protection. As Eugenius at this time was dangerouſly ill, the council decreed, that, if the ſee ſhould happen to become vacant, the future pope ſhould be elected no where elſe but at Baſil; and that the pope, during the continuance of the council, ſhould create no new cardinals; they then ordered a bull or ſeal to be made for the letters and acts of the ſynod, and, as they did not approve of the nomination of the cardinal of Foix by Eugenius to be vicar and governor of Avignon, they granted that commiſſion to Alphonſus, cardinal of St. Euſtachius. In the 5th ſeſſion, which was held on the 9th of Auguſt, the judges were appointed for the cauſes relating to the faith, and a decree was made, prohibiting the members to be called from the council to the Roman court. A few days after, four nuncios arriving from the pope, they were admitted to a public audience; and after enlarging upon the advantages of peace and union, and the authority of a pope above a council, they then declared, that, as Eugenius could not, on account of his bad health and other reaſons, quit Italy, he offered the council the choice of any city in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate for holding their ſeſſions, and, upon their fixing the place, he would not prorogue their meeting, but would immediately go thither himſelf. The council refuſed to comply with the pope's requeſt, and affirmed that their authority was ſupreme, and that thoſe, who endeavoured to diſſolve them, ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and created a ſchiſm in the church. In the next ſeſſion, which was held on the 6th of September, and at which were preſent, beſides the legate, two cardinals and thirty-two mitred prelates, the proctors of the council ſtood up, and accuſed the pope of contumacy, becauſe he had not revoked the bull for diſſolving the council, nor had appeared perſonally, or by others, within the time appointed at the third ſeſſion. The council, however, at that time deferred any further proceedings againſt the pope and the cardinals, as the nuncios of Eugenius declared that they could produce reaſons juſtifying their abſence.

Several decrees againſt the authority of the pope.

THE ſeventh ſeſſion was held on the 6th of November, in which was renewed the decree of the fourth ſeſſion, prohibiting the election of a pope to be made but at the place of the council's reſidence. In the eighth ſeſſion, which was held on the 18th of December, ſixty days more were granted to Eugenius; within which time, if he did not revoke his bull for diſſolving the council of Baſil and convoking another, the fathers would proceed againſt him without any farther warning or citation. They then declared all his promotions and ordinations of churches to be null; ordered the partriarchs and biſhops to come to the council under the penalties of the canons, and the cardinals under the pain of loſing their benefices; and decreed, that, during the continuance of the council of Baſil, no other council could be convoked, and that the pope could not deprive thoſe of their benefices who adhered to, or were preſent at, the council of Baſil, nor lay new taxes on the territories of the Roman church or others, under any pretence, nor alienate or mortgage them; and any ſuch acts were declared null. It is probable the council was encouraged to theſe proceedings by the countenance of the emperor; who, on the 22d of November, publiſhed a bull, declaring, that, as he had from the beginning favoured the council of Baſil, ſo he would ſtill protect it to the utmoſt of his power. This bull was dated from Siena, where Sigiſmund had reſided ſeveral months, having been occupied the whole ſummer in ſmall ſkirmiſhes with the forces of the Florentines and Venetians, the pope himſelf favouring them, being apprehenſive leſt the emperor, after his coronation, ſhould exert himſelf ſtill farther in defence of the council of Baſil[c].

WHILE the emperor was ſoliciting the pope by letters and meſſengers to agree to his coronation, the deputies of the Huſſites ſet out from Bohemia for Baſil, where they arrived on the 4th of January with great pomp, being attended by 300 armed gentlemen, and the people running out without the city, and crouding the walls and the ſtreets through which they were to paſs, and looking with aſtoniſhment at their fierce and marſhal[d] appea-

(C) The ſafe conduct granted to the Bohemians was expreſſed in the moſt ample terms. The council ſolemnly engaged the public faith for the ſecurity of all thoſe who ſhould be ſent from Bohemia and Moravia to the ſynod, to the number of 200 perſons; they were allowed to celebrate the ſervice after their own manner in their houſes, provided divine ſervice, according to the catholic form, was not interrupted by them, neither in Baſil nor on the road; and if any of the retinue committed any thing to violate the ſafe conduct, the criminal ſhould be judged by themſelves. On the other hand, if the catholics ſhould do any thing to the prejudice of the ſafe conduct, the council ſhould judge them, with the conſent of the deputies: the catholics ſhould not, in their ſermons or conferences, declaim againſt the four articles of the Bohemians; and the deputies ſhould be allowed freely to give their proofs from ſcripture and the holy doctors in defence of the ſaid four articles; namely, that the euchariſt ought to be adminiſtered under both kinds: that the goſpel ſhould be preached freely and publicly; that the clergy ſhould be deprived of all civil dominion; and that public and heinous crimes ought to be extirpated from the faithful, by thoſe to whom it belongs (2).

a rance. They were received with great hoſpitality: a few days after, being introduced to the council, cardinal Julian made a long diſcourſe to them, recommending peace and union; and as the catholic church, which could be no where better repreſented than in a general council, could not err in the faith, he exhorted the Bohemians, as ſons of the church, to hearken to her voice, by ſubmitting to the decrees of the council of Baſil. Rockyſanus, one of their deputies, anſwered in a few words, and, after expreſſing his gratitude to God for his favours, and to the legate and council for their hoſpitality and kindneſs, he aſked a day when they might be heard upon their four articles. The council aſſigned the 16th of the month, when Rockyſanus began his diſcourſe on the firſt article, which he continued for three forenoons ſucceſſively; Nicholas, the Taborite, diſcourſed up-
b on the ſecond article for two days; and Udalricus, a prieſt of the Orphans, upon the third article for other two days. Laſtly, Peter Payne, an Engliſhman, illuſtrated the fourth article in three forenoons. The catholics then proceeded to their defence, and John de Raguſa, general proctor of the Dominicans, ſpent eight days in anſwering to the firſt article; Ægidius Carlerius, dean of Cambray, diſcourſed four forenoons on the ſecond article; and Henry Kalteiſen, a Dominican, employed three days in diſcuſſing the third article. Laſtly, John Palomar, archdean of Barcelona, diſcourſed three days on the laſt article. The Huſſites not being convicted by theſe anſwers of the catholics, Rockyſanus impugned the diſcourſe of the Raguſan for ſix days; and, one diſpute begetting another, they debated fifty days without any appearance of an accommodation [c]. At length the duke of Bavaria, the protector of c the council, propoſed to terminate their differences by a friendly conference; but this method alſo failing of ſucceſs, the Bohemians urging to return, both parties agreed, that the council ſhould ſend deputies to treat with the Huſſites in a diet to be held on the 7th of June. Accordingly the fathers named ten of their moſt learned brethren, who, on the 14th of April, ſet out for Prague with the Bohemian deputies [f].

Besides theſe proceedings with the Huſſites, the council, in the ninth ſeſſion, which was held on the 22d of January, had ſolemnly taken the emperor under their protection; declaring all the cenſures publiſhed againſt him by the pope to be null and void, and ordering all his ſubjects to obey him as formerly. In the following ſeſſion, which was held on the 19th of February, the proctors of the council again accuſed the pope of contumacy, The pope is accuſed of contumacy.
d and ſome prelates were appointed to draw up the proceſs againſt him. Tho' no perſons appeared at this ſeſſion for the pope, yet a few days after, three legates arrived at Baſil from him, with propoſals to transfer the council either to Bologna, or to ſome other city of Germany, which the council would not agree to. He himſelf, in the mean time, after the departure of theſe legates for Baſil, had thought proper to confirm the council by a bull, which he publiſhed two days before the ſixty days were elapſed. Notwithſtanding this condeſcenſion, in the next ſeſſion, which was held on the 27th of April, the council publiſhed ſeveral decrees to the prejudice of the papal authority. They confirmed the decrees of the council of Conſtance for holding of ſynods, and determined that the pope was bound to come to the council in perſon, or by his legates, as well as all others who had that prie vilege, under pain of being, ipſo facto, ſuſpended from the pontificate, and other benefices and dignities, unleſs they repented within four months; that a council could not be transferred or diſſolved by a pope, without the conſent of two-thirds of the members; and that, for the future, the popes ſhould be obliged to ſwear to obſerve theſe decrees. A few weeks after, the ſynod received a letter from the emperor, dated at Viterbo, informing them that the pope had appointed legates to preſide at the council in his name; but as ſome interruption had prevented their journey, he had ſent others in their room, whom Sigiſmund entreated the council to receive with reſpect. Notwithſtanding this letter, the fathers at Baſil rejected the pope's bull confirming the council to be captious and deceitful, and would not admit the deputies appointed by him to preſide; alledging, that, by their commiſſion, f they came rather to hold a new council than to confirm that which was already held.

Mean while in Italy a peace was concluded betwixt the duke of Milan, and the Florentines, Venetians, Lucceſe, and other allies on both ſides; and Sigiſmund having ſworn to two cardinals at Viterbo to defend the catholic faith and the holy ſee, not to make any treaty with heretics, ſchiſmatics, Turks, and pagans, and to renew the privileges and donations granted by his predeceſſors to the Roman church, the pope at length conſented to his coronation. He was accordingly received at Rome with great pomp, and crowned on Whitſuntide with the uſual ceremonies. Having continued ſome time in that city and created ſeveral knights, he returned through the territories of the Venetians, to whom he was now reconciled; and, croſſing the Alps, arrived at Baſil on the 11th of October. The emperor is crowned at Rome.

g During theſe proceedings in Italy, the deputies of the council arrived at Prague, and, in a numerous aſſembly of the Bohemian nobles, clergy, and commoners, which was held on the 7th of June, propoſed an union with the clergy previous to the diſcuſſion of the four articles. But the Bohemians abſolutely refuſing to agree to this propoſal, the deputies then required that they would draw up the articles in what manner they thought proper to be ſent to the council. This requeſt was complied with, and on the 11th of Auguſt, the Bohemians delivered their four articles to the deputies, together with the conditions of the union; namely, that they would obey their legal governors in every thing as far as they were bound by the law of God; but if a council, a pope, or the prelates, ſhould command what was prohibited by God, or omit what was written in the canon of the Bible, they would not obey; and that, after the concluſion of the union, the council ſhould prohibit all princes and prelates to ſcandalize the Bohemians as heretics, or to commit hoſtilities againſt them. The deputies having departed from the council, the Bohemian nobles, during their abſence, rejected the arbitrary authority of Procopius, and, by the advice of Mainard of Newhouſe choſe one of the nobility as their annual governor, and appointed ſeveral others as his counſellors, to whom they truſted the adminiſtration of the government. The Taborites and Orphans in the mean time ſtill acknowleging Procopius, under his command beſieged Pilſen, while ſome of them ravaged Hungary, and others aſſiſted the Poles in their war againſt the Teutonic knights. Soon after the deputies returned to Bohemia with the remarks of the council upon the four articles. In the laſt, inſtead of the words, by thoſe to whom it belongs, they had ſubſtituted, according to the law of God and the inſtitutions of the holy fathers; and to that about preaching the goſpel they had added, by proper perſons ſent and approved by their ſuperiors, freely but not irregularly, and ſaving the authority of the pope. As to what regarded the dominion and ſecular poſſeſſions of the clergy, the council had altered that article, and declared, that eccleſiaſtics, who are adminiſtrators of the poſſeſſions of the church, ought to adminiſter faithfully, but theſe poſſeſſions cannot be uſurped without ſacrilege. As the Bohemians were leſs anxious about theſe articles, they inſiſted upon having the explication of the council upon the article concerning the euchariſt before they would give their anſwer. The deputies then declared that the council gave permiſſion to the Bohemians, namely to thoſe who had arrived at the years of diſcretion, to communicate under both kinds, on condition that their prieſts ſhould always declare to the communicants, that they ought firmly to believe, that the fleſh of Chriſt is not under the bread alone, nor his blood under the wine alone, but that he is wholly under each kind ſeparately. After much diſpute on both ſides, theſe alterations in the articles were at length agreed to by the Bohemian nobles, who ſent three deputies to Baſil to inform the council of their ſubmiſſion. The fathers received this news with great joy, and drew up the treaty of peace under the title of Compactata; which was agreed to by the nobles, and ſome years afterwards received by all the Huſſites.

The council make alterations in the articles of the Bohemians;

who at length ſubmit to the church.

THE council of Baſil during theſe tranſactions with the Huſſites, were not unmindful to ſupport their authority in oppoſition to the pope, and being informed that he had publiſhed a bull, declaring all their proceedings null and void, excepting in thoſe things which he had allowed them to treat of in the twelfth ſeſſion, which was held on the 13th of July, they intended to proceed to his depoſition: but, in regard to the emperor's requeſts, they granted him ſixty days more, within which time, if he did not revoke his proceedings againſt the council, they declared him, ipſo facto, ſuſpended from all adminiſtration of the pontificate in ſpirituals and temporals. A decree was likewiſe made for the legal election and confirmation of biſhops and prelates, without any reſervations, and according to the eccleſiaſtical canons, concerning age, learning, and manners, thereby putting a ſtop to annates. In the next ſeſſion, which was held on the 11th of September, the proctors of the council again accuſed the pope of contumacy; but the fathers, at the interceſſion of the duke of Bavaria, granted him thirty days more. At this ſeſſion two nuncios appeared from the pope, who brought with them two bulls from his holineſs. By the one, Eugenius confirmed the council from its firſt opening for the extirpation of hereſies, wars, and bad morals, as though no tranſlation or diſſolution of it had ever been ordained, on condition that the legates, whom he had appointed, ſhould preſide at the ſeſſions; and all decrees made by the council, againſt the authority of the pope, cardinals, or others adhering to him, ſhould be reverſed. The ſecond bull gave authority to three prelates to demand the ſaid revocation of the proceedings of the council, and to revoke and declare null all that had been done againſt the council by the pope.

The pope annuls the proceedings of the council.

As the fathers at Baſil ſtill inſiſted, that nothing that they had done could or ought to be revoked, Eugenius annulled their decree, made in the twelfth ſeſſion, againſt the pope and the cardinals; and ſoon after a long letter was publiſhed, addreſſed to all the faithful, in defence of the pope, aſſerting that the fathers at Baſil were greatly deceived, when they imagined that a general council was ſuperior in every thing to a pope; and concluding with an exhortation to the princes and faithful, to adviſe the council at Baſil to admit his legates, and, in caſe they ſhould refuſe to comply, to oppoſe them to the utmoſt of their

a their power. The pope afterwards disowned this letter; but the fathers judging it, as well as others, to be genuine, on the 11th of October assembled in the church to proceed finally against the pope, when news being brought of the arrival of the emperor, they deferred the affair for some days, and went out to meet him. In the fourteenth session, which was held on the 7th of November, and at which the emperor was present, the term for proceeding against Eugenius was again prorogued ninety days, on condition, nevertheless, that within that time he should adhere to the council, and revoke all that he had decreed against it, especially the last three letters, and likewise confirm all its proceedings. On the 26th of the same month was held the fifteenth session, in which several decrees were made, appointing provincial synods to be celebrated every three years, and diocesan assem-
b blies twice or thrice, or at least once, in a year. The manner of celebrating those synods was likewise determined, and matters about which they were to deliberate was specified, particularly the censure of manners both in ecclesiastics and regulars. At this or the preceding session, must have happened what we find related by Krantz, namely, that the king of the Turks, having not only concluded a truce, but agreed to a perpetual peace with the emperor, sent a solemn embassy to the council to have the treaty confirmed. The ambassadors brought very rich presents for the emperor, who, after the business for which they had come was concluded, dismissed them with magnificent gifts for their master[g].

Mean while the duke of Milan, imagining that the pope had favoured the Florentines, and his own countrymen the Venetians in the late war, and finding that his authority was
c greatly lessened by the opposition of the council, he sent all the bishops in his dominions to Basil. Under pretence of marching an army into Apulia, he seized the Picene territory, and several other places of the ecclesiastical state, pretending that he had received a letter from the council, constituting him their vicar in Italy. He likewise sent another army, under the command of Fortebrace, who took possession of Tivoli, and made himself master of the greatest part of Campania. Very few cities of the patrimony continuing faithful to the church, and the Romans seeming to threaten a revolt[h], Eugenius in this extremity at last consented to adhere to the council, and about the middle of December published a bull according to the form prescribed in the fourteenth session, revoking all his proceedings against the council, and declaring it lawfully assembled. This bull being
d read in the sixteenth session, which was held on the 5th of February, the fathers declared that the pope had thereby satisfied the citation and request of the council; and on the 24th of April, the legates of the pope incorporated with the other members of the council, but not in their public character: they were likewise obliged to swear to act faithfully, for the honour of the council, and to defend its decrees, particularly that of the synod of Constance, about the superiority of a council over a pope, and not to depart from Basil without leave. Accordingly in the next session, which was held on the 22d of the same month, the legates, together with cardinal Julian, were allowed to preside, but without any coactive jurisdiction, and saving the manner of proceeding hitherto observed in the council, and that all acts should be passed under the council's seal. The eighteenth session was held on e the 24th of June; and the emperor being absent, the fathers renewed the decree of the council of Constance, concerning the authority of a general council over a pope; and at the same time received a treatise composed by the patriarch of Antioch in support of that doctrine.

The duke of Milan seizes the church patrimony.

The pope adheres to the council.

A. D. 1434.

Mean while the pope was harrassed by various misfortunes, which are minutely related by his secretary the historian Blondus[i]. Fortebrace having, by the assistance of the Colonnæ, taken possession of Ponte Molo and the Flaminian gate[k], the Romans were prevailed upon to revolt, and had resolved to seize the pope. Eugenius being informed of their design, disguised himself in the habit of a benedictine, and embarking on board a small vessel sailed down to Ostia, but not without great danger from the Romans, who pursued him, f and shot several arrows into his vessel. At Ostia he went on board a galley, and sailed from thence to Pisa, and afterwards to Florence; from whence, on the 20th of June, he wrote to the council, informing them of what he had suffered, and confirming his former purpose of countenancing the proceedings The Romans in the mean time plundered all his effects, imprisoned his nephew cardinal Condelmero, and endeavoured to get possession of the castle of St. Angelo, but without effect. The council having received the pope's letter, soon after sent two cardinals, as their legates, into Italy, to accommodate all differences betwixt Eugenius and the duke of Milan, and to prevail with the revolted cities to renew their allegiance[l]. About the same time three deputies having arrived at the council, from the emperor and patriarch of Constantinople, to treat of an union with the Latin church, after several private conferences betwixt them and the legates, and other members of the council, it was agreed, that an œcumenical council should be held in the East, namely, in Calabria, Ancona, or any other maritime city, at Bologna, or Milan, or Buda, Vienna, or, lastly in Savoy; and if the Greek emperor could not be prevailed upon to come to Basil, then the fathers of the council should go to any city the Greeks should chuse, within a month after the arrival of the eastern prelates: that those of Basil should send 8000 ducats for defraying the expences of assembling the eastern prelates at Constantinople; that the western church should support those of the east at the council, to the number of 700 persons, and bear the expence of their voyage both in coming and returning. These, and some other less material articles being agreed to, were approved and confirmed by the council in the nineteenth session which was held on the 7th of September, and afterwards ratified by the pope. In the same session a decree was published, whereby the Jews were compelled to hear sermons, and several former decrees were renewed, prohibiting all communication with them in faith, manners, conversation, commerce, dress, or lodging. A decree of the council of Vienne, about the study of the Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, and Chaldaic languages, was ordered to be observed.

The Hussites, who had agreed to the compactata, defeat the Taborites.

During these proceedings, the synod having been informed that the Orphans and Taborites, who had refused to agree to the compactata, had been attacked and entirely defeated by the other party, under the command of Mainard, together with the catholics, they sent twelve deputies to Ratisbon, who had several disputes with those of Bohemia of the party of the Taborites, who insisted that, for the sake of uniformity, the catholics should be compelled to communicate under both kinds; but their demand was rejected by the emperor, and the other deputies [m]. Sigismund at the same time complained to the deputies of the council against some proceedings of the fathers, that were derogatory to his authority; namely, that, while he was in Italy, they had written to the duke of Milan to restore the patrimony of the church, and not to the emperor, although it was the emperors who had granted that donation to the popes; that, while he was at Basil, the council had sent a cardinal to France, and others to the pope, without acquainting him; and that they had assumed the cognizance of causes that did not belong to their jurisdiction, particularly the dispute between the two pretenders to the duchy of Saxony. As he could not allow of these proceedings, he declared he had therefore left Basil; but if the council would diligently attend to the reformation of manners, he would come most willingly, even from paradise, to assist at their deliberations [n].

A. D. 1435.

Several decrees against the concubinage of the clergy.

What satisfaction the emperor received from the council is uncertain; but the following year we find he desired the fathers again to appoint deputies to treat with the Bohemians. His request was complied with; and on the 23d of January the deputies departed from Basil for Beronne in Bohemia, the place fixed for the congress. The day before they departed the twentieth session was held, in which several decrees were made against the concubinage of the clergy. Those who were publickly convicted of keeping concubines, or refused to dismiss those women with whom they were suspected to have an unlawful commerce, were deprived of their revenues for three months; and if, after that, they neglected to turn off their concubines within a limited time, they were, ipso facto, deprived of their benefices, and rendered incapable of succeeding to others. Mean while Eugenius, being informed of the death of the queen of Naples, he sent a nuncio immediately into that kingdom, requiring the nobles and people not to give their allegiance to any prince, but to him who should be confirmed by the apostolic see. This message was not agreeable to the Neapolitans, who declared that they would accept of no king but René duke of Anjou, who, upon the death of his brother Lewis, had been adopted by the late queen, and was at this time a prisoner to the duke of Burgundy. Before his arrival, Capua, and some other places in that kingdom, were seized by Alphonsus king of Arragon and Sicily, who on this occasion renewed his pretensions to the crown of Naples. Hostilities in the mean time still continuing betwixt the troops of the duke of Milan and those of the pope, and the Venetians and Florentines, Piccininus, the duke's general, had formed a plot with the bishop of Novara to seize Eugenius, when he should go to the country for the summer [o]; but their design being discovered, the bishop was apprehended and sent back to Milan, his life having been spared at the intercession of the cardinal Albergatus, who soon after passed the Alps to be present at the famous congress held at Arras, for negociating a peace between the kings of France and England, and the duke of Burgundy. The general council likewise sent some cardinals and prelates to be present at this congress: and on the 21st of May gave a mandate to the cardinal of Arles, who was commissioned by the pope to go to Arras, ordering him to cause the libraries and archives of the universities, churches, and a monaſteries, to be ſearched for books relating to the conception of the bleſſed virgin, and to ſend ſuch as he could find to the council.

THE twenty-firſt ſeſſion was held a few weeks after, on the 9th of June, in which a decree was made, prohibiting for the future the payment of any money, under any pretence or name whatever, for the confirmation of elections, admiſſions, &c. or for the proviſion, collation, or inveſtiture, of any churches, monaſteries, dignities, benefices, or eccleſiaſtical offices, or for a benediction, pall, or ordination, allowing only a competent ſalary to the writers, abbreviators, and regiſters of the letters, for their trouble: whoever acted otherwiſe were declared to incur the penalty of ſimony, and ordered to be puniſhed by their ſuperiors; and, if the decree was violated by any pope, a complaint was ordered to be b made to a general council. Decrees were likewiſe made in the ſame ſeſſion, about the modeſty and gravity to be obſerved in celebrating the divine ſervice, about the decency of apparel, and the puniſhment of thoſe who were negligent or abſent on that occaſion. Beſides the above-mentioned decree, aboliſhing annates or firſt fuirts, others were made in the general congregations, ordering the collectors of the revenues of the apoſtolic chamber to come to the council, to give an account of their receipts and diſburſements, and annuling all appeals of cauſes that had been decided by the council. Theſe decrees were not paſſed without long and warm diſputes, the legates of the pope proteſting againſt the injuſtice of the proceedings of the fathers, in not previouſly acquainting the pope: but their oppoſition was without effect; for the council having publiſhed the decrees, ſent two legates to Florence c to obtain the concurrence of Eugenius. John de Bachenſtein, one of the legates, declared, that if the pope would acquieſce in the demands of the council, they would provide for his holineſs and the cardinals, by ſome more honourable means; but if he would not concur, they would, nevertheleſs, cauſe their decrees to be inviolably obſerved. Eugenius ſent his anſwer to the council by two nuncios, who diſcourſed warmly in favour of the apoſtolic ſee, and remonſtrated againſt the injury done to it by aboliſhing annates; but they were anſwered by cardinal Julian, in the name of the council, who refuſed abſolutely to revoke the decrees, which were the occaſion of a new breach betwixt the fathers and the pope. About this time the council ſent nuncios to Conſtantinople, to intreat the emperor to agree to the articles that had been concluded with his deputies, and to prevail with him, d if poſſible, to conſent to celebrate the œcumenical council at Baſil. During their abſence the twenty-ſecond ſeſſion was held, on the 15th of October, in which the council condemned a treatiſe of an Auguſtine monk, concerning Chriſt and the church, as containing many erroneous and ſcandalous propoſitions (D); but they did not proceed againſt the author, though he did not appear, as he alleged canonical excuſes for his abſence. The council having, about this time, taken cognizance of a diſpute betwixt the republic of Venice and the patriarch of Aquileia, ordered the republic to reſtore all the poſſeſſions which it had uſurped from the patriarchate, under pain of an interdict againſt the ſtate, and a ſentence of excommunication againſt the doge, ſenate, and nobles; but notwithſtanding this ſentence, the republic neglected to make any reſtitution.

Their decree is oppoſed by the pope.

The Venetians contemn their authority;

e WHILE the authority of the council was contemned by the Venetians, it was on the other hand courted by Alphonſus king of Arragon, who not being able to prevail with the pope to favour his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, in reſentment reſolved wholly to addict himſelf to the council: he therefore wrote to the fathers, deſiring them to ſend one to take the government of Rome, and of the patrimony of the church, as he was reſolved to reconquer and reſtore both. At the ſame time he charged Eugenius to adhere to the council, and not to oppoſe him in taking poſſeſſion of Naples, otherwiſe he muſt blame himſelf for the conſequences. Whether the council was influenced by theſe declarations of Alphonſus is uncertain; but in the twenty-third ſeſſion, which was held on the 24th of March, they altered the bulls then in force, with regard to the manner of election of a pope and f conclave, preſcribing a form of an oath to be taken by the pope at his election, to be renewed every year on the ſame day, or the day of his coronation. By this oath the pope obliged himſelf to obſerve the decrees of all general councils, particularly that of Baſil, and to endeavour, to the utmoſt of his power, to extirpate the hereſies, reform the manners, and procure peace to Chriſtendom, and the frequent celebration of general councils. Several other articles were added, preſcribing the manner of reforming the pope'e family, and the Roman court; and concerning the adminiſtration of the patrimony of the church, particularly that the pope ſhould not appoint his own relations or kindred within the third de-which is courted by the king of Arragon. A. D. 1436.

New reſtrictions laid upon the pope and cardinals by the council.

(D) Theſe were ſome of his propoſitions, namely, that Chriſt ſinned daily, and always had ſinned, not aſſerting this of our Saviour in his perſon, but in his members, which, being united to the head, he affirmed made one Chriſt; that all thoſe who were juſtified were not members of Chriſt, but only elect; that the human nature in our Saviour was real Chriſt, and the perſon of the word (3).

gree, as dukes, counts, governors, generals &c. of provinces and cities of the eccleſiaſti- a cal ſtate; that the half of the revenues of all the poſſeſſions of the church ſhould belong to the cardinals, by whoſe advice all ſerious and important matters ſhould be tranſacted, and whoſe number ſhould not exceed twenty-four, to be elected from all the provinces of Chriſtendom by the other cardinals, after a ſtrict examination of their morals and learning; and that they ſhould not be relations either of the pope, or of thoſe cardinals already in the college: laſtly, the decrees concerning the liberty of elections, and the total annulling of papal reſervations, were confirmed. In the next ſeſſion, which was held on the 12th of April, one of the nuncios having returned from Conſtantinople, and informed the council that the emperor had at length agreed to hold the œcumenical council in ſome maritime city of Italy, the fathers publiſhed a ſafe conduct for all the Greeks who ſhould come to that b aſſembly; and at the ſame time granted plenary indulgences, with full remiſſion of all ſins once in life, and at the point of death, to all thoſe who ſhould grant one week's expences of their family towards the holy purpoſe of the union of the Greeks. But that the indulgences might not ſeem to be given away entirely for money, ſome pious works were alſo enjoined; nevertheleſs, the legates of the pope exclaimed againſt the decree as a baſe and venal proſtitution (E). A few weeks afterwards Eugenius ſent two cardinals, as his legates, to Baſil, to make freſh remonſtrances againſt the decrees concerning elections, confirmations, annates, and indulgences, and to deſire the fathers to appoint tne place for celebrating the council with the Greeks, offering, if they would agree with him as to the nomination of the place, and transfer themſelves thither directly, to give 60,000 crowns c towards the expences of the eaſtern prelates; which ſum he affirmed was more than the indulgences would raiſe. This offer however was rejected by the council, who perſiſted in their own juſtification, and anſwered, that it was not yet proper to determine the place for the œcumenical council.

An entire reconciliation is effected betwixt the Huſſites and the emperor,

During theſe diſputes with the fathers at Baſil, Eugenius had again got poſſeſſion of Bologna, and by the prudence of the archbiſhop of Florence, who commanded his troops, had recovered ſeveral places that had been ſeized by the king of Arragon. About this time likewiſe, the deputies of the council, who had been ſent the former year into Bohemia, and had broke off the conferences upon a diſpute about ſettling the article concerning the uſurped church-lands, now aſſembled, with thoſe of Bohemia, at Iglavia, where a complete d reconciliation was effected betwixt the Huſſites and the church. Tho' one of the deputies had brought with him from the council a mitigation of the article rejected the year before by the Bohemians, yet, from Æneas Sylvius, one of the members of the council, it would appear, that the reconciliation was chiefly owing to a private treaty between the Huſſites and the emperor, which laſt promiſed that the church-lands ſhould be poſſeſſed by the preſent occupiers, till they were redeemed by money; that the exiles, monks, and nuns, ſhould not be permitted to return to Bohemia; that the pope ſhould have no authority to diſpoſe of the churches in that kingdom; and that Rockyſanus ſhould have the archbiſhop-rick of Prague [p]. The Bohemian deputies were diſmiſſed with magnificent preſents, and the emperor ſoon after proceeding to Prague, was crowned in that city with great ſolem- e nity; but he quickly violated the private treaty, by recalling and protecting the monks, expelling Rockyſanus from Prague, and acting by force againſt the remains of the Taborites, to whom he had granted a five years protection [q].

A. D. 1437.

While Sigiſmund, by his perfidy, was rendering himſelf odious to the Bohemians, the diſſenſions revived with great warmth betwixt the council and the pope, about determining the place for celebrating the œcumenical council, Eugenius wanted to fix upon ſome city in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, or in Tuſcany: but in the twenty fifth ſeſſion, which was held on the 7th of May, the majority of the fathers decreed, that the council ſhould be celebrated, if poſſible, at Baſil, or at Avignon, or laſtly, in Savoy; and for the ſupport of the Greeks, all eccleſiaſtics, even the pope and cardinals, ſhould give a tenth of their revenues: and as the f city of Avignon offered to lend 70,000 florins of gold, they mortgaged ſo much of the money, to be raiſed by the indulgences for their payment. Theſe decrees were publiſhed by a factious party of the council, who had ſeceded from the preſidents, and celebrated the ſeſſion by themſelves. They were by far the moſt numerous, but among them there were very few prelates of any rank. As they had refuſed to be preſent at the deputations and general congregations, the other party, who adhered to the preſidents and legates, fixed upon Florence, or Utinum, in Friuli, for the reſidence of the council, or any other ſafe place mentioned in convention betwixt the pope and the Greeks, which could ſooneſt furniſh the money, and fit out the gallies, for tranſporting the eaſtern prelates. a ſtinately in their opinions in the above ſeſſion, they ſat apart, and each ratified their own previous reſolutions; but the decree of the minority was confirmed by Eugenius, who appointed a nuncio to go, with two others of that party of the council, to Conſtantinople.

Nuncios ſent by each party to Conſtantinople.

About a month after their arrival, the nuncios, of the factious part of the council, landed from two gallies of Avignon, and intreated the emperor to come to that city, or Baſil, or Savoy, declaring, that, before he could arrive at Italy in the ſhips of Eugenius, that pope would be depoſed; but if he would agree to ſail with them to any of the three places above-mentioned, the princes, whoſe letters they brought, would furniſh ſuccours againſt the Turks. The Greek emperor however, notwithſtanding theſe declarations, adhered to the other party, and in the end of November embarked, with ſeveral prelates, for Venice, on board nine gal-
b lies furniſhed by the pope. During theſe proceedings at Conſtantinople, the factious party of the council having been informed that Eugenius had confirmed the decree of the minority, they were greatly irritated againſt him; and in the twenty-ſixth ſeſſion, which was held on the 31ſt of July, they publiſhed a monitory accuſing him of ſeveral crimes, and citing him and his cardinals to appear within the ſixty days. In the following ſeſſion, which was held on the 25th of September, they declared the late creation of the archbiſhop of Florence to the cardinalate to be void, as being contrary to a decree of the council; they likewiſe annulled the decree appointing Florence, or Utinum, for the reſidence of the œcumenical council, as being ſealed clandeſtinely, and againſt the appointment of the council; and to procure the favour of the emperor, they wrote to him, informing him of their proceedings c againſt Eugenius, and deſiring him to protect the council by his authority. Sigiſmund, who was then languiſhing in his laſt illneſs, and died a few months afterwards, in the 70th year of his age, wrote to the fathers to act with more moderation, to ceaſe their proceedings againſt the pope, and to take care leſt, inſtead of uniting the Greeks, they ſhould occaſion a ſchiſm among the Latins. Notwithſtanding this advice, the ſixty days granted to the pope being elapſed, the council, in the next ſeſſion, which was held on the 1ſt of October, declared Eugenius guilty of contumacy, the other party proteſting againſt their proceeding, and the deputies of Spain declaring their diſſent, in the name of their king and the prelates of their nation.

Eugenius transfers the council of Baſil to Ferrara;

Mean while Eugenius, being encouraged by the ſucceſs of his nuncios at Conſtantinople, d on the 16th of September publiſhed a bull, wherein, after recapitulating the violent proceedings of the council, he transferred it, by the plenitude of his power, immediately to Ferrara, which city he aſſigned for the future œcumenical council. The fathers at Baſil, inſtead of giving obedience to this bull, in the twenty-ninth ſeſſion, which was held on the 12th of October, publiſhed a decree, wherein, having accuſed the pope of being the author of the diſſenſion, they declared the tranſlation and diſſolution of the ſynod to be null, and charged the pope to revoke his bull, which if he did not do within four months, they declared him, ipſo facto, ſuſpended: they likewiſe prohibited, under pain of excommunication and interdict, any one from going or ſending to Ferrara, or from acting contrary to the decrees of the council of Baſil. A few days after they publiſhed a letter in juſtification of their fore mer monitory againſt the pope; and in the thirtieth ſeſſion, which was held on the 21ſt of December, they publiſhed ſome explications of the article concerning the euchariſt, in the treaty formerly concluded with the Bohemians; but theſe explications were not different from what had been already agreed to by the Bohemian deputies.

The following year was remarkable, not only for the diſſenſions betwixt the pope and the council of Baſil, but alſo on account of the warm diſputes in the council of Ferrara. On the 22d of January the fathers at Baſil celebrated the thirty-firſt ſeſſion, in which they publiſhed three decrees; by the firſt, they annulled all frivolous appeals to the Roman courts, and ordained, that thoſe who were above four days journey from Rome ſhould terminate all their ſuits at their proper reſidence, and all legal appeals ſho uld be carried to Baſil, and not
f to the pope. By the ſecond, they prohibited the pope from granting any reſervations of benefices, and ordained that livings ſhould be given only to prudent and learned men. The third was expreſly againſt Eugenius, whom they ſuſpended from the pontificate, aſſuming the adminiſtration thereof to themſelves, and appointing three perſons out of each of the nations as adminiſtrators of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. At this ſeſſion, and ſome weeks before, there were great conteſts and confuſion among the fathers. Cardinal Julian, and the other cardinals, being apprehenſive of a ſchiſm, left Baſil about the beginning of January. The cardinal of Arles, who was the only one that remained, was created preſident by the fathers, who cited the archbiſhop of Tarantaiſe, and the two nuncios that had been ſent by the minority to Conſtantinope; the firſt for having put to the torture a deputy of the duke of Savoy, g ſent by the council into Greece, and the two laſt for having falſely called themſelves nuncios of the council to the Greek emperor.

In the mean time ſeveral prelates having aſſembled at Ferrara, in conſequence of the ci- a tation of Eugenius, cardinal Albergatus, who had been appointed legate a latere by the pope, preſided at the firſt ſeſſion, which was held on the 10th of January, and in which it was decreed, that the council of Ferrara was lawfully aſſembled, as that of Baſil had been tranſferred for neceſſary and juſt reaſons; that it ought to endeavour to procure the union of the Greeks, and to accompliſh thoſe matters which had been begun, but not finiſhed, by the council of Baſil; all the tranſactions of which, after the tranſlation, were declared null, excepting thoſe which regarded the Bohemians, if they were confirmed by the council of Ferrara; laſtly, all were abſolved from the oaths they had taken to the council of Baſil [r]. A few weeks after, Eugenius came to Ferrara, and having in a general congregation com- b plained of the injurious proceedings of the council of Baſil, he declared, that if he had done any thing amiſs he ſubmitted himſelf willingly to the correction of the fathers. Two days after he regulated the order of ſitting in the aſſemblies; and preſiding in the ſecond ſeſſion, which was held on the 15th of February, he not only declared the ſeditious decrees of the council of Baſil to be null, but alſo that thoſe who continued at that aſſembly had incurred the penalties of excommunication, and privation of dignities and benefices, which they were rendered incapable of poſſeſſing for the future. All thoſe who were aſſembled at Baſil, under pretence of the council, were ordered to depart, under pain of excommunication, within thirty days, after which time the magiſtrates of the city were ordered to expel them, under the ſame penalty; which was alſo denounced againſt thoſe who ſhould carry any merchandize or proviſions into the city, if the above-mentioned perſons c ſhould continue contumacious. The Greek emperor and patriarch, with the prelates of that church, having about this time arrived at Venice, ſent five deputies to the pope to inform him of their arrival; and ſoon after ſailing up the Po, they landed at Ferrara, where they were received with the greateſt honours by Eugenius and the cardinals [s] (F). The pope, at the intreaty of the emperor, ſent nuncios and letters to the kings and princes of Chriſtendom, exhorting them to ſend their deputies to the council within four months. In the mean time the fathers at Baſil, in their thirty-ſecond ſeſſion, which was held on the 22d of March, condemned the conventicle, as they called it at Ferrara, and declared, whatſoever ſhould be done in it by the ſuſpended pope, or in his name, to be null and void, at the ſame time denouncing penalties againſt thoſe who repaired to Ferrara. d

The œcumenical council is opened in that city.

Their decrees, however, were deſpiſed by the other council, who appointed the œcumenical council to be opened at Ferrara on the 9th of April, on which day, both the Latins and Greeks having aſſembled in the church of St. George, and being ſeated according to the order previouſly agreed upon (G), a decree of the patriarch of Conſtantinople was firſt read, by which he declared that he conſented to the celebrating of an œcumenical council at Ferrara, to which aſſembly he ordered all who were concerned either to come or ſend, within four months, under pain of excommunication. Another decree of the pope was then read to the ſame purpoſe, and both received the aſſent of the fathers (H). After Eaſter the Latin fathers propoſed to employ the time, till the arrival of the deputies of the princes, in examining the controverted doctrines betwixt them and the Greeks; to this the eaſtern e prelates, after ſome difficulty, aſſented, and twelve perſons were choſen on each ſide, who aſſembled twice a week, and diſputed about purgatory and the bleſſedneſs of ſaints; but, after they had ſpent two months in thoſe diſputes, they left the queſtion undecided.

Mean while the German electors having aſſembled at Frankfort, choſe Albert, duke of Auſtria, as emperor. After his election, a general diet being held in the ſame city, it was agreed to adhere both to the pope and the council of Baſil, but not acknowlege the

(F) The Greek prelates would not condeſcend to kiſs the pope's feet; ſome of them gave him only a common ſalutation, and others kiſſed his hand and cheek (5).

(G) There were great diſputes betwixt the Greeks and Latins about the order of ſitting. The pope propoſed that the Latins ſhould ſit on one ſide of the church, and the Greeks on the other, and that he himſelf ſhould be ſeated at the head before the altar, in the middle betwixt both; but this was objected to by the Greek emperor, who claimed that place as due to him. At length it was agreed that the pope ſhould ſit at the head of the Latins on the right ſide of the church, and the emperor at the head of the Greeks on the other, and that the book of the goſpels ſhould be placed, with lighted tapers, betwixt the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul, upon a throne erected before the altar.

Beſides the proxies of the eaſtern patriarchs, there were preſent, according to Krantz, the metropolitan of Kiovia and of all Pruſſia, with ſeveral Muſcovite and Ruſſian prelates, and a retinue of 200 horſe. The metropolitan of the Georgians was likewiſe ſaid to be preſent, and deputies from the emperor of Trebiſond, and from the Iberians and Walachians (6).

(H) The Patrician acts call this the third ſeſſion, counting the two that preceded the coming of the Greeks; but others begin the firſt ſeſſion only at the 8th of October, when the diſpute commenced about the proceſſion of the holy ſpirit. The council itſelf is known by the name of the Florentine, having been transferred to that city on account of the plague, which raged in Ferrara.

a decrees of either party againſt the other. This determination, which was called the German neutrality, offended both Eugenius and the fathers of Baſil: however, as Albert renewed the ſafe conducts, granted by his predeceſſors to the council, they, in return, gave him all the money raiſed in Auſtria by the indulgences, for the journey of the Greeks. At the ſame time they proceeded with their uſual violence againſt the pope; and having confirmed their former decrees, and thoſe of Conſtance, concerning the power of a general council above a pope, and that thoſe who aſſerted otherwiſe were heretics, the proctors of the council then produced 150 articles of accuſation againſt Eugenius, which they offered to prove by witneſſes and public documents. Notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the deputies of the kings of France, Spain, England, and other princes, theſe articles of accu-b ſation were received in a general congregation, and ordered to be proved by witneſſes within thirty days, but, before that time was elapſed, twenty-two witneſſes were admitted to prove the articles of accuſation. The king of France in the mean time, being uncertain what courſe to take in the diſputes betwixt the pope and the council of Baſil, aſſembled the nobles and prelates of his kingdom at Berry, and by their advice publiſhed the pragmatic ſanction, by which he acknowleged the legality of the council of Baſil, and in ſome meaſure its authority. We ſay, in ſome meaſure, for they did not receive its decrees abſolutely, but with certain modifications, to render them more accommodated to the cuſtoms and uſages of the kingdom; all thoſe however were received ſimply that tended to retrench the authority of the pope. The king, by an edict, ordered this pragmatic ſanction to be
c obſerved inviolably thro' his dominions; but as the clergy of France thereby uſurped an authority, not only above a pope but alſo above a general council, it was ſoon after abrogated both by Eugenius and the king [t].

The emperor Albert and the German princes agree to a neutrality, with regard to the diſputes betwixt the pope and the council of Baſil.

A neutrality alſo obſerved by the Gallican church.

During theſe tranſactions in France, the German princes, in a diet held at Nuremberg, propoſed to the deputies from the council of Baſil, that, to determine all diſputes, a third place ſhould be choſen for holding a general council, at which ſhould aſſemble the prelates from Baſil and Ferrara, with the pope and the Greeks. The deputies of the council declared that they had no authority to agree to that propoſal, but demanded only that the diet would approve of the decrees of the council againſt Eugenius. The princes refuſed to grant their requeſt; but declared, that they would ſtill adhere to the neutrality concluded at d Franckfort. The deputies of the kings of France, England, Arragon, and Portugal, and of the duke of Milan, were of the ſame opinion [u]; and the deputies of the council ſtill refuſing all the terms of accommodation that were offered, another diet was appointed to be held on the 1ſt of March at Frankfort, which aſſembly, on account of the plague, was afterwards held at Mentz [w].

Mean while the Greeks, finding that none of the prelates came from Baſil, and that few or none arrived from any other place, made ſome objections to the council of Ferrara; but theſe ſcruples being removed by Eugenius, who aſſerted that, where he was with the cardinals, and the emperor and patriarch of Conſtantinople, with the legates of others, there was an univerſal ſynod, they agreed to celebrate the ſeſſions, and to diſpute, in the firſt place, up-
e on two points, namely, whether it was lawful to add any thing to the creed, and whether the addition, and from the ſon, was juſt. As the pope was diſtreſſed with the gout, the firſt ſeſſion was held on the 8th of October, in a large chapel of his palace, and ſix diſputants being appointed by each party, Beſſarion of Nicea, one of thoſe on the ſide of the Greeks, made a long and eloquent harangue, which is ſtill extant, wherein, after invoking the protection of God, he commended the emperor, the pope, and the fathers, for their pious intentions, and exhorted them to conſtancy and perſeverance, till the union was accompliſhed. Nothing elſe was done in this ſeſſion; and in the ſecond, which was held three days after, the archbiſhop of Rhodes, for the Latins, made another ſpeech in praiſe of the pope, the emperor, and the whole council: after which it was ordained, that the diſputes ſhould be carried on f by ſyllogiſms, and the option being given to the Greeks either to impugn or defend, they choſe the firſt, and left the Latins to anſwer their objections. The five following ſeſſions, which were all held in the ſame month, and ſeveral other private congregations, were ſpent in debating upon the expreſſion and from the ſon. The Greeks oppoſed that addition, as contrary to the decrees of the firſt general councils, which prohibited any addition to the creed; but the Latins aſſerted, that it was not ſo much an addition as an explanation of the words from the father, and urged that the Nicene fathers had taken the liberty to add explications to the apoſtles creed, and other councils had done the ſame to the Nicene (1). The ſame diſpute was continued in the five following ſeſſions, which were held in the month of November, and in which the Greeks at last granted that it was lawful to explain the words of the creed, but not to add that explanation to the creed itself. The same dispute was the subject of the three following sessions; at the first of which arrived the deputies from the duke of Burgundy; but as they neglected to salute the emperor, that prince threatened to dissolve the council if they did not give satisfaction for the insult; wherefore, at the intercession of the fathers, they were prevailed upon, at the next session, to pay their compliments to the emperor. At the following session, Mark of Ephesus endeavoured to conclude the dispute by a very long discourse; but still the matter was left undecided, cardinal Julian declaring, that, if the Greek should produce ten arguments, he would advance ten thousand. a

The Greeks being unmoved by the arguments of the Latins, and finding them equally uninfluenced by theirs, began to think of returning home, and proposed, as their final concession, that the words in dispute should be admitted in a definition apart; but the Latins refused to agree to this proposal, urging that, since the words were admitted as orthodox, they ought not to be expunged from the creed. As the plague raged at this time in Ferrara, the pope proposed to transfer the council to Florence, but to this the Greeks made great objections; at last, however, they gave their consent, on these conditions: that the council should not be transferred from Florence, but be concluded within four months; that they should be furnished with provisions; and that eight months stores should be sent by the pope to Constantinople. Accordingly, in the sixteenth session, which was held on the 11th of January, the translation of the council was published, and the fathers immediately after proceeding to Florence, held the seventeenth session in that city, on the 26th of February, in which, after a long dispute betwixt the emperor and cardinal Julian, it was agreed, that the two parties, for the future, should dispute in private assemblies; but this method was observed only a few weeks; for in the six following sessions, which were held in the month of March, the public disputations were again resumed, first concerning the meaning of the word procession, and afterwards about the acceptation of the words nature, essence, substance, subsistentia, and hypostasis, in the divine persons, how far they meant the same thing, and in what respects they differed. After these sessions the emperor assembled all the Greek metropolitans in the lodgings of the patriarch, who had been confined for some time by sickness, and laid before them the calamities which would befal the Greek empire, if the schism was not terminated: he therefore exhorted them to lay aside their disputes, and find out some method for an agreement, especially as the Latins, by the addition of the words and from the son, did not acknowledge two principles. The greatest part of the Greeks, being influenced by this exhortation of the emperor, did not dispute in the two following sessions, but only attended to the discourses of the Latins in proof of their doctrine; and afterwards holding a great many conferences in the lodgings of the patriarch, they at length unanimously agreed, that the holy spirit proceeded from the father and from the son, as from one principle and one substance. This opinion being committed to writing, and delivered to the pope, was approved by him and the Latins, who, as a testimony of their joy, embraced the Greeks with great affection. b

Eugenius then proposed to terminate the other points wherein the two churches differed, namely, concerning the fire of purgatory, and using leavened or unleavened bread in the sacrament of the eucharist, and the supremacy of the Roman see. Their deliberations were interrupted by the death of the patriarch of Constantinople, which happened on the 9th of June; but a few days after, the debates being resumed, an union was likewise effected in these points. The Greeks agreed as to the pains of purgatory, but would not determine absolutely whether it was fire, darkness, a whirlwind, or any thing else; they allowed that either leavened or unleavened bread may be consecrated in the eucharist; they likewise acknowleged in general the supremacy of the pope, but would not allow of appeals to him from other patriarchal sees, or that he had a power of celebrating œcumenical councils without the emperor and patriarchs. In the next session a decree was drawn up, wherein these restrictions were mentioned in general terms, which was subscribed by the pope, the cardinals, and several Latin prelates, and by the emperor, the proxies of several patriarchs, and fourteen metropolitans. The pope then desired that the Greeks would chuse a successor to the patriarch of Constantinople, whom he might confirm, and to whom he would give a large sum to support his dignity, promising likewise to remove the Latin patriarch of that title; but the Greeks refused absolutely to agree to that proposal, alleging that the patriarch must be chosen at Constantinople, by the whole province. The union being thus accomplished, the pope published a letter, addressed to all the faithful, informing them of the translation; and besides what had been stipulated with the emperor, he promised, upon an emergency, to furnish twenty armed gallies for six months for the defence of Constantinople, and to solicit the Christian princes to send him succours by land. Before the departure of the emperor, which happened towards the end of July, deputies arrived at Florence from f

a the patriarch of Armenia, to treat of an union. Eugenius, with the approbation of the ſynod, appointed three cardinals, and ſome doctors, to confer with the deputies; and, after frequent conferences, the Armenians profeſſing to hold and approve the doctrines that were held and taught by the Roman church, Eugenius delivered to them a decree, containing a ſummary of the Roman faith.

DURING theſe proceedings at Ferrara, the German princes, in a diet held at Mentz, propoſed to oblige the council of Baſil to put a ſtop to the proceedings againſt Eugenius. Although this propoſal was approved by the deputies of ſeveral princes of Europe who were there preſent, yet thoſe from Baſil would not conſent to it, and left the city. After their departure the legates of the pope arrived, and ſollicited the princes to reject the council of b Baſil; but their ſollicitations not being hearkened to, they proteſted againſt the proceedings of the diet, and departed. Mean while the fathers at Baſil, to ſtrengthen the articles againſt Eugenius, drew up eight propoſitions, which they called the truths of the catholic faith, tending to prove that the pope was a heretic, becauſe he had preſumed to diſſolve the council, contrary to the monitory of the fathers. Theſe propoſitions occaſioned great clamour and uproar in the council, ſo that the confuſion and noiſe reſembled the concourſe of two armies in an engagement. After long and vehement debates, which are mentioned at large by Æneas Sylvius, one of the members [x], the violent party found means by fraud, to publiſh the articles in a general congregation. The cardinal of Arles then appointed the thirty-third ſeſſion to be held on the 14th of May, at which none of the prec lates of Spain, and only about twenty-one of the other nations, would conſent to be preſent; but as there were a great many prieſts, the cardinal cauſed them to bring the relics of the ſaints into the aſſembly, and ordering them to ſupply the place of the abſent biſhops, he read the decree, confirming the above propoſitions. The deputies of the emperor, and of other princes, appeared a few days afterwards at the general congregations, and deſired the fathers to agree to ſome third place for the council; but their requeſt was denied, and Eugenius was ordered to be cited againſt the 23d of June, to hear his ſentence. The thirty-fourth ſeſſion was celebrated on that day, and Eugenius being called by two biſhops, and not appearing, was declared guilty of contumacy, and depoſed from the pontificate; all Chriſtians were abſolved from his obedience, and prohibited from adhering to d him under the pains of hereſy and ſchiſm, and the loſs of all their honours, benefices, and dignities (K). The ſame day the fathers deliberated whether they ſhould immediately proceed to an election of another pope; but, notwithſtanding the plague raged at that time in Baſil, it was reſolved to delay the election for two months: accordingly a decree for that purpoſe was publiſhed in the thirty-fifth ſeſſion, held on the 8th of July; and it was added, that, by the departure of any prelates from Baſil, the council ſhould not be reckoned diſſolved, without the conſent of two-thirds of thoſe that remained. Eugenius in the mean time, being informed of their proceedings, renewed his former decree againſt them; and in a general ſeſſion, held on the 5th of September, condemned the truths of the catholic faith, in the ſenſe they were taken in by the council of Baſil, as being contrary to the ſcrip-e tures, the fathers, and the council of Conſtance.

THE fathers at Baſil, before they were informed of theſe decrees of Eugenius, celebrated the thirty-ſixth ſeſſion on the 16th of October, in which they publiſhed a decree confirming the immaculate conception of the bleſſed virgin (L). Although the diet of Mentz had appealed from their decree againſt the pope to a future general council, and the emperor Albert had propoſed a reconciliation, yet they reſolved immediately to proceed to a new election; and in the thirty-ſeventh ſeſſion, which was held on the 22d of the ſame month, they decreed, that the election ſhould be made in the council by the cardinal of Arles, and thirty-two other eccleſiaſtics, whether prelates, prieſts, or deacons; that the election ſhould not be valid, unleſs two thirds of the electors concurred; and that the perſon elected ſhould ſwear to be-
f lieve and maintain the catholic faith, and to obſerve and execute the decrees of the councils of Conſtance and Baſil. The thirty-two electors being accordingly nominated in the thirty-eighth ſeſſion, which was held on the 27th of October, they entered the place aſſigned for the conclave; and nine days after, upon a ſcrutiny, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, was found to be duly elected. This prince, five years before, had reſigned his dominions to his two ſons, and, with ſix of the nobles, had aſſumed the habit of a pilgrim, and had choſen a moſt elegant retreat at Ripallia, upon the banks of the lake of Geneva. At their earnest intreaties he at length submitted; and assuming the name of Felix V. laid aside his beard and pilgrim's habit, and being dressed in the pontifical ornaments, was consecrated in the church of the monastery of St. Maurice, on the 17th of December. Eugenius, upon hearing of the intrusion of Felix, thought proper to strengthen his own party by a new creation of cardinals: accordingly in the general council and public consistory, be nominated seventeen from the different nations of Europe, two of whom were Greeks, who had continued in Italy after the conclusion of the union. a b

Frederic III. is elected emperor. A. D. 1440.

About this time the emperor Albert having died in Hungary, the following year the electors, being assembled at Frankfort, chose Frederic, duke of Austria, as his successor. The legates of the council at Basil appeared at that diet, and intreated the new emperor and the German princes to renounce the neutrality, and acknowledge Felix; but the Germans still adhered to their former resolutions, and declared that they would endeavour to procure the peace of the church. Mean while the fathers at Basil in the fortieth session, which was held on the 25th of February, published the consent of Felix, and ordered all christians to yield him obedience. That their new pope might come to Basil, with some appearance of dignity, they granted him a power to create nine cardinals, even before his coronation; nevertheless they found fault with his bull, appointing the cardinal of Arles legate à latere and president of the council, and ordered it to be erased from the registers, and to be drawn up in other terms. Eugenius in the mean time, in a public session held on the 21st of March at Florence, denounced an anathema against the duke of Savoy and all his adherents, as heretics and schismatics, if they did not repent within fifty days. The fathers at Basil, in their forty-first session, held on the 21st of July, condemned this sentence of Eugenius as scandalous, schismatical, and heretical, and prohibited any one, under severe penalties, from receiving or publishing it. The next day Felix, who a few weeks before had arrived at Basil, was ordained bishop by the cardinal of Arles, and afterwards crowned with great solemnity. In their forty-second session, which was held on the 5th of August, they ordained, that, for the support of Felix and his court, the fifth penny of the real value of all benefices, both secular and regular, should be paid to his collectors for five years, and for five years more the tenth penny, under pain of suspension and interdict. In favour of Germany they exempted all benefices that did not exceeed five marks of silver, and allowed, that if any nation found themselves aggrieved by the above tax, they might make a composition with Felix. Soon after, in a general congregation, they published a long letter, addressed to all the faithful, supporting, by many arguments, the authority of a council above a pope, and urging them to yield obedience to Felix [y] (M). c d

During these proceedings in the western parts of Europe, the Greek emperor having returned to Constantinople, the clergy, the monks, and the rest of that city, refused to celebrate divine service with those who had returned from Italy, or to mention them in their prayers, which caused great confusion in that church, and occasioned a delay in electing the patriarch, none being found who would accept of that dignity [z]. Other authors relate, that, by the persuasions of Mark of Ephesus, who never assented to the propositions concluded upon at Florence, the Greeks would not accept of the union; and that even those, who had been in Italy, quickly renounced the articles to which they had assented in the œcumenical council, notwithstanding the endeavours of cardinal Condelmero, who had been sent as legate to Constantinople [a]. The metropolitan of Russia, who had been created a cardinal by Eugenius, upon his return was likewise treated with indignity, and imprisoned at Moscow [b]. Mean while Eugenius, having received an accusation against his general, cardinal Vitelleschi, that he had entered into a secret treaty with the duke of Milan, and intended to surprize Florence, and seize the pontificate, he sent orders to the governor of the castle of St. Angelo to entice him within the fortress, and to detain him a prisoner. He was accordingly surprised, but, endeavouring to defend himself, he received some wounds that occasioned his death. His successor was Lewis, archbishop of Florence, and patriarch of Aquileia, who having de- e f

The Jacobines in Egypt embrace the Roman faith;

ABOUT this time an abbot arriving at Florence, from the patriarch of the Jacobines in Egypt, to treat of an union, he was heard in a general congregation on the laſt of Auguſt; and, after ſeveral other conferences, a decree was drawn up and publiſhed in the twenty-ninth ſeſſion, held on the 5th of February, containing an expoſition of the Roman faith, which, by a public inſtrument written in Arabic and Latin, the abbot accepted, and received in the name of the patriarch and all the Jacobines [d]. Soon after Eugenius ſent legates to the diet, which was convoked at Mentz, to conſult about means to terminate the ſchiſm. At this aſſembly likewiſe arrived the cardinal of Arles, and two other new cardinals of Felix;
b but the princes declared that they would not acknowledge the cardinals, nor admit the cardinal of Arles as legate à latere, to which dignity he pretended. After long diſputes, the deputies from Baſil at length conſented to drop their pretenſions, and to act only as legates of the council. Both parties were then heard by the diet for ſeveral days alternately; but as they propoſed no means of union, the diet, together with the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the king of France, and other princes, reſolved that, to procure the peace of the church, a general council ought to be convoked in ſome other city than Baſil or Florence, and if either of the popes refuſed to name the place, the emperor ſhould appoint ſix cities in Germany and ſix in France, one of which ſhould be choſen for the place of the council, which ſhould abſolutely meet on the firſt of Auguſt of the following year.

c THE council of Baſil, after the return of their deputies, held their forty-third ſeſſion on the firſt of July, in which they publiſhed a decree, appointing the celebration of the feaſt of the viſitation of the bleſſed virgin. They had warm diſputes for a long time among themſelves about the form of this decree. As the firſt decree for this feſtival was made by Boniface IX. during the grand ſchiſm, and was never received by thoſe who followed the antipope, ſome of the members propoſed that the bull ſhould now be publiſhed in the name of Felix, with the approbation of the ſacred council, or, at leaſt, with the addition of the words, pope Felix preſiding; but the other party prevailed, that the decree ſhould be publiſhed in the name of the ſynod alone. About the ſame time Eugenius received a letter from which is alſo received by the Abiſſinians.
d an Ethiopian abbot ſettled at Jeruſalem, profeſſing the ſubjection of his church to that of Rome, and informing him that the emperor of Abiſſinia, commonly called Preſter John, propoſed to ſend ambaſſadors to the council of Florence, not with an intention to diſpute, but to receive the judgment of the pope in matters of faith [e]. In conſequence of this letter, Eugenius, in the thirtieth ſeſſion, which was held on the 24th of April, transferred the council, with the conſent of the members, from Florence to Rome, to be continued in the Lateran church within fifteen days after his return to that city. The fathers at Baſil took an occaſion from this new tranſlation to accuſe the pope, alledging, that he had returned to Rome to prevent his being compelled to celebrate a council in Germany. Soon after they celebrated the forty-fourth ſeſſion on the 9th of Auguſt, in which they publiſhed a decree, concerning the entire reſtitution of all thoſe who had been robbed of their benefices on ace count of the council, ordering the uſurpers and detainers to be expelled by the aſſiſtance of the ſecular arm.

A. D. 1442.

The pope and the council of Baſil ſend deputies to the diet of Frankfort.

MEAN while the cardinal of Arles and two cardinals of Felix appeared as their deputies at the diet held at Frankfort, where the emperor preſided. Frederic, propoſing to go to Aix-la Chapelle to receive the German crown, appointed ſeveral biſhops to hear the arguments of the deputies of both parties. Upon his return, the diet finding that the deputies only renewed the arguments uſed the former year at Mentz, reſolved ſtill to adhere to the neutrality, and propoſed the celebration of a council in ſome other city than Baſil or Florence. The emperor a few weeks afterwards arriving in the neighbourhood of Baſil, after ſeveral conferences prevailed with the fathers to agree to a tranſlation of the council. He
f then entered the city, and had an interview with Felix, to conſult of the means to procure the peace of the church [f]; and departing after three days, Felix likewiſe quitted the city,

(N) This year cardinal Branda made an attempt at Milan to aboliſh the office of St. Ambroſe, and to introduce the Roman. To forward his deſign he expelled the Ciſtertian monks, and introduced the Carthuſians; but the citizens complaining to the duke, the Ciſtertians were reſtored. The cardinal nevertheleſs, having got into his poſſeſſion the book of the Ambroſian rites, ſuppoſed to be written by that ſaint's own hand, and carefully preſerved in the church of St. Thecla, on Chriſtmas-day he cauſed divine ſervice to be celebrated according to the Roman office; which proceeding ſo exaſperated the citizens, that they ran with torches to his houſe, and threatened to ſet it on fire, if he did not reſtore the book. The cardinal, greatly terrified with their menaces, threw the manuſcript from the window, and next day fled from Milan (8).

and went to Lauſanne, on pretence of re-eſtabliſhing his health, promiſing to return to the council in the ſpring. Eugenius in ſome meaſure likewiſe complied with the demands of the emperor, declaring, that, tho' to doubt the authority of the council of Florence was to oppoſe the catholic faith, yet in regard to the German princes, upon his arrival at Rome he would aſſemble a greater number of prelates to conſult whether it was expedient to celebrate another council, and in the mean time would ſend his legates into Germany. a

The pope recovers ſome of the patrimony, and A. D. 1443.

THE pope about the ſame time ſent cardinal Julian as his legate into Hungary, to mediate a peace betwixt the party that adhered to the infant, ſon of the late emperor Albert, and the other faction, who had conferred their crown upon the king of Poland; and to excite them both againſt the Turks, who were then beſieging Belgrade with an immenſe army. He likewiſe denounced an anathema againſt Francis Sforza, who had uſurped ſeveral places in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; but this cenſure being deſpiſed by his adverſary, he had recourſe to temporal arms, and in a ſhort time recovered the territory of Picenum [g]. In the beginning of the following ſpring, he left Florence and proceeded to Siena, where he continued ſix months. During his reſidence in this city, Alphonſus king of Arragon, who the year before had conquered Naples, propoſed a reconciliation with him, on condition that he confirmed his new conqueſts. The king at the ſame time was negociating with Felix, who on condition that he adhered to the council of Baſil, promiſed to confirm his adoption by queen Jane, and the title of his kingdom, and to give him 200,000 crowns to recover the patrimony of the church. Alphonſus accepted of theſe conditions; but his ambaſſadors in the mean time obtaining better terms from Eugenius, he again ſtarted new difficulties with Felix, and, on the 14th of June, concluded a treaty with the pope, who offered to give him the kingdom of Naples with the ſame forms and rights as had been uſed by former popes, and to abſolve him from the payment of all the money which he owed to the apoſtolic chamber, on condition that Alphonſus took the oath of allegiance to him, reſtored the towns belonging to the church which he had ſeized, and ſent ſix gallies againſt the Turks, and 4000 horſe againſt Francis Sforza. Some other articles were agreed upon, with regard to the liberty of eccleſiaſtics, and the privileges of the ſubjects, as they had been ſettled by William II. The pope likewiſe legitimated Ferdinand, the king's natural ſon; but to prevent his being reproached with ſuch a conceſſion, he ſtipulated that the bull ſhould not be publiſhed during his life [h]. Immediately after the concluſion of this treaty, Alphonſus publiſhed a letter, declaring, that he acknowleged Eugenius as the undoubted vicar of Chriſt, and ordering all his ſubjects to yield him obedience. He likewiſe wrote to the prelates of his dominions who were at Baſil, deſiring them to quit that city; and according to the acts of Patricius, he, together with the Venetians, Florentines, and other Italians, exhorted the emperor to agree to the celebration of a general council at the Lateran. b c d

THE council of Baſil in the mean time ſolicited the return of Felix; but he replied, that he found it more for the advantage of his cauſe to reſide at Geneva or Lauſanne, and at the ſame time entreated them to relax the decree againſt the creation of cardinals. After much diſpute, the fathers at laſt granted his requeſt, and in the forty-fifth ſeſſion, which was held on the 13th of May, they decreed, that another general council ſhould be celebrated after three years in the city of Lyons, which city had been choſen by Felix, to whom they granted a power of ſhortening the term. Nevertheleſs, they ordained that the council of Baſil was not thereby diſſolved, but that they intended to continue it in that city, provided the magiſtrates did not violate the ſafe conduct which they had formerly granted. This is generally reckoned the laſt ſeſſion of the council of Baſil, both the printed and manuſcript acts concluding at this period. Nevertheleſs, ſome prelates remained five years longer both at Baſil and Lauſanne, altho' there is ſcarce any author that takes the leaſt notice of their proceedings. Several of their decrees tended to remove the groſs corruptions and abuſes that at that time deformed the Chriſtian religion; but, in their proceedings againſt Eugenius, they ſeem to have been influenced more by faction and reſentment than by motives of piety. e

Not long after Eugenius proceeded from Siena to Rome; but, inſtead of being received with acclamation, the day after his arrival the people threatened to mutiny, as the taxes had lately been doubled, and a new duty laid upon wine. To appeaſe their murmurs the pope called out in the ſtreet, declaring that he aboliſhed the late exactions, and a few days after he wrote to the princes of Europe, informing them of his intention to celebrate a general council in the Lateran church [i]. f

A cruſade preached againſt the Turks. A. D. 1444.

HAVING this year ordered a cruſade to be preached againſt the Turks, many volunteers went into Hungary from France and Germany, by whoſe aſſiſtance Uladiſlaus gained a ſignal victory over the infidels, and purſued them as far as the confines of Thrace, gaining ſeveral other advantages over them. On the news of theſe ſucceſſes, great preparations were made by the pope in Italy to carry on the war, and in conjunction with the Venetians, a Genoese, and the duke of Burgundy, he sent a fleet of seventy gallies to the Hellespont, under the command of cardinal Condelmero, to prevent the infidels from receiving any succours from Asia. Amurath being informed of the great preparations against him in Europe, and hearing likewise of the revolt of some provinces in Asia, prevailed with the king of Hungary to agree to a truce for ten years; after the ratifying of which he passed the Hellespont, and marched against the rebels. Eugenius was greatly offended with the king for agreeing to any treaty with the infidels, and absolved him from the oath, which he affirmed he was not at liberty to take without his permission. Cardinal Julian likewise insisting that now was the time for extirpating the Turks from Europe, Uladislaus was prevailed upon to renew the war, and marched with his army into Lower Mæsia; but Amurath

Genoeſe,

b having bribed the Genoese to transport his army over the Hellespont, attacked the Hungarians at Varna, and gained an entire victory, Uladislaus and cardinal Julian being among the number of the slain [k]. Eugenius in the mean time sent deputies to the diet of Nuremberg; but, tho' others appeared likewise for Felix, the German princes still adhered to their former resolution, and proposed a council to be held either in Germany or France. About this time Abdalla, archbishop of Edessa, arriving at Rome, in the name of the Syrian patriarch and nation, to treat of an union, the pope celebrated the thirty-first session in the Lateran, in which a decree was published, explaining the three doctrines in which the Syrians differed from the Roman church, namely, concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, and the two natures and two wills in Christ. This decree was accepted in the c public session by the Syrian deputy, in the name of his nation.

THE following year Æneas Sylvius arrived at Rome as an ambassador from the emperor, and in an elegant discourse, having asked pardon for what he had done and written against Eugenius at Basil, he explained the purport of his embassy; which was to desire the celebration of a council in Germany. The pope refused to grant his request, and soon after, deputies arriving from the Maronites and Chaldeans in Cyprus, professing their submission to the Roman church, in a general congregation he published a decree in their behalf. These different sects of eastern Christians had been prevailed upon to send their deputies to Rome by the archbishop of Colosse, or Rhodes, who had been sent into the east by Eugenius, to sollicit their submission to the Roman see; however, the authority of the apostolic see was not there-
d by greatly enlarged, but the vanity of the pope was gratified by the empty ceremony. While Eugenius was receiving the submission of the Maronites in Cyprus, his authority was opposed by the catholics in the same island, the king not only refusing to grant the archbishopric of Nicosia to the person appointed by the pope, but even expelling him the island, and throwing the pope's nuncio into prison. However, soon after, at the sollicitation of the master of the knights of Rhodes, the king admitted the archbishop, and set the nuncio at liberty [l].

The emperor sends an embassy to the pope; A D. 1445.

ABOUT this time, the pope having deposed the electors of Cologn and Triers, in resentment for their adherence to the council of Basil, the other electors, offended with his pro-e ceeding, assembled at Frankfort, and entered into a treaty of union, that, if Eugenius did not annul the sentence of deposition, abolish the grievous taxes with which he oppressed Germany, and acknowledge the supremacy of councils, according to the decrees of that of Constance, they would then adhere to Felix. They desired the emperor to accede to their treaty; but he refused, and only consented to petition the pope to reverse the sentence. Æneas Sylvius accordingly having represented to the pope the danger of a general schism in Germany, he agreed to revoke his decree, and sent two legates to another diet, held in the same city, in the month of September, with a full authority to grant every thing to the Germans that might facilitate the union, without prejudice to the apostolic see. The fathers, who still remained at Basil, likewise sent their deputies to this diet, and before their departure they declared in a public assembly, that they would convoke a general council, and would f transfer themselves to whatever city the emperor and electors, or their ambassadors, should name in the approaching assembly. Great disputes arose in the diet upon several points, but chiefly with regard to the treaty of union betwixt the electors, which the legates insisted upon being annulled, before they would begin the negotiations. The German princes refusing absolutely to comply with their demand, Æneas Sylvius proposed some articles as a medium, by which the interests of Germany and the pretensions of the pope might be reconciled. These propositions were embraced by the diet, who appointed ambassadors to proceed to Rome, to obtain the approbation of the pope. The ambassadors, upon their arrival, were received with great honour, and three days afterwards had an audience in a private consistory, where Æneas Sylvius, in the name of the rest, proposed the four articles agreed g to in the diet; first, that a general council should be convoked, and the place and time for its meeting determined; that the pope should confirm by a bull the declaration of his le-gates concerning the pre-eminence and authority of general councils; ſhould redreſs the grievances of the German nation; and laſtly, ſhould revoke what had been done to the prejudice of the two electors. The reconciliation being effected in a few other conferences, during the abſence of Eugenius, who was ſick, the ambaſſadors were admitted into his bed-chamber, and, after they had made their ſubmiſſion to him as pope, he delivered the bull into the hands of Æneas, by which he confirmed a great many things concerning benefices and annates which had been decreed by the council of Baſil after the ſchiſm, abſolving all thoſe who had adhered to that council after its diſſolution, if they returned to the obedience of the apoſtolic ſee within ſix months. He promiſed to convoke a general council within ten months, provided he could obtain the conſent of the ſovereigns of Europe; if not, he offered to aſſemble another within eighteen months in a city that ſhould be judged convenient. He acknowledged the authority of councils truly œcumenical, without declaring whether they were ſuperior to a pope or not, and he received that of Conſtance in the ſame manner as it had been received by Martin V. and his ſucceſſors; and laſtly, he promiſed to redreſs the grievances of the German nation, and to re-eſtabliſh the archbiſhops and electors [m]. Eugenius ſurvived the publication of this bull but ſixteen days, and died on the 23d of February, in the ſixteenth year of his pontificate. He is ſaid, by Platina, to have been a great patron of ſchools and learned men, though not very learned himſelf; to have favoured the monks, to whom he granted many privileges; but he is accuſed of inconſtancy, and a love for war [n].

Nicolas V. is elected,

On the eleventh day after the death of Eugenius, eighteen cardinals entered the conclave, and unanimouſly choſe Thomas of Sarzana, ſo called from a little town in the territory of Lucca where he was born. He had been created a cardinal a few months before by Eugenius, upon his return from the laſt diet of Frankfort, and is ſaid at firſt to have refuſed the pontifical dignity; but, at the intreaty of all the cardinals, he ſubmitted, and aſſuming the name of Nicolas V. in memory of cardinal Albergati, who had been his great patron, and in whoſe family he had lived ſeveral years [o], he was conſecrated on the 16th of March. While the cardinals were in the conclave, one Stephen Porcaro, a Roman knight, aſſembled ſeveral citizens in one of the churches, and exhorted them to aſſert their liberty, or, at leaſt, to limit the power of their governors; but the archbiſhop of Benevento oppoſing his propoſal, the ſedition was prevented. Eugenius having for ſome time before his death been engaged with the duke of Milan, and the king of Naples, in a war againſt the Florentines, Alphonſus had arrived with his army at Tivoli, on his way to Tuſcany; but, hearing of the pope's death, he deliberated whether he ſhould advance or return. At length, Nicolas having ſent a cardinal to Ferrara to treat of a general peace, Alphonſus, the duke of Milan, the Venetians, and the Florentines, ſent their deputies thither; but their conferences were broke off by the ſudden death of the duke of Milan. Nicolas in the mean time ſent cardinal Carvajal as his legate into Germany, to notify his election to the emperor, who aſſembled the ſtates of the empire at Aſchaffemburgh, where the neutrality was finally aboliſhed, and Nicolas acknowledged as lawful pope [p], the emperor ſoon after publiſhing a decree for that purpoſe. About the ſame time the king of France, who likewiſe deſired to acknowlege Nicolas, held a congreſs at Lyons, at which were preſent the archbiſhops of Cologn and Triers, the deputies of the other electors, with thoſe of the kings of England and Sicily, and the cardinal of Arles, with others from Felix. After ſome conferences they proceeded to Geneva, where Felix was; and, with his conſent, compoſed ſome articles, which, if Nicolas would agree to, Felix promiſed to abdicate.

A. D. 1448.

Mean while Nicholas received an embaſſy from Poland, deſiring a tax of ten thouſand florins to be raiſed upon the eccleſiaſtics for a war againſt the Tartars; the hundredth penny was likewiſe demanded, and a remiſſion of St. Peter's pence, and the right of conferring all the benefices in Poland. The pope only granted their firſt demand, and allowed the king to ſupply ninety vacancies in the province of Gneſna. Soon after he confirmed, by a bull, ſome articles that had been agreed upon betwixt his legate and the emperor, with regard to the method of proviſion of vacant benefices in the empire (O); and, being informed of the diſturbances in Bohemia, he appointed the ſame cardinal as his legate in that kingdom. The cardinal, upon his arrival at Prague, was received with great reſpect by Mainard of New-

Its regulations have not been exactly obſerved by the following popes, ſince, upon the complaint of the ſtates of the empire, the emperors have always promiſed, in their capitulations, not to allow the concordat to be violated. The vacant benefices in Germany at this day are conferred according to its regulations, and the biſhoprics of Toul, Metz, and Verdun, have been comprehended in it by particular bulls (9).

a houſe, the adminiſtrator of the kingdom, and by the clergy and univerſity. The ſtates of the kingdom being then aſſembled, the Huſſites, who were the moſt powerful party, demanded of the legate to confirm the compactata concluded at Baſil, and to confirm the archbiſhopric of Prague upon Rockyſanus. The legate, refuſing to grant theſe two points, was immediately obliged to quit the kingdom; and Mainard, being accuſed of an intention to deſtroy their privilegess, and ſubject them to the emperor and the pope, they formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and admitted George Podiebrad, the chief of the Huſſites, into Prague; who, having impriſoned Mainard, aſſumed the adminiſtration of the government, in which he was afterwards confirmed by the young king Ladiſlaus. During theſe proceedings in Bohemia, the deputies from the king of France and the other princes arrived at Rome, with the articles
b agreed to at Geneva. Nicolas received them with great honour, but refuſed to confirm all the articles. However he agreed to ſeveral of them, which being afterwards preſented to Felix, he conſented to abdicate.

His legate is obliged to quit Bohemia.

THE remains of the council of Baſil, which had been obliged to quit that city and retire to Lauſanne, determined to ſhew their authority in terminating the ſchiſm; accordingly, on the 23d of April, they publiſhed a decree, permitting Felix to reſign the pontificate, and, as a grateful acknowledgement for the aſſiſtance he had given to the perſecuted church, they created him a cardinal and biſhop of Subino, and perpetual vicar and legate of the apoſtolic ſee in the territories of the duke of Savoy; that he ſhould enjoy the next rank to the pope, ſhould uſe every where enſigns of his legation, and ſhould not be obliged to apc pear perſonally at the court of Rome or general council. They then ordered all Chriſtians to obey Nicolas, after which they diſſolved the council. This news was received at Rome with great joy, the people the following night riding through the ſtreets with torches, and calling out, Long live Nicolas. The pope likewiſe ordered ſupplications in the Vatican, and on the 16th of June, publiſhed three bulls; by the firſt of which he confirmed all promotions, elections, or ſettlements whatever, formerly approved by Felix, or the councils of Baſil and Lauſanne; by the ſecond he reſtored all thoſe who had been deprived of their dignities or benefices by Eugenius for adhering to the council of Baſil; and by the third he declared null and void all that had been done and written againſt Felix and his adherents, and ordered all ſuch writings to be aboliſhed, and expunged from the regiſters of d Eugenius and all other places. As the duke of Milan had died without a will, or any lawful heir, his dominions became immediately the ſubject of diſpute, and, notwithſtanding the utmoſt endeavours of Nicolas to procure a peace, hoſtilities ſtill continued betwixt the Venetians and Francis Sforza, the laſt of whom, having married the natural daughter of the late duke, pretended to be his heir. Francis, having ſtormed Placenza, and obliged the Venetians to agree to a peace, turned his arms againſt the Milaneſe; and in the beginning of the following year, having obliged the city of Milan to ſurrender, he was ſoon after acknowleged as duke [q].

A. D. 1449. Felix abdicates, and the council of Baſil is diſſolved.

NICOLAS was chiefly deſirous of pacifying Italy, that the pilgrims, who ſhould viſit Rome on account of the jubilee, might meet with no interruption. In conſequence of his bull
e for that purpoſe, this feſtival began to be celebrated at Rome, with great ſolemnity at Chriſtmas. Immenſe crouds of people, of both ſexes, and all ranks, arrived at that city during the whole year; the pope, who, with his cardinals, viſited the ſacred places almoſt every day, being obliged frequently to ſhorten the term of fifteen days viſitation appointed for foreigners; by that means to leſſen the great concourſe of ſtrangers, who were frequently trampled to death [r]. Towards the end of the jubilee, Æneas Sylvius arrived at Rome from Naples, and in a public conſiſtory declared the intentions of the emperor to come the following year to Italy to receive the imperial crown. He likewiſe deſired the pope to agree to celebrate a general council in Germany, and informed his holineſs, that, at Naples, he
f had concluded a treaty of marriage betwixt the emperor and Eleonora, the niece of Alphonſus, and ſiſter to the king of Portugal. The pope, having received a bad impreſſion of the deſigns of the emperor, did not ſeem to reliſh his journey into Italy; but, Æneas Sylvius diſpelling his apprehenſions, he agreed to the propoſal of the emperor, and created Æneas biſhop of Siena [s]. The biſhop, ſoon after his return to Germany, was ſent by the emperor into Bohemia, as his ambaſſador to the ſtates, who had aſſembled at Beneſchaw, and threatened to elect another king, as Frederic had refuſed to part with his pupil Ladiſlaus. Æneas, by his eloquence, had ſuch an influence upon the ſtates, that they not only declared themſelves ſatisfied with the proceedings of the emperor, but appointed ſeveral nobles of their kingdom to accompany him in his journey to Italy [t].

ſame purpoſe he ſent another legate into Poland, ordering that every one ſhould put the half of that money which he would have expended in his journey to Rome into a public coffer, and that the half of the money ſo collected ſhould be given to the king as a ſubſidy for the war againſt the Turks; that one half of what remained ſhould be given to the queen to be beſtowed in dowries to poor maidens, and the other half ſent to the pope to repair the churches of Rome [u]. Upon the murmurs of the people, he afterwards reduced his ſhare to an eighth of the whole. Being likewiſe informed of the death of Amurath, emperor of the Turks, and the ſucceſſion of his ſon Mohammed II. a young prince of great ambition, and an implacable enemy of the Chriſtians, he wrote to Conſtantinople, reproaching the Greeks with the breach of the union concluded at Florence, and requiring them to abandon the ſchiſm, if they expected any aſſiſtance from the weſtern princes [w]. The Greeks, notwithſtanding the calamities with which they were threatened, ſeem to have had no inclination to unite with the Roman church; for this ſame year they wrote to the Bohemian Huſſites, commending them for rejecting the Roman innovations, and preſerving the ancient faith, in which they exhorted them to perſevere; at the ſame time deſiring them to unite with them, not according to the pretended and erroneous union concluded at Florence, but according to the immutable decree delivered by the fathers, and obſerved by the Greeks [x].

The emperor enters Italy, and A. D. 1452.

MEAN while the emperor, having ſettled the affairs of Germany, entered Italy with the young king of Bohemia, and a large body of nobility; who, to prevent giving umbrage to the pope and the ſtates of Italy, came with a very ſmall military eſcort. He was received every where with great honour, and at Siena he was joined by the young empreſs, who had arrived by ſea from Liſbon. Proceeding with her to Rome, he arrived at that city on the 9th of March, where he was received by thirteen cardinals, all the clergy and magiſtrates, with great ceremony, and conducted to the ſteps of St. Peter, where the pope waited for him in his pontifical ornaments. Nicolas, a few days after, by the plenitude of his power, conferred upon him the crown of Lombardy, and, on the 16th of March, he was ſolemnly crowned emperor of the Romans, after taking the uſual oath to the pope. The empreſs being likewiſe crowned, Frederic proceeded with her to Naples to viſit her uncle Alphonſus, who entertained them for two weeks with great magnificence. Upon his return he created the marquis of Ette duke of Modena and Reggio, at Ferrara; and, proceeding from thence to Venice, was received with great magnificence by that republic, and ſoon after returned to Germany.

FREDERIC, during his reſidence at Rome, propoſed a general expedition againſt the Turks, for the aſſiſtance of the Greeks againſt whom Mohammed was making immenſe preparations [y]. This motion, however, produced no good effect; for, excepting a few auxiliaries from the Venetians and Genoeſe, the Greeks received no aſſiſtance from any other European ſtates, and the Turkiſh emperor advancing againſt Conſtantinople in the beginning of April, with an army of 250,000 men, and a fleet of 320 great and ſmall ſhips, on the 29th of May took that city by ſtorm, killing 40,000 men, and taking 60,000 captives, and thereby putting an end to the Greek empire [z]. After the city had been pillaged for three days, Mohammed publiſhed an edict, promiſing his protection to the Chriſtians who ſhould return to Conſtantinople. He not only allowed them to elect a new patriarch, but, according to the cuſtom obſerved by the emperors, preſented the perſon elected with a golden paſtoral ſtaff enriched with diamonds, and conducted him, with acclamations, to his palace. The pope, upon hearing of the loſs of Conſtantinople, renewed his exhortations to the Chriſtian princes to unite their arms againſt the infidels. For this purpoſe, the following year, a diet was held at Ratisbon, at which was preſent the duke of Burgundy, who was very zealous for the expedition; but, the emperor not ſeeming to intereſt himſelf with warmth in the deſign, nothing material was effected [a]. It was only agreed to hold another diet at Frankfort in the month of September, to apply to the French for a body of horſe, and to requeſt the Italians to fit out a fleet for Greece and Aſia. Almoſt all the kings and princes of Europe were invited to ſend their deputies to the diet at Frankfort. In the mean time, one Simonetus, an Auguſtine friar, by his frequent exhortations, at length prevailed with Sforza, the Venetians and Florentines, to conclude a peace, which was afterwards ratified at Naples by Alphonſus, and Dominicus Capranius, cardinal of the holy croſs, an alliance being likewiſe concluded betwixt all the ſtates of Italy, except the Genoeſe, for twenty years, each party agreeing to refer their future diſputes to the deciſion of the pope, and not to renew hoſtilities againſt one another, unleſs authorized by an apoſtolic bull [b]. During the negociations at Naples, the diet was celebrated at Frankfort, and, by the perſuaſions of Æneas Sylvius the aſſembly agreed to grant 10,000 horſe and 32,000 foot to the Hungarians; after

He was at great pains and expence in procuring the ancient Greek authors, and cauſing them to be tranſlated into the Latin tongue; and likewiſe ſent learned men into all the kingdoms of Europe, to ſearch the monaſteries and churches for the manuſcripts of the Latin authors [c].

The Germans promiſe to ſend auxiliaries to Hungary. A. D. 1455. Their march is prevented by the death of he pope

A FEW days after the death of Nicolas, the eighteen cardinals who were at Rome entered the conclave, and, according to Æneas Sylvius, the greateſt number of them propoſed to b elect cardinal Beſſarion, one of the Greeks who had remained in Italy after the council of Florence; but the archbiſhop of Avignon objecting to him as a neophyte, or new convert, and urging the danger of a ſchiſm, he was ſet aſide, and Alphonſo Borgia, a cardinal prieſt, was elected, who took the name of Calixtus III. Alphonſo was born of a noble family, at Sativa in Spain, and having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by procuring the abdication of Ægidius, the ſucceſſor of Peter de Luna, he was created biſhop of Valentia by Martin V. Eugenius IV. promoted him to the cardinalate for his ſervices in procuring a peace betwixt him and Alphonſus king of Naples, and at his promotion to the pontificate he had now entered the 77th year of his age, and was very decrepit. However, immediately after his coronation, he engaged by a ſolemn vow to make war upon the Turks, and to execute that deſign, acted with c great ſpirit and vigour. He ſent legates and preachers into the different provinces of Europe, to excite the Chriſtians to a cruſade againſt the infidels, impoſed a tythe upon all eccleſiaſtical perſons of whatever dignity for the ſupport of that war, wrote to the king of Perſia and to the king of the Tartars to attack the Turkiſh provinces in Aſia, and, ordering ſixteen gallies to be built and fitted out at Rome, ſent them under the command of cardinal Lewis, patriarch of Aquileia, to attack the iſlands and maritime places in the Archipelago. In conſequence of his ardour, ſeveral princes of Europe likewiſe expreſſed their fondneſs for that expedition. The king of Naples and the duke of Burgundy took the croſs, promiſing either to go in perſon, or to ſend a body of troops againſt the infidels. The emperor about the ſame time ſent Æneas Sylvius to Rome to congratulate the pope upon his promotion, and to d promiſe his aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. This embaſſy, however, was not without great oppoſition from the German princes, who inſiſted that the pope ought to confirm the concordata that had been ratified by his predeceſſor, before the emperor yielded him obedience; but their remonſtrances were over-ruled by Æneas.

He acts with great vigour againſt the Turks.

IN the mean time the king of Naples and Arragon, inſtead of fulfilling his vow againſt the Turks, quarreled with Calixtus, whom he did not find ſo compliable with his inclinations as he expected. As the pope had formerly been his counſellor, and had obtained the cardinalate by his intereſt, the king imagined that his demands would meet with no denial, and therefore deſired not only the eventual inveſtiture of Naples for his natural ſon Ferdinand, but alſo the poſſeſſion of the march of Ancona, and ſeveral other places in the eccleſiae ſtical ſtate. The pope refuſing to grant theſe demands, Alphonſus conceived a great reſentment againſt him, which continued during his whole life [d]. Calixtus, notwithſtanding the enmity of the king of Naples, did not abate in his zeal againſt the Turks; and, in the beginning of the following year, ordered proceſſions to be made, and prayers to be uſed, over all Europe againſt the infidels, with the offer of large indulgencies. Soon after he had the ſatisfaction to find that his endeavours were not altogether unſucceſsful; for though the Chriſtian princes gave little attention to the cruſade, yet John Capiſtran, a Franciſcan, who had made himſelf famous by his preaching in Germany, marched from thence at the head of 40,000 cruſaders, and, joining the Hungarian army under the command of Hunniades, raiſed the ſiege of Belgrade, killing 40,000 of the enemy, and taking 200 pieces of cannon. f Not long after the pope created nine cardinals, among whom was Æneas Sylvius; and the following ſpring, having received a letter from Hungary, informing him that Mohammed had entered into an alliance with the ſoltan of Egypt, and was aſſembling an immenſe army to renew the ſiege of Belgrade, and had ſworn not to retire till he had taken the city, although he ſhould hear of the loſs of half of Aſia, he wrote to the emperor and the king of Naples, urging them to ſend ſuccours to the Hungarians.

HIS information, however, was falſe, for the Turkiſh emperor marched into Albania againſt Scanderbeg. But, if the Hungarians had been invaded, the Chriſtian princes were not at all in the humour of giving them aſſiſtance. Alphonſus king of Naples fitted out a conſiderable fleet, under pretence of joining that of the pope, but he employed it in invadg ing the territories of Genoa. The kings of Caſtile, Denmark, and Poland, allowed the pope's collectors to carry off one half only of the tax raiſed by the tythe and indulgencies, and retained the other as a ſupply againſt their particular enemies [c]. The king of France is accuſed by S. Antoninus and Æneas Sylvius of having totally miſapplied the money that was raiſed againſt the Turks. Antoninus affirms, that he ordered it to be depoſited with ſome faithful perſons, to be afterwards expended in paying the French ſoldiers that ſhould engage in the cruſade; but, in reality, he fitted out a ſmall fleet, and made a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt at Sandwich [f]. According to Æneas, the ſon of Rene duke of Anjou employed twenty-four gallies, that had been built at Avignon by the cardinal legate, in an expedition againſt the kingdom of Naples [g]. The Germans likewiſe, thinking themſelves greatly aggrieved, made loud complaints againſt the proceedings of the pope; they accuſed him of violating the concordata, and quite exhauſting the kingdom by his exceſſive taxes. Several princes and prelates had therefore propoſed to enter into a pragmatic ſanction, the chief articles of which were, that the Germans ſhould not be obliged to obey the apoſtolic ſee, and that no money ſhould be carried from thence to the court of Rome. Calixtus ordered Æneas Sylvius to juſtify his proceedings to the Germans. The cardinal accordingly wrote not only to the emperor, but to the chancellor of the archbiſhop of Mentz, anſwering particularly all the articles of their grievances. As to the exceſſive taxes, he declared that the pope had exacted no money from Germany, excepting the annates which were of great antiquity; what had been offered for the Turkiſh expedition, which indeed required vaſt ſums, he had not avariciouſly hoarded, or laviſhed in luxury, but employed in ſubſidies to Scanderbeg and the Greeks in the Archipelago, and in fitting out a fleet againſt the Turks, by which he might juſtly boaſt that he had done more for the common cauſe than all the princes of Europe beſides. By the concordata he inſiſted that the pope was not bound to confirm all elections, but only ſuch as were canonical, and that altho' by the plenitude of his power, he had a right even to ſet aſide a canonical election, yet he had not hitherto uſed that privilege; that, whatever were their grievances, to pretend to oppoſe the apoſtolic authority by any pragmatic ſanction was iniquitous, or to appeal from that ſee to a general council was abſurd, being a confounding and perverting of the whole ſtate of the catholic religion [h]. The Germans, however, ſtill remained diſſatisfied; one James Wimpheling publiſhed an anſwer to the letters of Æneas [i], and the biſhop of Wurtzburg not only took the money from the collectors, but expelled the pope's nuncios from his territories, in which proceeding he was countenanced by the archbiſhop of Mentz [k].

THE pope in the mean time ſent two other gallies to join thoſe under the command of the patriarch of Aquileia, who had recovered ſeveral iſlands from the Turks, and taken and ſunk a great many of their ſhips. About the ſame time the peace of Rome being greatly diſturbed by the family of the Urſini, who had had recourſe to arms to aſſert their right to a certain territory, Calixtus appointed his nephew Borgia governor of Rome, and general of the church forces. Soon after, being informed of the death of Alphonſus king of Naples, he immediately conferred ſeveral wealthy biſhoprics in that kingdom, which authority he durſt not uſe during the life of the king. He likewiſe declared the kingdom of Apulia vacant by his death, and to have fallen to the apoſtolic ſee, charging Ferdinand, under pain of excommunication, not to concern himſelf with it, or aſſume the name of king; and warning the princes and ſtates of the kingdom, under the ſame penalty, not to adhere to him. Ferdinand at firſt endeavoured to ſooth the mind of the pope by letters and embaſſies; but finding him inflexible, he appealed to a future council, and aſſembled an army, with which he propoſed to march to Rome; but he was quickly freed from his inveterate enemy by death, which happened to him on the 7th of Auguſt, in the third year and fourth month of his pontificate [l] (P).

He ſent cardinal Beſſarion, as his legate, to the emperor, to excite that prince to act with vigour againſt the Turks; and, after ſome heſitation, he gave the title of king to George Podiebrad, who, upon the death of Ladiſlaus, had been elected by the Bohemians; but, though he had profeſſed his obedience to b the Roman church, was ſtill ſuſpected of inclining to the Huſſites, by which ſect he had hitherto been ſupported. In the mean time Pius endeavoured to quiet the diſturbances in Italy, and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of René, duke of Anjou, formerly adopted by the queen of Naples, he confirmed the kingdom of Apulia to Ferdinand, the preſent poſſeſſor, and ſent the cardinal Urſini to perform the ceremony of his coronation [m] (R).

He gives the inveſtiture of Naples to Ferdinand.

THE following year, having appointed the prince of Colonna governor, and cardinal Cuſa legate of the city, he left Rome in order to proceed to Mantua; but before his departure, he made a decree with the conſent of the cardinals, that, if he ſhould happen to die without the city; his ſucceſſor ſhould not be choſen any where elſe than at Rome. He likewiſe left ſome cardinals, auditors of the rota, and advocates, to judge the cauſes that ſhould come before the Roman
c court in his abſence. He proceeded by ſlow journies to Corſignano, and from thence to Siena, which city he erected into a metropolitan, creating his nephew Antonio the firſt archbiſhop. While he continued at Siena, he received the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the kings of Caſtile, Portugal, and Hungary, and of the duke of Burgundy, and ſeveral German princes. The Germans complained, that he had given the title of king of Hungary to Matthias the ſon of the general Hunniades, although the barons of that kingdom had choſen the emperor. But Pius alleging that Matthias had been ſolemnly acknowledged by the ſtates, and was in poſſeſſion of the kingdom, and conſequently had a right to the title of king, which had been conferred upon him by Calixtus, the Germans ceaſed their complaints, and, together with the other ambaſſadors, yielded obedience to him as pope publicly in the church.
d The ambaſſadors from Bohemia, that they might not by their ſubmiſſion offend the party of the Calixtins, yielded obedience to the pope in a private conſiſtory. This inſtance of regard to that ſect confirmed the ſuſpicions of the catholics, that George Podiebrad had not acted ſincerely in abjuring its doctrines: the ambaſſadors of the Sileſians, who had proteſted againſt his election, now declared to the pope that they would not obey him, and demanded the aſſiſtance of his holineſs to protect the catholic religion in their province. Pius promiſed to them to write to the king to ceaſe his hoſtilities againſt them, and to remit all diſputes concerning religion to the apoſtolic ſee, declaring that, if he refuſed to obey, he would uſe other means to ſecure their religion [n]. He then proceeded from Siena to Florence, and from thence, by Bologna and Ferrara, to Mantua, where, a few days after his arrival, he opened the convention on the 1ſt of June, and, in a ſpeech from his throne, complained of the neglect of the princes who had omitted to ſend their plenipotentiaries to the aſſembly. Ambaſſadors had arrived from the deſpot of Morea, and from Cyprus, Rhodes, Lesbos, Albania, Epirus, and ſome ſtates on the coaſts of Illyria; but they all came to requeſt ſuccours, excepting the Raguſans, who offered auxiliaries againſt the infidels. The pope, having quieted the diſputes about precedence by a decree, declaring that the ſuperiority or inferiority of places ſhould give no honour or diſhonour to thoſe who occupied them, then gave audience to the duke of Cleves, ambaſſador from the duke of Burgundy. Though the duke at firſt refuſed to promiſe any ſuccours, and inſiſted much upon the impracticability of a general cruſade, as ſeveral of the chief powers in Europe were engaged in private quarrels; nevertheleſs, at the preſſing inſtances of the pope, he ſtipulated 2000 horſe and 4000 foot, to be maintained at the expence of the duke of Burgundy during the continuance of the war. Ambaſſadors likewiſe arrived from the Florentines, Sienneſe, Luccheſe, and Bologneſe, offering ſuccours on their part: the duke of Modena, excuſing himſelf on account of ſickneſs, ſent his brother, who, in his name, offered 300,000 crowns for the expedition; the duke of Milan came perſonally to the aſſembly, and ſtipulated his quota of auxiliaries: the Genoeſe, though they durſt not concern themſelves in a public manner, as they were then under the dominion of the king of France, yet promiſed in private, to concur with the Italian ſtates. The ambaſſador of the king of Naples took an oath in his maſter's name, whereby he promiſed to engage perſonally in the cruſade, and the Venetians ſent their ambaſſadors, and promiſed to contribute largely to the expedition, if the other Chriſtian princes would engage not to deſert them during the continuance of the war. It was then unanimouſly decreed, that the war ſhould be carried on, both by ſea and land, by an army of 50,000 men, and a fleet of 40 gallies and eight ſmaller ſhips; that the clergy of Italy ſhould pay the tythe of their revenues for three years, the laity the thirtieth, and the Jews the twentieth of their whole effects. Soon after ambaſſadors arrived from the king of France, and from René pretender to the crown of Naples, who refuſed to engage in the cruſade, unleſs the Engliſh would conclude a peace, but complained of the favour ſhewn by the pope to Ferdinand in prejudice of the right of René. Pius, in juſtification of his own proceedings, recriminated againſt the French, who, in prejudice of the apoſtolic ſee, had publiſhed the pragmatic ſanction in their kingdom; and finding that he could expect no aſſiſtance from them or the Engliſh, who were engaged in civil diſſenſions, he ſent a legate a latere to ſollicit the emperor and German princes to furniſh the 42,000 men that had been promiſed at the diet of Frankfort during the pontificate of Nicolas. The Germans, before they would agree to this demand, held another diet at Nuremberg; however, nothing was concluded at that aſſembly, and the affair was put off till the following year [o].

He was educated, however, with great care; and, having finiſhed his academical ſtudies at Siena and Rome, when he was 26 years of age he went with cardinal Capranica, as his ſecretary, to the council of Baſil. He was afterwards ſecretary to other prelates, and was ſent by cardinal Albergati to Scotland. Upon his return he was honoured by the ſame council with the offices of referendary, abbreviator, chancellor, and agent-general, and was ſent ſeveral times as their deputy to Straſburgh, Frankfort, Conſtance, Trent, and Savoy. He was ſecretary to the antipope Felix V. and afterwards to the emperor Frederic III. who honoured him with the poetical crown, and employed him in different embaſſies to Rome, Milan, Naples, Bohemia, and elſewhere. In the midſt of theſe negotiations, he always found leiſure to publiſh ſome treatiſe or other, and was ſo delighted with writing, that, even after he was pope, in the midſt of his great occupations, and although he was afflicted with the gout, he could not deſiſt. When he perceived the factious and violent proceedings of the council of Baſil, he deſerted that party, and, notwithſtanding the activity he had ſhewn in oppoſing the intereſts of Eugenius, he was eſteemed by that pope, who appointed him his ſecretary. Nicolas V. created him biſhop of Trieſte, and, upon his reſigning that ſee, appointed him biſhop of Siena, and employed him as his nuncio in Auſtria, Hungary, Moravia, and Bohemia. During the pontificate of Calixtus III. who created him a cardinal, he reſided chiefly at Rome, having as he confeſſed himſelf, during all the time of his former ſervices, ſcarce acquired ſo much as would purchaſe a pair of ſhoes (1.) His works, with his life prefixed, were publiſhed in one volume at Baſil, in 1551. The commentaries of John Gobeline, his ſecretary, which were generally believed to be written by himſelf, were publiſhed at Rome in 1584, and afterwards at Helmſtad in 1700. According to the cardinal of Siena, his nephew, one may juſtly apply to him part of two lines from Virgil l. i. v. 382, 383.

A general alliance is formed againſt the Turks.

The pope condemns appeals to future general councils. A. D. 1460.

Pius, in the mean time, having conſulted the prelates and cardinals who were preſent on the 16th of January, publiſhed a decree, condemning and prohibiting, under pain of excommunication and interdict, all appeals to future general councils as contrary to the canons, and ridiculous, as appealing to what did not exiſt, and as they nouriſhed rebellion againſt the apoſtolic ſee, and confounded all eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and the hierarchical order [p]. A few weeks after, having made an elegant diſcourſe to the ambaſſadors of the princes and ſtates, he diſſolved the convention, after it had continued eight months, an end being thereby put, not only to their deliberations, but alſo to all further thoughts of executing what had been agreed upon. From Mantua Pius returned to Siena, where, with the conſent of the ſacred college, he created ſix cardinals, among whom was his nephew Francis Picolomini, then a ſtudent at Perugia. About the ſame time the cardinal Cuſa, who enjoyed the biſhopric of Breſcia in commendam, having been impriſoned by Sigiſmund duke of Auſtria, with whom he had for ſeveral years been at variance (S), Pius, upon being informed of this outrage, excommunicated the duke; and hearing that he contemned the anathema, he cited him to give an exact account of his faith. Sigiſmund appealing from this citation to a future council and a future pope, Pius publiſhed another ſentence againſt

(S) Sigiſmund, who as count of Tyrol was patron of the church of Breſcia, was offended that the cardinal ſhould poſſeſs that biſhopric as a ſinecure, which cuſtom, though common in Italy, France, Spain, and England, was very rare in Germany, which was one reaſon why there were very few German cardinals. The duke, at length, allowed the cardinal to take quiet poſſeſſion, who ſoon after finding that Sigiſmund was in poſſeſſion of a certain fief of his church, for which he made no acknowlegement, he deſired him to deliver it up, or to take a new inveſtiture. This was the occaſion of their diſſenſion; and the duke thinking himſelf aggrieved, and not receiving ſatisfaction at the convention of Mantua, impriſoned the cardinal, but quickly after ſet him at liberty (4).

a him, declaring him guilty of ſacrilege. Gregory Heimburg, ſyndic of Nurem, publiſhed an appeal againſt this laſt ſentence, which expoſed him to the reſentment of the pope, who denounced an anathema againſt him, and ordered all his effects to be confiſcated [q]. The pope, about the ſame time, was engaged in diſputes with the kings of Caſtile and Poland. As the biſhop of Leon, who had come as ambaſſador from the king of Caſtile, died at Siena, Pius appointed the cardinal of St. Sixtus as his ſucceſſor, who was diſapproved of by the king, who would not allow him to take poſſeſſion. The king of Poland likewiſe refuſed to confer the church of Cracow upon the perſon nominated by the pope, but cauſed his chancellor to be elected by ſome of the canons; and although the pope had ordered the perſon appointed by him to be received, under pain of excommunication, the king, b nevertheleſs, oppoſed him with ſuch vigour, that he was obliged to drop his pretenſions, and the chancellor remained in quiet poſſeſſion [r].

Difference betwixt him and the kings of Caſtile and Poland:

Mean while Pius received an embaſſy from the patriarchs of Antioch, Alexandria, and Jeruſalem, declaring that they had at laſt accepted of the decree of union publiſhed in the council of Florence [s]. A few days after, ambaſſadors arrived from Monobaſia, a fortified city on the coaſt of the Morea, offering to ſurrender their city to the pope, as their ſovereign Demetrius Palæologus had revolted to the Turks. Pius accordingly received the city in the name of the Roman church, furniſhed it with proviſions, of which it was in great want, and ſent a governor to take upon him the command. In the mean time the pope was informed of a great commotion in Rome, where one Tiburtius (whoſe father had been executed for a conſpiracy during the pontificate of Nicolas) had aſſembled a great body of young men, and, under pretence of freeing the city from the yoke of the prieſts, had committed great outrages, and taken poſſeſſion of the church of St. Maria rotunda, the magiſtrates not daring to make oppoſition. The pope, to put a ſtop to the tumult, immediately proceeded to Rome, and, ſoon after his arrival, having apprehended Tiburtius and his chief aſſociates, he ordered them to be put to death [t].

he quells a commotion at Rome, and aſſiſts Ferdinand againſt his competitor the duke of Anjou.

Notwithstanding the pope's great deſire to eſtabliſh peace among the Chriſtian princes, he, at the ſame time made himſelf a party in the civil diſſenſions in the kingdom of Naples, where John the ſon of René, duke of Anjou, had arrived in the end of the former year with a conſiderable body of French troops, and raiſed a formidable rebellion againſt
d Ferdinand, who was this year defeated at Sarno, and obliged to fly to Naples. Pius, having no deſire to ſee the French power increaſe in Italy, immediately ſent ſuccours to Ferdinand, and joined his forces with thoſe of the duke of Milan, to oppoſe Picenninus, who intended to march to the aſſiſtance of the rebels. About the ſame time he countenanced the Genoeſe in expelling the French garriſon, and aſſerting their liberty. In the beginning of his pontificate, having ſent a legate to the Chriſtians of Iberia, Armenia, and Meſopotamia, to excite them againſt the Turks, he now received the ambaſſadors of thoſe people, and of ſeveral other heathen nations, their allies, who had come through Cholchis and Scythia, and from thence, by Hungary and Venice, to Rome. At their audience in a private conſiſtory, they promiſed to attack the Turks in Aſia, with an army of 120,000 men, if the Eu-
e ropeans would agree to unite their forces againſt them at the ſame time. Pius being ſtill very zealous in promoting the cruſade, in the beginning of the following year ſent theſe ambaſſadors into France, that they might influence, if poſſible, the French king and the duke of Burgundy heartily to eſpouſe the common cauſe [u]. They accordingly proceeded to France, together with Lewis the Franciſcan, who had been ſent legate into Aſia; but they could obtain nothing from Charles or the duke of Burgundy, but picked up a conſiderable ſum of money by begging from the people. Upon their return to Venice, the pope having diſcovered them to be impoſtors, and that Lewis had prevailed with ſome ignorant biſhops to grant him epiſcopal and patriarchal ordination, he ordered him and his companions to be apprehended; but they having private notice, immediately made their eſcape [w].

f In the mean time Thomas Palæologus, formerly deſpot of part of Morea, having fled from Corcyra, arrived at Rome, the pope received him with great hoſpitality, and appointed him a penſion of 300 crowns a month, to which the cardinals added 200 [x]. A few weeks after he excommunicated the duke of Auſtria, for refuſing to give ſatisfaction to the cardinal Cuſa; and denounced the ſame ſentence againſt Sigiſmund Malateſta, who, inſtead of paying the uſual tribute for the fiefs which he poſſeſſed in the church patrimony, had ſeized ſeveral other caſtles, and raiſed a conſiderable army, with which he had defeated the church's legate. As Dietherus, who the year before had been elected archbiſhop of Mentz, had neglected to appear at Rome, and to pay 14,000 crowns for the annates, and other expences of his admiſſion, the pope, about this time, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt him: but the archbiſhop appealed from this bull to a future council, and laid his grievances before an aſſembly of the princes of Mentz. As the pope's nuncios ſupported the intereſts of the court of Rome at this aſſembly, the archbiſhop found that the princes did not eſpouſe his ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee. However, he again neglected to fulfil his engagements, and, without waiting till he was abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication, exerciſed the functions of his office. This contumacy offending the pope, he ordered the chapter to proceed to a new election, who accordingly choſe Adolphus of Naſſau, whom the pope confirmed in the ſee (T). a

In the midſt of this diſpute with the archbiſhop of Mentz, Pius being informed of the death of the king of France, ſent a legate into that kingdom, to congratulate Lewis XI. his ſucceſſor, and to prevail with him to revoke the pragmatic ſanction, and ſend auxiliaries to the Chriſtians againſt the Turks. Lewis immediately promiſed, with an oath, to annul the pragmatic ſanction, without calling any aſſembly of the prelates or nobles; which promiſe he ſoon after performed by a letter which he wrote to the pope, allowing the apoſtolic ſee the ſame authority in his kingdom as it enjoyed during the pontificate of Martin V r. This proceeding of the king was oppoſed by a great many prelates of his kingdom, and the univerſity of Paris appealed both from the king and the pope to a future council [z]. At the ſame time it gave great ſatisfaction to the pope, who ſoon after promoted his legate in France, with five others, to the dignity of cardinal [a]. At this juncture likewiſe he wrote a long letter to Mohammed, emperor of the Turks, exhorting him to deſiſt from perſecuting the Chriſtians, and to embrace the Chriſtian faith; promiſing him, if he would be baptized, the empire of the Greeks, as his predeceſſors had transferred the Roman empire to Charlemagne [b] (U). b who revokes the pragmatic ſanction. c

A. D. 1462.

This good correſpondence betwixt the pope and the king of France was of very ſhort continuance; for although in the beginning of the following year the king ſent a moſt ſplendid embaſſy to Rome, which confirmed the abrogation of the pragmatic ſanction, yet, as the pope would not conſent to abandon Ferdinand, a miſunderſtanding immediately enſued. The king offered to ſend a powerful army againſt the Turks, if the pope would countenance the ſucceſſion of the duke of Anjou to the kingdom of Naples, and if Genoa ſhould return to the obedience of France. The pope anſwered, that he would withdraw his auxiliaries from Ferdinand, if both parties would ſubmit to the deciſion of the apoſtolic ſee: ſome preliminaries were accordingly propoſed to procure a truce, during which all differences might be terminated by an amicable accommodation. However, as the pope ſtill continued to aſſiſt Ferdinand, and ſome perſons at Rome had informed the king, that Pius, ſince the abrogation of the pragmatic ſanction, proſecuted the war with more earneſtneſs, as he now drew more money from France than formerly, Lewis wrote to him, and ſent another ambaſſador to Rome, threatening to recal all Frenchmen from the Roman court. This threatening meſſage had no effect upon Pius, who declared that the French were at liberty to leave his court when they pleaſed; and that he would not deſert Ferdinand while the duke of Anjou continued his hoſtilities [c]. However, ſoon after the pope endeavoured to mitigate his anſwer; and the college of cardinals, at his deſire, wrote to the king, entreating him not to give credit to calumnies, but to cultivate a friendſhip with his holineſs, who never mentioned him but with the greateſt regard. d A miſunderſtanding betwixt him and the pope. e

Pius, at this period, had likewiſe received an embaſſy from George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, to demand the confirmation of the compactata by the apoſtolic ſee. The pope replied, as the conditions on which theſe compactata had been granted had been frequently violated by the Bohemians, they could not now be of any force: and as the king at his coronation had ſworn to obey the apoſtolic ſee, he ought to unite himſelf ſincerely with the Roman church, without which union his kingdom could not ſtand. The ambaſſadors report-

(T) This new election occaſioned a war betwixt the two pretenders; but the party of Adolphus being ſtrongeſt, Dietherus agreed to an accommodation, which continued but a ſhort time; for, at the inſtigation of the count Palatine, he renewed the war, which laſted till the year 1463, when, in compaſſion for the miſeries with which the dioceſe was afflicted, he wholly reſigned his right to Adolphus, reſerving only ſome towns for his life. Upon this agreement he received abſolution from the pope's nuncio, and lived to ſucceed Adolphus afterwards in 1478 (5).

(U) This letter has been moſt juſtly cenſured as unapoſtolical, and the pope has been condemned as making a merchandize of the goſpel, which ordains a reſtitution of all poſſeſſions unjuſtly acquired. With the ſame juſtice a Jew, convicted of being a fraudulent bankrupt, ought not to be puniſhed, if he would conſent to be baptized (6).

a ing this anſwer to the ſtates, which had aſſembled at Prague, the king broke out into reproaches againſt the pope, and declared, that though he had ſworn to extirpate hereſy, yet as he had never believed the doctrine of the communion under both kinds to be a hereſy, he was determined to die in that faith. The pope's nuncio being afterwards admitted to an audience, and inſiſting upon implicit obedience to the Roman church, the king ordered him to be impriſoned; but, at the interceſſion of the emperor, about three months afterwards he ſet him at liberty; Frederic at the ſame time, in conſideration of the aſſiſtance he received from George, in the diſpute with his brother about the ſucceſſion of Auſtria, interceded in his behalf with the pope. Though Pius, at the emperor's interceſſion, delayed his cenſures againſt the king of Bohemia, yet he again denounced an anathema againſt Malateſta and b the duke of Auſtria, and againſt George Heinberg, who had eſpouſed the duke of Auſtria's cauſe. His troops ſoon afterwards defeating Malateſta at Senogallia, and Ferdinand gaining a ſignal victory over the party of the duke of Anjou at Froja, Pius renewed the deliberations about the Turkiſh expedition; and having procured the hearty concurrence of the Venetians, he ſent the biſhop of Ferrara, as his legate, to the king of France and duke of Burgundy, who brought nothing but fine promiſes from theſe princes, which were never put in execution [a].

THE following year the pope received another embaſſy from the king of Bohemia, excuſing his behaviour at the diet of Prague, promiſing obedience to the apoſtolic ſee, and deſiring the pope to oblige the inhabitants of Breſlau to acknowlege him for their king. As c Podiebrad was ſtrongly ſuſpected of hereſy, the pope abſolutely refuſed to revoke the bull which he had granted to the Sileſians, abſolving them from their allegiance; but, at the interceſſion of the emperor, he did not yet denounce an anathema againſt the king [e]. However, on Good-Friday he again excommunicated Sigiſmund of Auſtria, and Malateſta prince of Rimini; and having received an embaſſy from the king of Boſnia, deſiring aſſiſtance againſt the Turks, and cathedral churches to be erected in his kingdom, which had lately been converted from Manichiſm, he promiſed to ſend biſhops thither to inſtruct and govern the new converts, and to write to the king of Hungary, and to the Venetians, to aſſiſt them againſt the infidels. Before the return of theſe ambaſſadors, Boſnia was invaded and conquered by the Turks: but, in compenſation for this loſs, the Venetians being inſtigated by d the pope's legate, cardinal Beſſarion declared war againſt the Turks; and fitting out a powerful fleet recovered the Morea, and ſeveral iſlands in the Archipelago [f]. In the mean time the king of France ſtill kept up his reſentment againſt the pope, and publiſhed three decrees; by the firſt of which, he declared himſelf the only competent judge of all diſputes about conferring of benefices in his kingdom, or diſpoſing of the revenues of thoſe that were vacant: by the ſecond he ordained, that the preſidents of parliament, and all his officers, ſhould enjoy the ſame privileges, in judging of cauſes relating to benefices, as thoſe which the apoſtolic ſee had granted to the univerſity of Paris; and by the third, he aſſumed to himſelf the right of judgment over all poſſeſſors of benefices. The pope ſent two legates into France, to endeavour to appeaſe the king, with an offer of a five years truce in e Sicily, if he would conſent to take arms againſt the Turks. What was the effect of this embaſſy we don't find mentioned; but the king ſoon after publiſhed ſome other edicts againſt reſervations, and the exactors of the ſpoils of deceaſed prieſts [g]; the extortions of the court of Rome, as Spondanus confeſſed, furniſhing continual matters of complaint; ſo that nothing is more frequently mentioned than ſuch grievances in the hiſtory of France, England, Germany, and Spain. The king of France publiſhes ſeveral edicts againſt the authority of the ſee of Rome.

PIUS being ſtill chiefly intent upon the Turkiſh expedition, about this time ſent nuncios to the duke of Burgundy, to remind him of his vow; and having received a favourable anſwer from that prince, at his deſire he invited all the ſtates of Italy to ſend their deputies to Rome. Upon their arrival, the ambaſſadors of the duke of Burgundy declaring, that, in f the beginning of the ſpring, he was determined to conduct a fleet in perſon againſt the Turks, the pope then aſked the Italian deputies, what auxiliaries their ſtates would furniſh. The greateſt part of the Italians anſwered, that they had only come to hear the propoſals of the pope; and the Florentines even adviſed his holineſs to allow the Venetians to carry on the war alone, which would probably ruin them in the end, and thereby ſecure the liberty of Italy. Pius deteſted this advice, and ſoon after, in a private conſiſtory, declared to the cardinals, that, as Ferdinand was ſecured in the poſſeſſion of Naples, and Malateſta defeated, he was determined to fit out as great a fleet as the revenues of the church could allow, and to ſail himſelf into Aſia or Greece againſt the infidels, in hopes that his example would influence the Chriſtian princes. His propoſal was greatly approved by the cardinals; however, the chief ſtates of Italy manifeſted no great forwardneſs to engage in the a expedition, and only offered the ſubſidies that had been agreed upon at Mantua[i]. The duke of Milan, indeed, offered to ſend his ſon with a body of horſe; and the Genoeſe pro-miſed to fit out eight or ten ſhips, but they deſired to know before-hand what ſhare their ſtate ſhould have in the profits of the expedition[k].

THE pope, not at all diſcouraged by the backwardneſs of others, on the 19th of October publiſhed a bull, addreſſed to all the faithful, informing them of the neceſſity of the expedition, and that he himſelf intended to command a fleet, which was to ſail from Ancona about the beginning of June[l]. A few days after he wrote to the doge of Venice, deſiring him to come with a fleet to the general rendezvous at Ancona, and not to excuſe himſelf on account of his age, as he himſelf, and the duke of Bur- b gundy, were both old men. Though the pope's health at this time was greatly broke ſelf with the greateſt aſſiduity in promoting the expedition. As his pains increaſed, and were attended with a fever, in the end of winter he went, by the advice of the phyſicians, to the baths of Retriolana, in the dioceſe of Siena, where he continued ſome months. While he was at Siena he received the diſagreeable news that the duke of Burgundy declined engaging perſonally in the expedition: he wrote to that prince, exhorting him not to deſert the common cauſe in which he was engaged, both by his honour and conſcience. How- c ever, his letter had not the deſired effect upon the duke, who only ſent his two natural ſons with 200 men, and promiſed to come the next year perſonally, if he was not prevented by death or ſickneſs[m]. The king of France likewiſe excuſed himſelf, being ap-prehenſive of a civil war, as the nobles of his kingdom had entered into a private conſpiracy againſt him[n]. No aſſiſtance could be expected from the kingdoms of Spain, who were then engaged in mutual wars; and in the end of the former year, the Venetians had been defeated by the Turks at Corinth and Mytilene, and been obliged to abandon the Iſthmus[o].

He propoſes to embark at Ancona, NOTWITHSTANDING all theſe diſcouragements, the pope ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution; and having returned for a few days to Rome, he ſet out from thence, in a litter, for An- cona, where he arrived by ſlow journies about the middle of July. Soon after his arrival, d he abſolved and diſmiſſed great part of the cruſaders, who had come into Italy without money for their ſubſiſtence during the expedition; whereas by his bull, he had only offered indulgences to thoſe who fought in his army, for one year, or eighteen months, at their own charge[p] (W). In the mean time news arriving that the Turks had encamped in the neighbourhood of Raguſa, as though they had an intention to beſiege that city, the pope immediately propoſed to embark for its relief, in hopes that, if he ſhould ſucceed, the Chriſ-tian princes would be excited to follow his good fortune. He altered his reſolution upon hearing that the Turks had retired, and a few days after he had the ſatisfaction to be joined year of his age, and the 6th of his pontificate. He was of a ſhort ſtature, gray haired before the uſual time, and in his countenance, which was early wrinkled, there appeared a mixture of ſeverity and good-nature. He neither loved money nor contemned it, but would never be preſent when it was told out or laid up. Although he was very learned, and greatly addicted to ſtudy, yet, by ſome, he is accuſed of having from avarice neglected to encourage the men of genius of his time; but Platina attributes this neglect not to avarice, but to the expenſive wars in which he was engaged, which continually ex-hauſted his treaſury. The ſame author relates, that he was void of fear and inconſtancy, and ſeemed as little elevated with his good fortune as dejected at his bad. He had a great f contempt for a ſplendid table, and went frequently to fountains, groves, and country retirements, where he entertained himſelf, not in a pompous but in a plain ſimple manner.

Beſides

a Beſides his hiſtories and orations, he left behind him ſeveral grave and judicious ſentences after the manner of proverbs, which are mentioned by Platina and other authors q.

AFTER the death of Pius, the cruſaders, who had aſſembled at Ancona, immediately diſperſed: and the cardinals conſulting with the doge of Venice, agreed to give the gallies built by Pius to that republic, the doge promiſing to reſtore them, if the pope that ſhould be elected diſapproved of their decree. The cardinals likewiſe unanimouſly gave the 48,000 crowns that had been collected by the late pope, to Matthias king of Hungary; then determining that the future election ſhould be made at Rome, they returned to that city, and entered the conclave on the 24th of Auguſt. Having drawn up ſeveral decrees for the right adminiſtration of the pontificate, and each having ſworn to obſerve them if he b ſhould be elected pope, the next day they gave their votes, and, at the firſt ſcrutiny, cardinal Peter Barbo, a Venetian, and nephew of Eugenius IV. was elected, who aſſumed the name of Paul II. and a few days after was conſecrated and crowned with the uſual ſolemnities [r]. He had very little learning, as he was of an indolent ſpirit, and did not apply himſelf to ſtudy till he was advanced in years, after the promotion of his uncle Eugenius, at which time he was preparing to go from Venice on a trading voyage. Before his election was publiſhed, he again ſubſcribed, and ſwore to obſerve the articles agreed to in the conclave: however, quickly after, he endeavoured to aboliſh them, at the perſuaſion of the archbiſhop of Milan, and the biſhop of Treviſo, who, finding themſelves excluded by the articles from entering the ſacred college ſo ſoon as they expected, urged, that it was c unworthy of a pope to be only the adminiſtrator of the decrees of other people, and prevailed with him to draw up other articles in the name of the cardinals, under pretence that the former were uſeleſs. Paul, who was very fond of unlimited power, readily conſented, and as readily obtained the ſubſcription of ſeveral of the cardinals, who put their names to the new articles without ever reading them. All the reſt of the fathers were compelled by threats to ſubſcribe, except cardinal Carvajal, a Spaniard, who declared that he never remembered to have changed his mind in his youth, and would not now in his old age [s].

he violates the oath that he had taken before and after his election;

ABOUT the ſame time Paul, in reſentment for ſome denial which he had formerly received from Pius, diſmiſſed all the clerks of the Breves, and confiſcated their effects, under pretence that they were unqualified for their offices; accuſing them of a conſpiracy, and even d of hereſy, becauſe they, with other men of learning, had formed an academy at Rome, and diſputed about the immortality of the ſoul, and other articles of the Chriſtian faith, after the manner of the ancient Platoniſts and Academics [t]. Platina the hiſtorian, who was one of the abbreviators, complains of the injuſtice which they ſuffered, as they had not only bought their places, which were therefore confirmed to them by a bull, but were men of ſuch merit as to be an ornament to the court. Great interceſſion was made in their behalf, and Platina begged, in the name of his collegues, that their cauſe might be judged by the auditors of the Rota; which requeſt greatly enraged the pope, who replied, that he ought not to be referred to judges, who had all the law in his own breaſt. Platina, after having been rejected twenty days without obtaining audience, at length wrote to the pope, that he, with e his collegues, intended to intreat the Chriſtian princes to convoke a general council, where their wrongs might be redreſſed: but inſtead of prevailing upon the pope by this means to reſtore them to their places, he drew the whole reſentment of his holineſs upon himſelf; for he was immediately put in irons, and impriſoned in a high tower, where he continued all the winter [u]. In the mean time Paul, to gratify the cardinals, allowed them to wear a red hat and a mitre of damaſk ſilk, which only the popes had formerly worn [w]; and granted 100 crowns a month to thoſe whoſe yearly revenue did not amount to 4000. As he had granted the ornaments of a pope to the cardinals, he reſolved to augment his own; and being very fond of precious ſtones, which he took great pains to procure, and which he ſpent whole nights in viewing, he cauſed a new pontifical mitre to be made with three crowns, f which he adorned with diamonds to the value of 120,000 crowns [x].

He exhorts the Chriſtian princes to an expedition againſt the Turks.

DURING theſe private tranſactions, the pope had ſent nuncios to the different princes of Europe, deſiring them to unite their arms againſt the Turks, and had appointed three cardinals to have the perpetual direction of all matters relating to that expedition. Being in ſome doubt whether he ſhould continue to grant reſervations, which were greatly complained of, he was perſuaded by cardinal Carvajal not to neglect that prerogative of the apoſtolic

(X) We have here added ſome of thoſe ſentences. "To find out the motion of the ſtars, has more of pleaſure in it than profit. God's friends enjoy both this life and the life to come. As all rivers run into the ſea, ſo do all vices into courts. Unſkilful phyſicians kill the body, and ignorant prieſts the ſoul. A wandering monk is the devil's bondſlave. ſee, which, with great difficulty, had been eſtabliſhed [y]. However, at the next conſiſtory, a by the advice of all the cardinals, he refuſed the requeſt of a French biſhop, who deſired a certain abbacy in commendam, being reſolved, in order to avoid ſcandal, in ſome meaſure, to reſtrain that cuſtom, as upwards of 500 abbacies had been given in commendam ſince the pontificate of Calixtus; and one of the cardinals expreſſed his apprehenſions, leſt, in a ſhort time, there would not be a monaſtery in France that would have an abbot. Paul, about the ſame time, received an ambaſſy from the emperor, profeſſing his obedience to him as pope, and likewiſe to intercede for George Podiebrad, whom Pius, before he had ſet out for Ancona, had cited to appear before him within 180 days. As the time was not yet elapſed, and the king of Bohemia promiſed, if the citation was ſuſpended, to ſend an embaſſy to Rome, and ſubmit to the orders of the apoſtolic ſee, Paul granted the requeſt of the em- b peror's ambaſſador, in hopes that the averſion hitherto ſhewn by George to the ſee of Rome, proceeded more from his perſonal hatred to Pius, than from any attachment to the ſect of the Calixtins [z]. A few months after ambaſſadors arrived at Rome from Ferdinand, king of Naples, who deſired that the pope would ſend a cardinal legate to be preſent at the marriage of his ſon with the daughter of the duke of Milan. The ambaſſadors likewiſe declared, that Ferdinand had received an embaſſy from the grand Turk, congratulating him upon ſub- duing the rebels, and exhorting him to further conqueſts, by offering a ſubſidy of 800,000 crowns a year, if he would make war upon any of the ſtates of Italy. He propoſed alſo an alliance betwixt ſome of their children; or, if that could not take effect, on account of the difference of religion, then he offered a young Greek, who was deſcended from the em- c perors, with a dowry of 200,000 crowns, or as much more as the king pleaſed. Ferdinand promiſed to be directed in his anſwer to Mohammed by the determination of the conſiſtory, but what that was does not appear; for the cardinal of Pavia gives us only a part of the ſpeech of cardinal Beſſarion, condemning any alliance with the Turks, or even any corre- ſpondence by ambaſſadors [a]. It is probable that the other fathers were of his opinion, and rather exhorted Ferdinand to join the other ſtates of Italy, in aſſiſting the king of Hungary againſt the Turks. Frederic, the younger ſon of Ferdinand, ſoon after arriving at Rome, in his way to Milan, whither he went to fetch his brother's bride, was received with great honour, the pope himſelf preſenting him with a golden roſe, which is a preſent made annually to ſome Chriſtian prince or other [b]. d

He receives an embaſſy from the emperor, and from the king of Naples, A. D. 1459.

THE king of Naples likewiſe ſent ſome troops to aſſiſt the pope, in quelling a rebellion raiſed by the counts Anquillara, who the year before had ſucceeded their father, whoſe ex- ample they followed, by uſurping the territories of their neighbours, and refuſing to ſub- mit to the pope. Paul, by the aſſiſtance of the Neapolitans, ſurprized and ſubdued the counts, within fourteen days after the commencement of hoſtilities, and took from them nine caſtles, ſome of which appeared almoſt impregnable. Quickly after a difference hap- pened betwixt him and Ferdinand, who, in conſideration of the ſuccours he had ſent him, deſired a remittance of the tribute which he owed the church; which requeſt was rejected by the pope, who replied, that Ferdinand owed the quiet poſſeſſion of his king- dom, to the aſſiſtance of the apoſtolic ſee, and was even bound by his fief to ſend ſuc- e cours to his holineſs. As Ferdinand, about this time, ſecured himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his kingdoms, by putting to death Picenninus, lord of ſeveral towns in Albruzzo, though he had come to Naples upon his ſafe conduct, he threatened to declare war againſt the pope, unleſs he would remit the tribute, and reſtore ſeveral towns that belonged to the king- dom. Paul, to prevent a rupture, immediately ſent a legate to Naples, who found means, in ſome meaſure, to appeaſe Ferdinand, who offered, if the pope would remit the tribute, to give 60,000 crowns to the king of Hungary, and to ſend 500 horſe, and as many foot, into Epirus. In conſequence of a convention held the former year at Rome, to deliberate about the means of oppoſing the Turks, the Venetians about this time offered to grant an annual ſubſidy of 50,000 crowns to the Hungarians, on condition that the pope would in- f dulge them with the tythe of eccleſiaſtical revenues, the thirtieth penny of the citizens, and the twentieth from the Jews. The duke of Milan, on the ſame condition, offered a rein- forcement of 2000 horſe and 1000 foot; and the Florentines 1000 horſe and 500 foot, or a ſubſidy of 24,000 crowns. The other ſtates made no offer of any aſſiſtance; and even theſe, not having obtained their requeſt from the pope, performed nothing [c]. While the Italians thus excuſed themſelves from furniſhing ſuccours againſt the Turks, the famous Scanderbeg was entirely defeated by them in Albania, and obliged to fly into Italy; and the infidels making themſelves maſters of the whole province, carried off a great part of his ſubjects into captivity, while others eſcaped in boats, and took refuge on the Italian coaſts, g filling that kingdom with conſternation. The pope immediately publiſhed a letter, a addreſſed to all the faithful, informing them of the calamity of the Albanians, and earneſtly exhorting them to oppoſe the progreſs of the Turks, either by men or money [d].

In the mean time, being informed that the king of Bohemia had again attacked the catholics of Sileſia, he abſolved them from their vaſſalage to that crown, and put them under the protection of the king of Hungary. Podiebrad, nevertheleſs, was reſolved to force them to a ſubmiſſion; but his meaſures being thwarted by ſeveral catholic lords, particularly by one Hynco, or Zdenco, he beſieged him in the fort of Zaraſten. During the ſiege Zdenco found means to eſcape to Rome, where he was graciouſly received by the pope, who ſent him with letters of recommendation to the emperor. Paul likewiſe ordered Podiebrad to raiſe the ſiege, under pain of excommunication; to prevent which ſentence, b the king of Bohemia wrote to Rome, in the name of the reſt of the nobles, blaming Zdenco as the author of the diſturbances, at the ſame time deſiring the pope to ſend a nuncio to the emperor, where conferences might be held, to treat of the reduction of Bohemia to the catholic religion. This letter did not at all alter the former reſolution of the pope, who ſtill ordered Podiebrad to raiſe the ſiege, and ſent a nuncio to the emperor, deſiring him not to treat with the king of Bohemia, before he had laid down his arms. Podiebrad, notwithſtanding the threatenings of the pope, would not deſiſt from his purpoſe, and, after a ſiege of almoſt twelve months, made himſelf maſter of the place [e]. The pope, upon receiving this news, immediately wrote to his nuncios in Germany, to deſire the German princes not to oppoſe the proceedings of the apoſtolic ſee againſt the king of Bohemia. At the ſame time the c catholic lords having revolted, he abſolved them from their allegiance, appointed George to appear at Rome within a certain time, and ordered his nuncio to raiſe forces for the aſſiſtance of the Bohemian catholics, and to publiſh a cruſade, if there was occaſion, againſt Podiebrad. The king deſpiſing this citation from Rome, the pope declared him convicted of perjury, ſacrilege, and herely, and pronounced againſt him a ſentence of excommunication, but delayed publiſhing the decree, that it might not be treated with contempt, as he could not find any one who could put it in execution; the emperor indulging himſelf in a ſlothful inactivity, and the kings of Poland and Hungary being wholly engaged in oppoſing the Turks. At length, encouraged by cardinal Carvajal, who inſiſted that in great matters much ought to be left to God, the pope, on Chriſtmas-day, publiſhed the d ſentence of excommunication and depoſition againſt the king, in the church of St. Peter. About the ſame time he confirmed the biſhopric of St. Andrews in Scotland to Patrick Grahame, who, after his election, had come to Rome without the king's leave: and, to put an end to the pretenſions of the archbiſhop of York, who claimed a ſuperiority over the Scots prelates, he created the biſhop primate of Scotland, and appointed him his legate in that kingdom for three years [f].

The following year Paul ſent a legate into France, to procure a decree of the parliament of Paris, confirming the abrogation of the pragmatic ſanction; but their journey was in vain: for although they again obtained the king's edict for the abrogation, which was publiſhed at the chatelet, yet the parliament oppoſed their proceeding, and the univerſity
e of Paris appealed from the legate and the edict of the king to a general council, and ordered their appeal to be inſerted in the acts [g]. Mean time the nuncios of the pope arrived in Poland, and offered the kingdom of Bohemia to Caſimir, or to any of his ſons. The ſame proffer was likewiſe made by the deputies from the catholic nobles of Bohemia; but as George Podiebrad was then at the head of a conſiderable army of Bohemians and Germans, Caſimir did not chuſe raſhly to accept of the offered crown, but declared that he would firſt endeavour to reconcile Podiebrad with the holy ſee. He accordingly ſent an embaſſy to the king of Bohemia, who inſiſted that he had never done any injury to the pope, nor had ever violated the compactata of the council of Baſil; but, if he had in any thing offended, he was willing to ſubmit to the arbitration of Caſimir. However, the catholics refuſing
f to agree to an arbitration, before they could receive the permiſſion of the pope, in the mean time a truce was agreed to for five months. During theſe tranſactions in Poland, the emperor, at the repeated ſolicitations of the pope, aſſembled a diet at Nuremberg, to conſult of means to oppoſe the Turks, and protect the catholics of Bohemia. The biſhop of Ferrara, the pope's legate, repreſented the great danger to which thoſe catholics were expoſed, who had withdrawn their allegiance from Podiebrad, unleſs they were aſſiſted by the Germans, as the king of Poland manifeſted no great earneſtneſs in their behalf. His repreſentations, however, had little effect upon the princes, who had no great deſire to ſee the king of Poland poſſeſſed of the crown of Bohemia; and being divided among themſelves, ſingly courted the favour of Podiebrad. The emperor likewiſe was diſſatisfied with the

PAUL indeed, the following year, reconciled several states of Italy, that had taken up arms as auxiliaries to the opposite factions in Florence; and, after the conclusion of that treaty, he entertained the Romans with sumptuous feasts and races, proposing eight cloaks to be run for separately, by old men, middle aged, young men, Jews, horses, mares, asses, and buffaloes. However, he was still determined to put his decree in execution against Podiebrad; and all thoughts of an arbitration being laid aside, he ordered his legate, the bishop of Ferrara, to offer the crown of Bohemia to Matthias, king of Hungary. Matthias, whether from ambition, or zeal for the catholic cause, readily accepted of the offer; and, having concluded a truce with the Turkish governor of Pannonia, marched with an army into Moravia, attended with the legate, who had denounced an anathema against all those who should assist the heretics. After some unsuccessful attempts, he had a conference with his father-in-law Podiebrad; and, agreeing to a truce till the end of the year, he left his army in Moravia, and returned to Hungary. b is alarmed with the report of a conspiracy at Rome.

DURING this unsuccessful campaign of Matthias, the pope was greatly alarmed at Rome with the report of a conspiracy against him, said to be headed by one Callimaco, who had a correspondence with some banditti in the wood of Velitre. Paul immediately ordered a great many citizens and courtiers to be imprisoned; among whom was the historian Platina, who being brought before the pope, was threatened with torments and death, unless he would make a confession. Platina, conscious of his own innocence, answered without fear; and, to relieve the pope from the terrors with which he seemed to be seized, endeavoured to persuade him that the report of the plot must have been false, as Callimaco was an unfit person for such an enterprize, being a bad orator, slothful, ambitious, poor, without forces and dependents, and besides almost blind. But this discourse served only to aggravate his crime, the pope, in a passion, saying to those who were present, "This "fellow must be forced by the rack to confess the truth, for he understands the true art of "plotting." Although a few days afterwards the pope was fully informed of the falsehood of the plot, yet, that he might not seem to have acted from levity, he ordered Platina, and a great many other prisoners, to be put to the torture, several of whom died under the hands of the tormentors. Platina was stretched upon the rack twice in one day, and, with a great many others, continued a whole year in prison. c d

IN the mean time the emperor, in consequence of a vow, arrived at Rome, where he was treated with great magnificence by the pope, who spent on that occasion 18,000 ducats. Four days after his arrival, he assisted at a public consistory, and proposed, as the most proper expedient to engage the Christians in a league against the Turks, that a convention should be held at Constance, at which the pope and he should assist in person, and to which other Christian princes should be invited. The pope remembering the former proceedings in that city, did not relish this proposal; but, after much consultation, it was agreed that letters should be written, in the name of the emperor and pope, to the princes and states in Christendom, inviting them to send their ambassadors to Rome, to treat about the means of defending the faith; and that the Venetians should be indulged with a tenth of clergy, a twentieth of Jews, and a thirtieth of the laity in their own dominions. e

The pope insults those who were imprisoned, on account of the conspiracy. A. D. 1469.

AFTER the departure of the emperor, who continued only seventeen days at Rome, the pope visited Platina, and the other prisoners; and that his severity might seem to have some foundation, he charged them with many crimes, particularly that they disputed concerning the immortality of the soul, and called the being of a God in question, and were too great admirers of pagan antiquities. Platina answered to the two first accusations, that both divines and philosophers, for the sake of argument, have made a question of propositions which they really believed; and he assures us, that no person could be more fond of pagan antiquities than the pope himself; for he procured as many statues of the ancients as he could, and placed them in a house that he had built near the capitol: among the rest he took away a porphyry tomb of St. Constantia from the church of St. Agnes, against the inclination of the monks: and in the foundation of his house he laid a great number of medals of gold, silver, and brass, struck with his own image. Two days after the pope visited the prisoners a second time, and, after some discourse, went away in a passion, upbraiding Platina with ingratitude against so good a friend as he had been to f

About the ſame time, being informed that Malateſta, prince of Rimini, had revolted from the church, and contracted an alliance with the king of Naples, the duke of Milan, and the Florentines, he ſent an army againſt him, and beſieged him in Rimini; but the allies of Malateſta ſending ſome troops to his aſſiſtance, the army of the pope was defeated. and obliged to raiſe the ſiege; Paul ſoon after conſenting to a peace upon very diſhonourable terms [k].

b ſons of Podiebrad, priſoner, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral towns: however, he was ſoon after defeated by Victorin's brother, and obliged to return to Hungary for ſuccours. Podiebrad likewiſe, in order to thwart the ambitious views of Matthias, propoſed to the ſtates at Prague, to ſettle the ſucceſſion of Bohemia upon Ladiſlaus, ſon of the king of Poland. This ſettlement gave ſatisfaction to both the factions; and Caſimir promiſing to ſupport the intereſts of his ſon, Matthias quickly loſt a great many partizans: however, he ſtill reſolved to ſupport his claim, and ſent an ambaſſador to the pope, deſiring him to diſcountenance the pretenſions of Ladiſlaus [l]. Paul, about the ſame time, received another embaſſy from the king of Poland, deſiring him to confirm the election of his ſon; but the pope being determined to ſupport the intereſts of Matthias, ſent the biſhop of Forli as his legate to c Caſimir, declaring that he could not abandon the king of Hungary, who had deſerved ſo well of the apoſtolic ſee, and exhorting him to give one of his daughters in marriage to Matthias, and to aſſiſt him againſt Podiebrad the enemy of the church.

The pope being ſoon after informed that the Turks were beſieging Negropont, with an army of 120,000 men, and a fleet of 100 gallies, he ordered public ſupplications to be made in the church of St. Peter and in the Lateran, to which laſt he went himſelf on foot, carrying the image of the virgin Mary [m]. This ſame year he likewiſe publiſhed a bull, reducing the jubilee to the twenty-fifth year, to commence in the year one thouſand four hundred and ſeventy-five; and having prevailed with the emperor to convoke a diet at Ratisbon, to conſult of means to oppoſe the Turks, who, beſides their preſent ſucceſſes in the d Archipelago, the year before had made an irruption into Carniola, he ſent two legates to be preſent at that aſſembly. The diet, which was very numerous, was accordingly opened on the 22d of June by the biſhop of Trent, who, in the name of the emperor, made a ſpeech in the German language; and repreſenting the great calamities of the Chriſtians, and the late ravaging of Carniola, one of the hereditary provinces of the Auſtrian family, he exhorted the princes to imitate the valour of their anceſtors, in oppoſing the infidels, and defending the Chriſtian religion: the two legates addreſſed the aſſembly to the ſame purpoſe. However, although the Venetian ambaſſador offered, on the part of that republic, a fleet of 120 ſail, and the princes propoſed, according to a general aſſeſſment, to raiſe an army of 200,000 men, yet nothing was effected, by reaſon of the ſlothful inactivity of the e emperor, which occaſioned one of the legates to write to the cardinal of Pavia, that they would ſurely beat the Turks, if the emperor would fight with as great vigour as he then ſnored [n].

After he had returned, the pope frequently boaſted the great kindneſs he had for him, and promiſed to the Venetians and Milaneſe ambaſſadors to provide for him in an honourable way. After Platina had ſpent two years in expectation, he propoſed to go to Bologna, with the cardinal of Mantua, who was legate of that city; but the pope deſired him to ſtay, and renewed his former promiſe: however, death prevented him from fulfilling it (9). Sixtus IV. reſtored him to his employments, and made him keeper of the Vatican library, which place he enjoyed but a few months, dying in 1481 (1).

THE cardinals having mourned the uſual time for the death of Paul, on the 7th of Auguſt entered the conclave to elect a ſucceſſor. The pontificate was at firſt offered to cardinal Beſſarion, under certain conditions; but he declaring that he would not accept of it under any reſtrictions, the cardinals applied themſelves to Francis della Rovere, a cardinal prieſt, who conſenting to what they deſired, two days after was choſen pope, b and aſſumed the name of Sixtus IV. Francis was born in the territory of Savona, on the Genoeſe coaſt, according to Onuphrius, of noble parents; but others relate, that his birth was obſcure, and that his father was a fiſherman, which employment he himſelf at firſt followed [p]: and the Venetian ambaſſador, in his ſpeech of congratulation, expreſsly declares, that he was not indebted to his anceſtors for his nobility, but was rendered noble by his virtue and learning [q]. He was by profeſſion a Franciſcan; and having acquired a great character by ſeveral treatiſes which he publiſhed on obſcure points of divinity, he was elected general of his order, and was created a cardinal without any ſolicitation, and during his abſence, by Paul II. Immediately after his promotion to the pontificate, he propoſed to convoke a general council at the Lateran, for the reformation of the church, and c to conſult of means to defend Chriſtendom againſt the Turks; but the emperor objecting to the place, this expedient of a council was dropt, and four legates were created, with full authority, to each of whom he aſſigned a penſion of 500 crowns a month. Cardinal Beſſarion was commiſſioned as legate to the king of France, to reconcile that prince with the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany. The cardinal St. Mark was ſent into Germany, to endeavour to conclude a peace with the king of Hungary, and Ladiſlaus, ſon of the king of Poland, who a few months before, by the death of Podiebrad, had ſucceeded to the crown of Bohemia. Roderigo Borgia, his vice-chancellor, was ſent into Spain, and Oliver Caraffa to Venice and the knights of Rhodes, to take upon him the command of the fleet againſt the infidels [r]. Collectors were likewiſe ſent to all the provinces of Europe, to raiſe the tax d agreed to at the convention of Mantua; and indulgences were granted to thoſe who engaged in the cruſade, or contributed to the expences of the war. The cardinal of Pavia, who was then abſent, quelling an inſurrection in Umbria, mentions a fifth legation, but does not inform us particularly what it was. He at the ſame time expreſſes his apprehenſions of the bad ſucceſs of thoſe pompous legations, and complains that the pope had violated the laws made in the conclave, by creating two of his nephews cardinals, who had not arrived at their 30th year [s] (Z). The pope indeed quickly found the bad effects of his liberal and free diſpoſition; for having given donations of the ſame thing to three or four different perſons, his court was immediately diſturbed with quarrels and diſputes. To prevent theſe for the future, he gave the privy-ſeal to one Montemirabile, a man of experience, who va- e cated ſuch donations as were not regularly granted.

MEAN while the legates, having received their inſtructions, departed from Rome. The cardinal of St Mark having proceeded to Poland, was received by Caſimir with great honour; but he did not ſucceed in his endeavours to procure a peace, which was owing to the backwardneſs of Matthias, who had lately concluded a treaty with the emperor, and therefore judged that he ſhould be able by force, to make good his pretenſions to Bohemia againſt Ladiſlaus. Cardinal Beſſarion, after he had entered France, was prohibited to come to Paris by the king, who was offended that he had firſt viſited the duke of Burgundy. At length after two months delay, he gave him permiſſion to come to the capital: however, he diſmiſſed him at the firſt audience, without hearkening to his propoſals for peace, f or promiſing any ſuccours againſt the Turks. The king of France, that he might not ſeem, by his treatment of Beſſarion, to have any perſonal animoſity againſt the pope, ſoon after the departure of that cardinal ſent an embaſſy to the apoſtolic ſee, to demand the celebration of a general council at Lyons; and that the archbiſhop of that city might be promoted to the dignity of cardinal. His ambaſſador likewiſe requeſted, that no Frenchman ſhould be received into the ſacred college without the king's knowledge or conſent; that the annates ſhould be regulated according to the decrees of the councils of Conſtance and Baſil; that the biſhoprics in France might be conferred only on ſuch perſons as were agreeable to the king; that the French clergy might be exempted from the tythe for the Turkiſh war; and that eccleſiaſtical cauſes might not be carried to the court of Rome in the firſt inſtance. The pope
b did not think proper to grant any of theſe demands; but four years afterwards he created the archbiſhop of Lyons a cardinal[u]. In the mean time cardinal Borgia had arrived at his native city of Valentia, of which he was biſhop, and made a diſcourſe to his clergy, compoſed by the cardinal of Pavia[w]. At Madrid he aſſembled the clergy of Caſtile, reconciling Henry to Ferdinand, prince of Arragon, who had married his ſiſter Iſabel againſt his will, although he produced the pope's bull, diſpenſing with the conſanguinity. Henry was ſo diſpleaſed with his proceedings, that he ſent an ambaſſador to the apoſtolic ſee to accuſe him; upon which the legates thought proper to return to Rome (B).

DURING theſe tranſactions the pope had terminated all the differences betwixt the apoſtolic ſee and the king of Naples. The duchy of Sora was reſtored to Ferdinand, who gave
c it with his natural daughter to one of the pope's nephews. The tribute, which was owing both by his father and himſelf, was remitted, in conſideration of which he promiſed to defend the church of Rome at his charge, and to furniſh two gallies for the protection of the Roman coaſt. He likewiſe fitted out a fleet of ſeventeen ſhips to act againſt the Turks, in conjunction with that of the pope and the Venetians. Sixtus having given his benediction to the fleet in the Tyber, and granted full remiſſion of ſins to all thoſe who died during the expedition, cardinal Caraffa ſailed from thence the beginning of June, and ſoon after joined the Neapolitans and Venetians. The whole fleet, which conſiſted of eighty-five ſail, made an unſucceſsful attack upon Attalia, or Satalia, a city of Pamphilia; but afterwards, when the Neapolitans had returned home, the legate ſurpriſed and plundered Smyrna, d and arrived at Rome about the end of January, with twelve camels laden with booty, and twenty-five Turkiſh captives[x]. Sixtus, during his abſence, publiſhed a bull, declaring the church of Scotland independent of the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop of York, and erecting the church of St. Andrew's into a metropolitan ſee[y]. As the Germans refuſed to pay the tythe for the Turkiſh war, the pope about the ſame time likewiſe denounced an anathema againſt thoſe who ſhould detain any part of theſe tythes[z], and ordered the archbiſhop of Canterbury to excommunicate the biſhop of Bath and his accomplices, and cite him to appear at Rome, becauſe he had impriſoned the apoſtolic nuncio, who had come into England, to collect the taxes due to the apoſtolic chamber[a].

(A) Beſſarion was moſt eloquent both in Greek and Latin, ſkilled in all the ſciences, and a great defender of the Platonic philoſophy againſt the followers of Ariſtotle. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes in divinity, philoſophy, and the Belles lettres; and as he was the oldeſt, ſo he was likewiſe reckoned the wiſeſt of all the cardinals. His actions and his diſcourſes were always ſuitable to his dignity. All matters debated in the conſiſtory, were generally referred to his deciſion; and, according to the cardinal of Pavia, the whole weight of affairs was ſupported by him alone (3). Platina, who wrote a panegyric upon him, relates, that the republic of Venice gave him 30,000 crowns for his library, which conſiſted chiefly of Greek books (4).

ing about this time gained a ſignal victory over the Perſians, ſlighted the offer of the king of Hungary. Soon after the pope created eight cardinals, three of whom were nominated by the emperor, the king of France, and the king of Naples. Ferdinand, not contented with this favour, about a month afterwards deſired a new creation to be made in favour of a certain eccleſiaſtic, who was unworthy of the dignity. Although he was very urgent in his requeſt, yet it was oppoſed by the greateſt part of the cardinals, and the new creation was deferred till Chriſtmas; before which time the king was prevailed upon to drop his ſuit. In the mean time Sixtus confirmed the order of friars minims, which had been inſtituted about thirty years before by St. Francis of Paola, a city of Calabria[c]. Being informed that ſome Carmelites at Bologna aſſerted that it was not heretical to conſult the devils, he wrote to the vicar of the biſhop to make enquiry into the truth of the report, and to give information to the apoſtolic ſee. About the ſame time he publiſhed a bull for the reduction of the jubilee to the twenty-five years, and, that the people might be excited to come to Italy, he ſuſpended all indulgencies and pardons granted for viſiting of any churches, except thoſe of Rome[d]. A few months afterwards, cardinal Riario dying, Sixtus created his brother Jeronimo prince of Imola and Forli; and, appointing him vicar of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, concluded a marriage betwixt him and the natural daughter of the duke of Milan: on which account he promoted the duke's brother to the dignity of a cardinal. Being informed likewiſe that the king of Denmark had entered Italy, attended by the duke of Lower Saxony, and a great many nobles, in the habit of pilgrims, he ſent ſome perſons to wait on him at the confines of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and to conduct him to Rome, where he was received with great honour and magnificence. The king, who was admired for his ſtature, and on account of his title of king of the Goths, behaved with great ſubmiſſion and reſpect to the pope and the ſacred college. He held the baſon when the pope waſhed his hands; and, on Good Friday he refuſed to kiſs the croſs till all the cardinals had performed that ceremony[e]. Soon after Frederic the ſecond ſon of the king of Naples, arrived at Rome in his way to Burgundy, where he propoſed to marry the duke's only daughter and heireſs. As ſeveral of the cardinals were his relations, they propoſed to receive him in a body; but the pope, by the opinion of others, ſent only the cardinal of St. Peter ad Vincula, who received him at the Appian gate, and conducted him to the Vatican.

THE following year, according to the pope's bull, the jubilee was celebrated at Rome, but not with ſuch a great concourſe of pilgrims as was expected; for many who had laid in great ſtores of proviſions were obliged to ſell them at an under-price[f]. As many perſons had entered Italy, who were afraid of proceeding to Rome, Sixtus appointed a jubilee to be held at Bologna, from the 1ſt of May to the end of the year; on which account great numbers of pilgrims reſorted to that city[g]. Among thoſe that went to Rome was Ferdinand king of Naples, who obtained from the pope the remiſſion of the yearly tribute due to the Roman ſee, on condition of ſending every year a white horſe, with his trappings to Rome[h]. Ferdinand likewiſe ſucceeded in diſſolving the alliance which had been concluded betwixt the duke of Milan, the Venetians, and Florentines[i]. The pope in the mean time, being informed that the Turks had taken Croja in Albania from the Venetians, and Caffa, a ſtrong city in the Tauric Cherſoneſe, from the Genoeſe, he wrote to the kings of Poland and Hungary, exhorting them to conclude a peace, and to unite their arms againſt the infidels. Theſe two princes began to be both alarmed at the progreſs of the Turks, and accordingly agreed to a peace; by which Matthias was left in poſſeſſion of Moravia and Sileſia, and Uladiſlaus was acknowleged king of Bohemia. Sixtus ſoon after was obliged to quit Rome on account of the plague, which raged in the city in conſequence of a dreadful inundation of the Tiber, the waters of which, in the beginning of January, had riſen to the firſt ſtep of the high altar in St. Paul's church[k]. As a means to remove this calamity, the pope publiſhed a bull for celebrating the office of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, promiſing indulgencies to thoſe who ſhould either recite the office in private, or be preſent when it was publicly celebrated[l]. This bull, however, was publicly contradicted by a great many orders of monks, who, both in their ſermons and books, aſſerted, that it was a mortal ſin to believe the immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin, and that evn to be preſent at the office was a crime[m].

The pope is obliged to quit the city on account of the plague.

THE pope about this time being apprehenſive leſt the king of France ſhould ſeize Avignon, as he had a great many troops in its neighbourhood, he ſent his nephew cardinal Julian as legate into that kingdom. His viſit was not very agreeable to the king, who obliged him to promiſe not to violate the rights, privileges, and prerogatives, of the Gallican church. Lewis likewiſe publiſhed ſeveral edicts derogatory to the honour of the apoſtolic

a see. By the first he declared, that, as the council of Constance had given an authority to kings of demanding every five years the convocation of a general council, he intended, as soon as possible, to use that privilege, and therefore ordered all the prelates to repair to their respective dioceses to expect the citation. By another he prohibited, under pain of banishment, any abbot, prior, or monk, from going out of the kingdom to the general chapter of their orders. In the mean time the Turks, after ravaging Moldavia, having been obliged to retire upon the reproach of the king of Poland with a numerous army, Matthias king of Hungary arrogated to himself the honour of their retreat, and wrote to Italy, declaring, that he had defeated them; in consideration of which pretended service his name was greatly celebrated at Rome, and he obtained a subsidy of 200,000 crowns from the pope and the states
b of Italy: however, soon after, while he was celebrating his marriage with Beatrice the daughter of the king of Naples, the Turks made themselves masters of Sinderavia, and ravaged great part of Carniola, Carinthia, and Stiria [n]. The year following Matthias lost his subsidy from the pope and the states of Italy, as he had neglected the defence of his own kingdom against the Turks, to make war upon the emperor, who had remonstrated against his marriage, as a breach of the treaty subsisting betwixt them, by which Frederick was declared heir to the kingdom of Hungary [o].

The king of France publishes several edicts derogatory to the authority of the holy see.

Mean while, the duke of Milan being assassinated in the church of St. Ambrose, Italy was soon after divided into two factions. The widow of the late duke assuming the administration of the government for her son, who was then a boy, made an alliance with the Vene-
c tians, and with Laurence and Julian Medici, who, with their friends and dependents, governed the republic of Florence. The pope, who was at enmity wtth the family of the Medici, entered into a conspiracy against them with the family of the Pazzi, and made an alliance with Ferdinand king of Naples. According to Machiavel, the pope created one Salviati, an enemy of the house of Medici, archbishop of Pisa, to whom the senate of Florence refused to give possession [p]. Other authors relate, that Laurence Medici, being offended that the pope had refused to create his brother Julian a cardinal, gave assistance in men and money to the lord of Castello, who recovered his inheritance from the pope, and likewise disappointed Sixtus in purchasing Imola, by lending money to the prince, which prevented him from selling his patrimony. In resentment for these affronts, the pope entered into a conspiracy with the Paz-
d zi, the rivals of the Medici, to murder Laurence and Julian, and to change the government of Florence. But, that such a horrid wickedness might not seem to have entered into the heart of a pope, he trusted the whole management of the plot to his nephew Jeronimo. However, he allowed him to use his authority to influence some of the Pazzi, who refused to be concerned in the plot, and prevailed with the king of Naples to send some troops into Tuscany, under pretence of recovering some towns that belonged to the ecclesiastical state; but, in reality, to seize Florence upon the death of the Medici. The conspirators, having a long time waited for an opportunity to find the two brothers together, at length determined to attack them in the cathedral church during the celebration of mass, while the archbishop of Pisa should seize the palace and surprize the senate. However, they failed in their attempt;
e for Julian was only slain, and Laurence saved himself in the vestry. The senate, likewise being alarmed with the behaviour of the archbishop, seized him and some others, and immediately put them to death; and, the people crouding to the palace in defence of Laurence, the greatest part of the conspirators were apprehended and executed [q].

Sixtus enters into a conspiracy to murder the Medici at Florence. A. D. 1478.

The pope, seeing the plot miscarry, immediately determined upon an open war, which he commenced with his spiritual arms, laying the city of Florence under an interdict, on account of the violence they had committed against the ecclesiastics, in putting the archbishop of Pisa to death, and imprisoning the cardinal of St. George, who had been sent for from Pisa to countenance the plot, and was present in the church when Julian Medici was slain. The Florentines, in their own justification, wrote to all the states of Italy, setting forth the wickedness and injustice of the pope, from whom they appealed to a general coun-
f cil; and as the papal army, with the troops of the king of Naples, were marching against them, they demanded succours from the king of France, the duke of Milan, the Venetians, and other states. They procured some assistance from the dukes of Milan, Ferrara, and Mantua, and the king of France sent them 300 horse, under the command of Philip de Commines, the famous historian [r]; by which they were enabled to oppose the progress of the enemy till winter obliged them to quit the field. The king of France likewise sent ambassadors to the pope, desiring him to take off the interdict from the Florentines, or to call a general council, declaring, that, if he would not consent, he himself, with other princes, would convoke a council to redress the grievances of the church. He assembled the nobles and prelates of his kingdom in a convention at Orleans, to consult about restoring the pragmatic ſanction and abrogating the annates, and recalled all thoſe from the Roman court who held benefices in France, under pain of forfeiting their revenues. By theſe proceedings he ſeems to have deſigned only to intimidate the pope, for nothing material was tranſacted at Orleans; however, on the 16th of Auguſt, the king publiſhed an edict, wherein, after complaining of the pope's proceedings againſt the Florentines, and of the grievous exactions of money which he ſquandered in unjuſt wars, he prohibited all his ſubjects from carrying or ſending money to Rome, or from going thither to ſollicit for benefices [s]. The pope, by the advice of the cardinal of Pavia [t], endeavoured to ſooth the king, by reminding him that Charlemagne declared, that, though the yoke of the church was grievous, it ought to be borne with ſubmiſſion and humility; he promiſed to ſend a nuncio to ſatisfy him of the juſtneſs of his proceedings againſt the Florentines, who had moſt outrageouſly violated the eccleſiaſtical liberty; that, therefore, to convoke a general council would be for the advantage of his cauſe, but this expedient was not proper, as it required a long time; and as to renewing the pragmatic ſanction, he wondered the king ſhould think of that, as he had formerly declared, that he had aboliſhed it for juſt reaſons. This anſwer of the pope did not ſatisfy the king of France, whoſe example ſeems to have been imitated by the Venetians and Milaneſe; for it appears from a monitory of Sixtus to the emperor [u], that both theſe recalled their prelates, and withdrew their obedience from the pope.

DURING theſe tranſactions, the pope being informed that the archbiſhop of Cologn was impriſoned by the landgrave of Heſſe, he ſent two legates into Germany to treat with the emperor, the landgrave, and other princes, about procuring his liberty: however, his endeavours were fruitleſs; for, after two years confinement, the archbiſhop died in priſon [w]. About the ſame time he publiſhed a bull, revoking all the powers of abſolving from crimes, which had been granted to a great many laymen as well as clergy, and, as the authority of the keys was thereby brought into contempt, for the future he reſerved that authority for the apoſtolic ſee alone [x] (C). In the mean time embaſſies had arrived at Rome from the different provinces of Europe, in vain intreating the pope to an accommodation with the Florentines. Sixtus refuſed to hearken to any terms of peace, unleſs Laurence de Medicis was delivered up: the war therefore continued, but with ſmall ſucceſs to either ſide; the advantage, however, was chiefly on the part of the pope [y]. Towards the end of the campaign the king and the pope, to give ſome hopes of peace, offered a truce for three months to the Florentines, which they accepted of: and during this ſhort reſpite, having leiſure to reflect upon their calamities, they reſolved, if poſſible, to detach Ferdinand from the pope's intereſt: accordingly Laurence de Medicis went as ambaſſador from the Florentines to Naples, where he was ſo ſucceſsful as to conclude an offenſive and defenſive alliance with Ferdinand [z]. Sixtus in the mean time was informed, that one Peter de Oſma, a profeſſor of divinity at Salamanca, had publiſhed a book, containing a great many propoſitions contrary to the catholic faith; namely, that the popes were not infallible, and could not remit the pains of purgatory, or diſpenſe with the decrees of the univerſal church; that the ſacrament of penance was only an invention of men, and that mortal ſins were only expiated by contrition of heart. Theſe propoſitions being condemned in a council held by the archbiſhop of Toledo, the pope ſoon after examined them at Rome, and confirmed the ſentence of the archbiſhop, denouncing an anathema againſt the author if he did not recant [a] (D).

(C) The inquiſition, which for a long time had been eſtabliſhed in Arragon, Italy, France, and Germany, was this year introduced into the kingdom of Caſtile, by means of Gonſalvo de Mendoza, cardinal of Spain, Thomas Tunecrémata, a Dominican friar, and the king's confeſſor was appointed governor, who upon publiſhing an edict, offering a pardon to thoſe who confeſſed their hereſy, no leſs than 17,000 became voluntary penitents. Two thouſand who were convicted of obſtinacy, were condemned to the flames, and a greater number ſaved themſelves by flight in the neighbouring provinces. From this beginning, the inquiſition acquired ſuch authority, that nothing, according to Mariana, could be a greater terror to wicked men, or of more ſervice to the common-wealth (6).

(D) This ſame year one John Ruchard, a doctor of divinity, was condemned at Mentz by the inquiſition, and ordered to recant ſome propoſitions which he had publicly preached at Worms. His book was burned before his eyes, and he himſelf ſhut up in a convent of Auguſtine friars, where he ſoon after died of grief. According to Trithemius, theſe were ſome of the chief propoſitions for which he was condemned; namely, that prelates had no authority to inſtitute any thing beſides what was taught by Chriſt and his apoſtles; that the fathers of the church did not interpret ſcripture with the ſame ſpirit by which it was wrote. Indulgences were nothing but cheats and deluſions. There was no original ſin. All prieſts were biſhops and popes, the difference betwixt them being only nominal and of human inſtitution; and that without prieſts men could be ſaved by faith, charity, and peace. Extreme unction was not a ſacrament, and was never inſtituted by Chriſt. The proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Son could not be proved from ſcripture, and therefore the doctrine of the Greeks on that article ought to be adhered to. There were ſome propoſitions likewiſe againſt canonical hours, the obſervation of holidays, the celibacy of the clergy, and the benediction of inanimate things (7).

a Soon after the pope was greatly surprised with the publication of the peace betwixt the Florentines and the king of Naples, in which neither he nor the Venetians were considered. As the Florentines could not securely trust to the friendship of Ferdinand, they immediately sent ambassadors to endeavour to appease the pope, but he still continued inexorable; however, an accident happened which obliged him to think of a reconciliation. Mohammed, having been continually infested by the knights of Rhodes, had sent a powerful army to besiege that city; and, to prevent any succours from the Italians, basha Achmet sailed with a considerable fleet from Epire, and, on the 26th of July, made a descent with 20,000 men in Italy. After a siege of seventeen days he made himself master of Otranto, a city on the coast of Calabria, where he committed all manner of barbarities, and afterwards ravaged b the coasts of the Adriatic as far as Loretto [b]. The storming of Otranto struck all Italy with consternation, and Sixtus, in despair, proposed at first to fly into France [c]; but, recovering from his panic, he desired Ferdinand to recall his troops from Tuscany, wrote to the emperor and to the other kings and princes for their assistance, ordered twenty-four gallies, which he had prepared for the relief of Rhodes, to sail into Apulia; and, as the German and French prelates had been summoned to assemble to proceed against him for his conduct towards the Florentines, he invited all the Christian princes and prelates to assemble at Rome, and intimated to the Florentines, that he was willing to hearken to an accommodation. That republic accordingly sent twelve ambassadors to Rome, who were absolved, and admitted into the presence of the pope, after they had submitted to lie down before the door of St. Peter's c church, and to receive some strokes with a rod [d]. Sixtus behaved to them with great haughtiness, and after the articles of peace were agreed to, and the benediction read, he added, that, if they would enjoy the fruits of the benediction, they must maintain fifteen gallies against the Turks while they continued in Italy. The Florentines remonstrated against this heavy imposition, and sent another ambassador to Rome, who ratified the peace, and obtained some alleviation of the subsidy imposed upon them [e]. Sixtus about the same time sent his nephew cardinal Julian as his legate to France, to reconcile Lewis XI. and Maximilian the emperor's son, who had married the heiress of the late duke of Burgundy; but Maximilian, the year before having gained a victory over the king of France, refused to hearken to any accommodation. The legate, finding his endeavours to conclude a peace

d ineffectual, returned to Italy, together with cardinal Balues, a French bishop, who had been detained eleven years in prison by the king on account of treason [f].

Sollicits the assistance of the Christian princes. A. D. 1481.

Mean while, in order to oppose the progress of the Turks, Sixtus published a letter, addressed to all kings and princes, enjoining those who were at war to conclude a peace, or, at least a truce for three years, and exhorting them to a crusade against the infidels [g]. This letter produced but small effect among the Christian princes; however we find that the king of Scotland, who had assembled a powerful army to invade England, stopped his march upon a prohibition from a certain apostolic legate who was then in Britain, although the English at the same time despised the legate's authority, and attacked Scotland [h]. Several of the Italian states assisted Ferdinand with money and ships; his uncle the king of Castile sent 3000

e men [i]; his son-in-law the king of Hungary, in consideration of a large subsidy, sent 2000 horse into Apulia; who, according to Bonfinius, proposed to attack the Turks the same hour that they arrived in the Italian camp [k]. But what contributed more than all his auxiliaries to free his kingdom from the ravages of the infidels, was the death of Mohammed, which happened on the third of May. The Turks who had seized Otranto, being deprived of succours during the dispute betwixt the sons of Mohammed about the succession, Ferdinand soon after made himself master of the city, and obliged them to evacuate Italy.

Mohammed dies, and the Turks evacuate Italy.

Sixtus, having quite exhausted his treasury in subsidies against the Turks, imposed new tythes upon the clergy, and instituted several new offices in the Roman court; which were put to sale, without regard to the qualifications of the persons who bought them [l]. But,

f instead of assisting Ferdinand to prosecute the war against the Turks, he involved Italy in new broils, in order to satisfy his own private revenge. In resentment for the separate peace which Ferdinand had concluded with the Florentines, he entered into an alliance against him with the Venetians, sending his nephew Jeronimo thither with a magnificent retinue, under pretence of receiving the honour of nobility in that city [m]; but, in reality to concert with them a scheme for attacking Ferdinand's son-in-law, the duke of Ferrara. Accordingly the following year the Venetians, who were elated with their great wealth and power, A. D. 1482. having made a partition of the duchy with Jeronimo, took an opportunity to quarrel with the duke, under pretence that their resident at Ferrara had been affronted, and that the duke had impoſed ſome cuſtoms upon their ſhips contrary to treaty [n]. On the ſecond of May they declared war againſt the duke; and, attacking him by ſea and land, quickly made themſelves maſters of the greateſt part of his territories. Mean while his ambaſſadors, and thoſe of Ferdinand, the Florentines, and Milaneſe, finding their endeavours to detach Sixtus from the party of the Venetians ineffectual, left Rome, where the pope was making the greateſt preparations for war, contrary to the inclination of the Romans, who openly condemned his proceedings, and, on the eve of Whitſuntide, one father Tuſcanella, in his ſermon, inveighed with the greateſt freedom againſt the pope and the whole court. Sixtus, however, filled the city with ſoldiers, and ſent his nephew Jeronimo, with an army, to oppoſe the Neapolitans, who, under the command of Alphonſo, the king's eldeſt ſon, wanted to force their way to the duchy of Ferrara, through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. As the pope was obliged to keep a ſtrong garriſon in Rome, to prevent an inſurrection of the people, his army was not able to act offenſively; and the Colonnæ and Savelli revolting to Alphonſo, and admitting his troops into two of their towns, the Neapolitans ravaged the Roman territory to the very gates of Rome. At the ſame time it was reported in the city, that the emperor had aſſembled a council at Baſil, to proceed againſt the pope [o].

Sixtus in this extremity excommunicated all his enemies, impriſoned the cardinals Colonna and Savelli in the caſtle of St. Angelo, made an alliance with the Genoeſe [p], and ſollicited a reinforcement from the Venetians. That republic accordingly ſent Malateſta, lord of Rimini, with a conſiderable body of troops, who, joining the army under Jeronimo, attacked and defeated the Neapolitans, with conſiderable loſs, taking a great many priſoners, among whom was the duke of Melphi, who was honourably treated by the pope, and ſent back to Naples. A few weeks after, ambaſſadors arrived at Rome from Ferdinand to treat of peace, and others arriving alſo from the king's allies, the pope was prevailed upon to agree to a peace and mutual alliance for twenty years, on theſe conditions: That all places taken during the war ſhould be reſtored, the allies ſhould pay a ſubſidy of 40,000 crowns to Jeronimo for three years, and, for their mutual defence, ſhould furniſh a certain quota of troops, which ſhould be commanded by the cardinal legate of Mantua. The treaty was publiſhed on Chriſtmas day, and thirty days were allowed to the Venetians and all the allies on both ſides to declare their aſſent [q]. A few days after the duke of Calabria arrived at Rome, where he was treated with great honour by the pope (E). After ſome conferences he proceeded to the relief of Ferrara; which, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon, was beſieged by the enemy. The pope, before the publication of the peace, had written to the Venetians, deſiring them to ceaſe hoſtilities, and to accede to the general peace; but that republic, elated with their ſucceſſes, refuſed to hearken to any accommodation, and finding that the pope had abandoned them, and concluded an alliance with their enemies, they threatened to introduce the Turks into Apulia, and ſent an ambaſſador to Renè, duke of Lorrain, offering him their aſſiſtance in making good his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples [r]. Sixtus, finding the Venetians reſolved to continue the war, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt them, and his legate, the cardinal of Mantua, held a general council of the confederates at Cremona, in which they ſettled the plan of operation for the campaign. In conſequence of the deliberations of that aſſembly, the duke of Calabria entered the Venetian territories, and ravaged the country in the neighbourhood of Bergamo, Breſcia, and Verona, while his brother Frederic ſailed into the Adriatic with a fleet, and ſeized a great many Venetian ſhips at Ancona, and on the coaſts of Dalmatia.

THE Venetians, being reduced to great extremity for want of money, and of ſailors to man their fleet, had recourſe to ſupplications and proceſſions, and ſent ambaſſadors to the emperor, to prevail with him to renounce his obedience to the pope, and to call a general council [s]. During theſe tranſactions in Lombardy, the pope being informed of the death of Lewis XI. of France, and Edward IV. of England, ordered the ſervice of the dead to be celebrated for them both. Soon after he ſent the cardinals Colonna and Savelli at liberty, and promoted five others to that dignity. About the ſame time new diſturbances happened at Rome, by a ſecond revolt of the family of Colonnæ; but Jeronimo, attacking their palace with the pope's guards, after a ſharp reſiſtance, forced the houſe, and took Laurence Colonna

MEAN while Lewis Sforza, governor of the duke of Milan, thinking himſelf neglected by the duke of Calabria, was prevailed upon to agree to a ſeparate peace with the Venetians, which was concluded on the ſeventh of Auguſt [t]. This peace, which was greatly to the advantage of the Venetians, gave great diſſatisfaction to the allies: however, they were obliged to accede, as they were not able to continue the war againſt that republic, when ſtrengthened by the alliance of the Milaneſe. Their ambaſſadors immediately proceeded to Rome, where the pope had been for ſome days greatly afflicted with the gout: altho' he had that day diſmiſſed the b cardinals without holding a conſiſtory, yet he ordered the ambaſſadors to be introduced into his chamber; where, upon hearing the terms of peace, in which his nephew Jeronimo was not conſidered, he exclaimed with great vehemence againſt the allies, his voice even failing him during his diſcourſe. The phyſicians being called in, the ambaſſadors retired, and the pope, being carried to his bed, languiſhed a few days, and died on the 13th of Auguſt [u] (F). Sixtus, during his pontificate, adorned the city of Rome with ſeveral new buildings; particularly by rebuilding the bridge of Janicula over the Tyber, which is now called Ponte Seſto. He likewiſe built the famous Vatican library, which he furniſhed with books from all parts of Europe, and appropriated certain revenues for purchaſing of books, and maintaining Greek, Latin, and Hebrew librarians [w]. However, he does not appear to c have been very liberal to men of genius and learning. Theodorus Gaza, having preſented to him a fine edition of Ariſtotle's books on animals, received from him only 200 ducats; which, from diſdain, he immediately threw into the Tyber [x]: and Raphael of Volaterra relates, that he ſaw many eminent men who came to Rome in great expectation, who were obliged ſoon after to depart in great want [y].

Conclude a ſeparate peace with the Milaneſe. A. D. 1484.

The pope is greatly offended; and dies at Rome.

UPON the death of Sixtus all Rome was in confuſion. Jeronimo immediately retired with ſome of his troops to the caſtle of Spoletto, and ſent others to defend his palace in Rome; but the college of cardinals would not admit them into the city, and his palace was burned by the party of Savelli and Colonnæ, his counteſs being obliged to ſave herſelf in the houſe of the cardinal of Milan. However, the oppoſite party of the Urſini were in poſſeſſion of d the caſtle of St. Angelo, and ſome other places of ſtrength in Rome, and threatened to elect a pope by themſelves. The cardinals who were in the other intereſt, to prevent a ſchiſm, granted Jeronimo 6000 ducats as arrears due to him as general of the church, and gave him a ſafe conduct to retire into Imola; on which account the Urſini ſurrendered the caſtle of St. Angelo, and a truce was made for a month betwixt both parties, that the pope might be legally elected [z]. Accordingly twenty-five cardinals entered the conclave on the 26th of Auguſt, and next day choſe John Baptiſta Cylio, cardinal biſhop of Melphi, born at Genoa, of a noble family, which had formerly come from Greece [a]. He had ſpent the firſt part of his life in the ſervice of the king of Naples, as a layman, and by a wife had ſeveral children. After her death he took orders, and was created biſhop of Melphi and cardinal by e Sixtus IV [b]. The new pope aſſumed the name of Innocent VIII. and ſoon after his election ſent legates to the different princes of Europe, exhorting them to peace, and to a general alliance againſt the Turks. In the beginning of the following year, he abſolved the Venetians from the excommunication and interdict denounced againſt them by Sixtus, and endeavoured to reconcile the Colonnæ and Urſini, who continued hoſtilities againſt each other in the neighbourhood of Rome, to the great diſturbance of the city.

A. D. 1485.

WHILE he exhorted others to peace, he himſelf engaged in a war againſt Ferdinand king of Naples, in behalf of the city of Aquila, and ſeveral nobles who had revolted, becauſe the king, for ſome ſlight ſuſpicions, had ordered the count Montorio to be put to death. Innocent, upon their complaint, cited Ferdinand to appear at Rome, and gave the command of f the church forces to Robert Sanſeverius, who had been the general of the Venetians in the late war [c]. The Urſini family adhered to the party of Ferdinand, and ſeveral places were taken by the forces on both ſides; but no action happened of any great conſequence. In January following the Urſini were reconciled to the pope, and ſoon after, at the interceſſion of the ambaſſador of the king of Spain, Ferdinand agreed to a peace on theſe conditions;

This peace was guarantied by the king of Spain, the duke of Milan, and Laurence de Medicis; but the pope had no ſooner diſbanded his forces, than it was violated by Ferdinand, who impriſoned the barons that had put themſelves under the protection of Innocent, and a few months afterwards put them to death, and confiſcated their eſtates. The pope remonſtrated with great vehemence againſt his proceedings; and, in the mean time, having received an embaſſy from the emperor, informing him that the princes of the empire propoſed to elect his ſon Maximilian, king of the Romans, he gave his conſent, upon being aſſured of the obedience of the archduke, and that he would confirm the privileges of the apoſtolic ſee [e].

The German clergy refuſe to pay a tythe impoſed upon them by the pope. A. D. 1488.

INNOCENT, being exhauſted by the war with the king of Naples, imitated his predeceſſor Sixtus, by inſtituting ſeveral new offices, which he put to ſale. He likewiſe impoſed a tythe upon the German clergy; but they complaining to the emperor of this grievance, he was prevailed upon, at the interceſſion of Frederic, to remit that tax [f]. About the ſame time the pope concluded an alliance betwixt his ſon and a daughter of Laurence de Medicis, and entered into a treaty with the Venetians, the marquiſſes of Montferrat and Mantua, and with ſeveral other ſtates. He likewiſe ſollicited the Florentine ambaſſador, and thoſe of the king of Caſtile and of the duke of Milan, to exhort the king of Naples to obſerve the late peace, otherwiſe he would draw upon himſelf the reſentment of the apoſtolic ſee [g]. In the mean time he was alarmed with the revolt of Boccalino, governor of Oſimo, a ſtrong city in the marche of Ancona. The governor, finding the garriſon diſcontented upon account of the great arrears of their pay, prevailed upon them to revolt, and by their aſſiſtance, expelled thoſe who favoured the pope, and ſent his brother with an offer of ſubmiſſion to the grand ſignior. But, by the perſuaſion of the Venetian governor in Romagna, he was prevailed upon to deliver up the city to the pope; and, having obtained ſecurity for his perſon, he retired to Florence [h]. Soon after Innocent being ſollicited by the Venetians to mediate a peace betwixt them and the archduke of Auſtria, who, upon a diſpute about ſome iron-mines, had attacked their territories, he ſent the biſhop of Oſimo as his legate to the Auſtrian camp, who was ſo ſucceſsful as to conclude a peace [i]. Mean while he publiſhed a bull, condemning a book of John Picus, count of Concordia and Mirandola, prohibiting any one from reading it under pain of excommunication; but he did not cenſure the author, as he declared that he publiſhed the book only as a ſubject for ſcholaſtic diſputations, and under the correction of the apoſtolic ſee [k] (G).

IN the beginning of the following year, Innocent made a promotion of ſeveral cardinals, among whom was the ſon of Laurence de Medicis, a boy of fourteen years of age, and Peter Daubuſſon, grand maſter of Rhodes, who had lately gratified the pope by allowing his priſoner Zem, or Zizim, brother of the grand ſignor, to be tranſported to Rome. Zem had been firſt ſent to France, where he was guarded by the knights of Rhodes; but Charles VIII. conſenting to his removal, he arrived at Rome about the middle of March, and was preſented to the pope in a public conſiſtory, by the ambaſſador of France; but, notwithſtanding the intreaties and threats of all who were preſent, he would not kneel before his holineſs, or conſent to kiſs his feet [l]. (G) John Picus was deſcended of the antient family of the counts of Mirandola, celebrated in Italy from the year 1110. He was much more illuſtrious for his genius than his nobility, and obtained the title of the phœnix of his age, and by Scaliger is called Monſtrum ſine Vitio. At the age of ten years he ſtudied the law, and publiſhed commentaries on that ſubject. At eighteen years of age he underſtood twenty-two languages, and had only entered his twenty-fifth year when he publiſhed his book containing 900 theſes in logic, divinity, mathematics, magic, phyſics, and the cabala, which he undertook to defend. The advocates of ignorance were greatly alarmed, and prevailed with the pope to condemn his book. However, he juſtified himſelf in an apology, in which, as a proof of the ignorance of his oppoſers, he mentions, that a theologian, who had ſhewn himſelf very zealous in cenſuring his book, being aſked what was the meaning of the word cabala, he anſwered, That he was a wicked man and a heretic, who had written againſt Jeſus Chriſt, and that thoſe who followed his opinion were called Cabaliſts. Picus died at Florence in the 23d year of his age, and is interred in the church of St. Mark, with the following epitaph upon his tomb:

a of the Romans, had been impriſoned by the inhabitants of Bruges, under ſuſpicion of having attempted to deprive them of their liberties, he wrote to the archbiſhop of Cologn, ordering him to excommunicate the rebels, if they did not ſet their prince at liberty within a certain time. A remonſtrance againſt this letter of the pope was publiſhed in France, urging that it muſt either be a forgery, or had been ſubſcribed by the pope without his peruſal of the contents, as the Flemings acknowledged no ſuperior but the king of France [m]. The cenſures of the pope were not regarded by the rebels; however, after they had put to death ſeveral of the king's party they ſet him again at liberty [n]. During this diſturbance in Flanders, Innocent, at the intreaty of James III. king of Scotland, had ſent a legate into that kingdom, to prevail with the nobles to lay down their arms and ſubmit to his authority; but b before his arrival the king, having ventured an engagement with the rebels, was defeated and ſlain [o] (H). A few months after Innocent, not having been able to obtain ſatisfaction from Ferdinand for his violation of the late treaty, denounced an anathema againſt him if he did not repent within ſixty days. Ferdinand paying no regard to this threatning, the pope, on the 11th of September, declared him excommunicated. He likewiſe depoſed him from the kingdom of Naples, publiſhed a cruſade againſt him, and, as the king of France pretended to the kingdom of Sicily, in right of the late duke of Anjou, he invited that prince with an army into Italy, and appointed him general of the cruſade [p]. Ferdinand, however, ſtill deſpiſed all theſe fulminations; and the biſhop of Alexandria, his ambaſſador, had the confidence in the conſiſtory to appeal from Innocent to a general council.

c THE pope, in the mean time, ſent a legate to Germany, by whoſe mediation a peace was concluded betwixt the archduke Maximilian and the king of France, with regard to their diſputes in Flanders and Brittany. About the ſame time he ſent nuncios to the different kingdoms and republics of Europe, deſiring them to ſend their deputies to Rome, to deliberate about a general expedition againſt the Turks, under pretence of aſſiſting Zem againſt his brother Badjazet. A numerous convention was accordingly held at Rome the year following, in the month of March, in which it was agreed, that the pope ſhould have liberty to raiſe tythes, annates, or daily contributions, for the expences of the war; that each prince ſhould furniſh, according to a ſettled proportion, either money, ſoldiers, or proviſions; that if the king of France, Spain, or England, ſhould go in perſon againſt the Turks, d the pope ſhould likewiſe accompany him; but if none of thoſe kings engaged perſonally in the expedition, the forces by ſea and land ſhould be commanded by two cardinal legates; and, laſtly, that the Italians, French, Spaniards, and Engliſh ſhould act by ſea, and the Germans, Bohemians, Poles, and Hungarians, by land [q]. All theſe fine promiſes vaniſhed, without taking effect; and Innocent ſoon after received an embaſſy from the Soltan of Ægypt, who was at war with the Turks, deſiring Zem to be ſent to him, in order to diſtreſs the enemy. However, an ambaſſador about the ſame time arriving from Bajazet, intreating the pope to detain his brother, and offering an annual ſubſidy of 40,000 ducats for his ſubſiſtence, Innocent accepted of his propoſal, and dropped all thoughts of the expedition [r]. Nevertheleſs, it appears, that he did not neglect to raiſe the tythes in France; for he ſent a e mandate to the cardinal archbiſhop of Lyons, and others, ordering them to impoſe a tythe upon all eccleſiaſtics, ſecular and regular, and to depoſe and excommunicate thoſe who refuſed to pay [s]. At the ſame time he wrote to the king of France, allowing him two thirds of the ſaid tax for his expences in defending the church; on which account the univerſity of Paris accuſed the pope of impoſing the tythe only with the intention of ſecuring one third of it for his private advantage, and not for employing it in any public expedition; they therefore appealed from him to the apoſtolic ſee when better informed, and likewiſe to a future general council. In the mean time the pope granted a bull, confirming a ſociety, which a few years before had been inſtituted at Rome, under the name of the Miſericordia, for comforting thoſe who were under ſentence of death, and for taking charge of their funerals [t]. f According to Volaterranus, he likewiſe allowed maſs to be celebrated in Norway without wine; but Spondanus alleges, that this author muſt certainly be miſtaken, as it is the opinion of theologians that the pope has no power to alter the divine inſtitution [u].

The pope grants a ſubſidy to the king of Spain againſt the Morrs. A. D. 1492.

As Ferdinand, king of Spain, at this time was beſieging Granada, the capital city of the Moors, Innocent allowed him an annual ſubſidy of 70,000 crowns during the continuance of the war, which was concluded in the beginning of the following year, the city of Granada ſurrendering after a ſiege of eight months, and the Mooriſh king retiring, with great part of his ſubjects into Africa [w]. At the ſame time, by the interceſſion of the king of Spain, a peace was concluded betwixt Innocent and the king of Naples, who ſeems to have been prevailed upon to ſubmit to the pope, from his apprehenſions of the king of France, who was making great preparations to enter Italy. Ferdinand promiſed to pay the annual tribute according to antient cuſtom, to leave the collation of benefices to the pope, and to give ſatisfaction to the ſons and heirs of thoſe whom he had put to death; on which account the pope abſolved him from all eccleſiaſtical cenſures, and gave a new inveſtiture of the kingdom, not only to himſelf, but to his eldeſt ſon Alphonſus, duke of Calabria. The ambaſſador of René, duke of Lorrain, proteſted in a public conſiſtory, againſt this new inveſtiture. However, his proteſtation had no other effect than to procure a pretended diſquiſition of the duke's right, by ſome cardinals and auditors of the rota [x]. Innocent ſurvived this peace only a few weeks, and died on the 25th of July, in the 8th year of his pontificate, leaving Italy in great tranquility, having ſo ballanced the power of each ſtate, that, in all probability, the public quiet ſeemed ſecured for many years. However, this happineſs was of very ſhort continuance; for ſoon after his death, the nation was involved in all the miſeries of war, which was chiefly owing to the ambition of his ſucceſſor, and the unfortunate death of Laurence de Medicis, who had acquired a great authority, and was a check upon the king of Naples and the governor of Milan, two princes of equal power and ambition [y].

He is reconciled to the king of Naples,

and dies at Rome.

THE death of Innocent was no ſooner publiſhed, than all Rome was in confuſion, occaſioned by the factions formed by the different pretenders to the pontificate, the chief of whom were the cardinals Sforza and Rovere. However both theſe candidates were prevailed upon to reſign their pretenſions in favour of cardinal Roderic Borgia, who, by great promiſes and a liberal diſtribution of the great riches which he had amaſſed, acquired the plurality of the votes of the cardinals; and on the 10th of Auguſt was declared pope, by the name of Alexander VI. [z]. He had been created a cardinal when a young man by his uncle Calixtus III. but his life was ſo infamous, that Pius II. after having often reproved him, at length drove him from his preſence [a]. As his character was well known, his election alarmed all Italy; Ferdinand particularly declared, with tears, to his queen, that a pope had been choſen who would be moſt pernicious to all Chriſtendom. This aſſertion of the king of Naples is confirmed by almoſt all the Italian poets and hiſtorians of theſe times. According to Guicciardini, Alexander had great natural abilities, and was remarkable for his addreſs and power of perſuaſion; but was chiefly diſtinguiſhed by his vices, which he enumerates, namely, debauchery, inſincerity, impudence, irreligion, avarice, ambition, barbarous cruelty, and an immoderate deſire of promoting his natural children to dignities and honours [b] (I).

The ſtates of Italy agree to congratulate him as a conjunct body.

HIS election being publiſhed, the ſtates of Italy propoſed to congratulate him by their ambaſſadors; and, by the advice of Lewis Sforza, governor of Milan, and uncle to the duke, they had agreed, that all their ambaſſadors ſhould enter Rome on the ſame day, appear at the ſame time in the public conſiſtory, and that one of them ſhould addreſs the pope in the name of all the reſt, whereby Italy might ſeem one united body, and the pope might have no hopes of diſturbing the public tranquillity. This propoſal was prevented from being put in execution by Peter de Medicis, eldeſt ſon of the late Laurence, who, from a youthful vanity, deſired to diſplay his magnificence at Rome, as ambaſſador from Florence. This proceeding of Peter, in which he was joined by the king of Naples, gave great umbrage to Lewis Sforza; he accordingly took the firſt opportunity of exciting the pope againſt them both: and Virginius Urſini, Peter's brother-in-law, having about this time bought ſome caſtles in the neighbourhood of Rome, from the nephew of the late pope, he perſuaded Alex-

The pope accordingly inſiſted that Virginius ſhould pay other 40,000 ducats to him, as ſupreme lord of thoſe caſtles, which he had purchaſed from Cibo: but this propoſal being rejected, he again offered to give the inveſtiture of the caſtles to Virginius, and to conclude an alliance with Ferdinand, if the duke of Calabria would give one of his natural daughters to one of his ſons. Alphonſus diſdaining this alliance, the pope, in the month of April, concluded an offenſive and defenſive treaty with the republic of Venice, and with Lewis Sforza, governor of Milan, who having uſurped the government from his nephew John Galeazzo, was afraid of the reſentment of Ferdinand, who, at the intreaty of his granddaughter, Galeazzo's wife, had ſent an ambaſſador to Milan, deſiring Lewis to reſign the

LEWIS, far from hearkening to this propoſal, ſent ambaſſadors into France, deſiring Charles VIII. to renew his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, and offering to aſſiſt him in that enterprize both with men and money [d]. The pope readily agreed to this propoſal, in hopes of obtaining from Ferdinand through fear, what formerly he could not procure voluntarily; and Charles, being prompted by ſeveral Neapolitan exiles, and by his favourites, who flattered him not only with the conqueſt of Naples, but even of the Turkiſh empire, entered into an alliance with Sforza, and promiſed to march with an army into Italy. Ferdinand, to avert this ſtorm, propoſed to Sforza to confirm him in his government, endeavoured to conclude an alliance with the king of France, and reſolved immediately to he is reconciled to Ferdinand:

IN the mean time, being informed by the ambaſſadors of the king of Spain that Chriſtopher Columbus had diſcovered America, or the Weſt-Indies, he publiſhed a bull, granting to Ferdinand and Iſabella, and to their heirs, all the iſlands and continents diſcovered or to be diſcovered, on the weſt ſide of a meridian line, which line ſhould be computed 100 leagues to the weſtward of the iſles of Cape Verd, and the Azores: from this grant, however, he ex-d cepted all thoſe lands which were already found out by other Chriſtian princes, on the weſt ſide of the ſaid line. Theſe he left as the property of the poſſeſſors, and beſides made it a condition of his grant, that the king ſhould ſend learned and pious men to inſtruct the inhabitants of thoſe countries in the Chriſtian faith [f]. Soon after, at the deſire of Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary, he ordered a cruſade to be preached againſt the Turks, charging his legate the biſhop of Trani, to negotiate an accommodation betwixt Hungary, Poland, and the emperor Maximilian, who, a few months before, had ſucceeded his father Frederic, that thoſe two kingdoms, together with the empire, might unite their forces againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendom; for which purpoſe he likewiſe wrote to the kings of Poland and Hungary, and to the princes of the empire [g]. About the ſame time he made a promotion of e twelve cardinals at Rome, among whom was Cæſar Borgia, one of his natural ſons, whoſe elevation was vigorouſly oppoſed for ſome time by the whole ſacred college [h] (K). Being ſtill deſirous of procuring new dignities to his children, he again threatened to deſert the king of Naples, if he would not compel the cardinal of St. Peter to deliver up the caſtle of Oſtia, attributing the cardinal's rebellion to the king's inſtigation. Ferdinand in vain proteſted his innocence; but death prevented him from feeling the reſentment of the pope, he being cut off by an apoplexy in the end of January.

ALEXANDER, during this ſecond rupture, had again, in appearance, embraced the intereſt of the king of France, having, at his requeſt, created the biſhop of St. Malo a cardinal; and having, in conjunction with Lewis Sforza, taken into his pay Praſpero Colonna,

the French king would ceaſe his warlike preparations, and refer his pretenſions to the deciſion claim. About the ſame time Alexander having recovered the caſtle of Oſtia, propoſed to Alphonſus to unite their forces in Romagna, and to fit out ſeveral gallies, as the king of France had already taken poſſeſſion of Genoa, and was equipping a fleet at Marſeilles, with the intention of attacking Naples by ſea. The king agreed to this propoſal, and ſoon after had a cited the aſſiſtance of the king of Spain, and ſent a private embaſſy for the ſame purpoſe to b the emperor of the Turks, informing him that the king of France, after he had conquered Naples, intended to attack Greece. The ambaſſadors brought nothing from Bajazet but magnificent promiſes; but Ferdinand of Caſtile promiſing to ſend a fleet to the aſſiſtance of the king of Naples, the pope allowed him to apply all the money raiſed in his kingdom for the cruſade, to the preſent expedition [i]. He likewiſe publiſhed a bull, prohibiting the king of France from entering Italy, under pain of eccleſiaſtical cenſures; and by his nuncio at Venice, ſolicited that republic to enter into an alliance with him and Alphonſus, againſt the

CHARLES however, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of all his nobles, and his great want of money, which obliged him to pawn his jewels, at the inſtigation of the cardinal of St. c Peter's, reſolved to proſecute his expedition, and paſſing over the Alps, in the end of Auguſt, arrived at Aſti on the 9th of September, where he was joined by Lewis Sforza, who accompachaſed from the emperor the year before. Mean while the king of France, being in great difficulty for want of money, and ſeeing no commotion in Italy in his favour, began to deliberate about repaſſing the Alps; but, being ſtill urged by the duke of Milan, he advanced with his army, and took poſſeſſion of Lucca, Piſa, and Florence, from which laſt city

Peter de Medicis had been expelled by the people, who declared for the French. Before king d Charles had arrived at Florence, the Colonneſi had likewiſe declared for him at Rome, and had ſeized the caſtle of Oſtia in his name. The pope then publiſhed loud complaints of the injuries he had received from the French, aſked the aſſiſtance of all Chriſtian princes, particularly of the king of Spain and the Venetians, and recalled his troops from the army in Romag-na, with the intention of fortifying Rome. He likewiſe ſent Franceſco Picolomini, cardinal of Siena, as his ambaſſador to Charles, but the king refuſed to admit him to an audience; and having ſeized the Turkiſh ambaſſador, who was carrying 40,000 ducats to Rome, he ordered his fleet to proceed to Oſtia, to aſſiſt thoſe that had declared for him [l]. Advancing ſoon after with his army towards Siena, the pope again ſent three ambaſſadors to him to treat of an accommodation; but he declaring, that he intended to treat at Rome, Alexander e immediately apprehended the cardinals Colonna and Sforza, and admitted the duke of Calabria with his army into the city, being greatly apprehenſive of the deſigns of Charles. As he knew the king was accompanied by the cardinal of St. Peter, and was favoured by the greateſt part of the ſacred college, who were his enemies, he was greatly afraid of a rumour that prevailed, that the king intended to reform the church: he likewiſe dreaded his reſentment, for having joined the king of Naples, after he had invited him into Italy; but receiving an embaſſy from him, declaring that he had no intention to interfere with the pontifical authority, and deſiring to enter Rome in a peaceable manner, he conſented to what he could not prevent.

He enters Rome in triumph.

A. D. 1495.

THE king of France accordingly entered Rome in a triumphant manner on the laſt day of f
December, late at night; but the pope, inſtead of receiving him, retired, in great terror, with two cardinals to the caſtle of St. Angelo. The other cardinals, to the number of eigh-

Charles concluded a treaty with him, by which it was agreed, that, till the conqueſt of *Na-

a grand signor (M); and lastly, that Cæsar Borgia, cardinal of Valentia, should accompany the king three months as apostolical legate. This treaty being concluded, the pope returned to his palace, and afterwards received the king with great pomp in the church of St. Peter. The sacred college was highly offended with the king, for agreeing to an accommodation with the pope, and eight of the cardinals immediately left Rome. Charles likewise, in the end of January, marched with his army from the city towards Naples; but before his departure, he was informed, that Alphonsus had resigned his kingdom to his son Ferdinand, and had fled into Sicily. Ferdinand, however, was unable to make any opposition, and fled himself to the island of Ischia, leaving his kingdom to the possession of Charles, who entered Naples in a triumphant manner on the 22d of February.

He concludes a treaty with him, contrary to their inclinations, and makes an easy conquest of Naples.

b The rapid progress of the French king greatly alarmed all Italy, especially as he had left French garrisons in the fortified places of those territories through which he had passed, and still refused to withdraw them. Cæsar Borgia having fled from his camp before he had arrived at Naples, the pope thought himself no longer bound to observe the treaty which he had lately concluded with him at Rome; and in the month of April entered into an alliance with the emperor, the king of Spain, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, under pretence of opposing the Turks, but in reality to oblige Charles to quit his conquests in Italy, by a secret article, the duke of Milan engaging to prevent any succours coming from France, which kingdom at the same time should be attacked by the emperor and the king of Spain [n]. Charles being informed of this treaty, immediately resolved to return to France, before his
c enemies had assembled a force sufficient to oppose him; accordingly having left Gilbert Montpensier as his viceroy, with about 3000 horse, and a small body of infantry, on the 20th of May he left Naples with the rest of his army, and marched directly for Rome. Alexander, having again assembled his troops, and got some auxiliaries from his allies, proposed to oppose the king; but, his fear prevailing, he abandoned the city and fled to Orvieto, and from thence to Perugia. Charles continued but two days in Rome, and proceeded through Viterbo, Siena, and Pisa, to Fornovo, a village situated within eight miles of Parma. His camp was there attacked on the 6th of July, by the Venetians; but the enemy being repulsed, he advanced towards Asti and Turin, and, passing the Alps, arrived at Grenoble on the 27th of October.

The pope concludes a treaty against him with several princes.

He returns to France, and

d The day after the battle at Fornovo, Ferdinand had returned to Italy, and being assisted by a great many volunteers from Sicily, and some troops from Spain, commanded by the famous Gonsalvo Hernandes of Cordova, he immediately recovered several places in the kingdom of Naples; which success had encouraged the pope to send a nuncio to the king of France, ordering him, under pain of ecclesiastical censures, to quit Italy within ten days, and to withdraw his troops from Naples within a limited time. This command was treated with great contempt by Charles, who threatened to return to Rome: however his affairs obliged him to repass the Alps. After his departure the pope sent troops to assist Ferdinand, and pro- A. D. 1496.
hibited the Genoese, under pain of excommunication, from allowing the French to build any ships in their territories. Ferdinand, by the succours sent him by the pope, and the assis-
e tance of the Spanish and Venetian fleets, quickly recovered the greatest part of his kingdom. However, the troubles of Italy were not thereby composed; for a great many cities in Romagna and Tuscany were engaged in particular disputes, and Aquila and Perugia, with many other cities in the ecclesiastical state, refused obedience to the pope, and adhered to the party of the king of France, who had sent to the duke of Milan, demanding a passage and provisions for 30,000 horse, with which he proposed to enter Italy [o]. His threatening a second expedition struck a great terror into the Italian states; the pope caused the castle of St. Angelo to be repaired, and the Venetians sollicited the king of England to declare war against France; but not succeeding at that court, they, with the duke of Milan, invited the emperor to enter Italy, and to take the command of their army, promising to take 4000
f Swiss into their pay, and to allow him 20,000 ducats per month [p].

The king of France threatens to return to Italy.

The emperor readily agreed to this proposal; and, against the inclination of the Germans, entered Italy in the month of August, with 1000 horse and 500 foot. The pope being informed of his arrival, sent his bastard son, cardinal Borgia, to crown him emperor at Milan, as the Venetians had refused him a passage to Rome through their territories [q]. (M) Zem, or Zizim, died at Naples, or according to different authors, at Capua, or Terracina, having been poisoned by the connivance of the pope, before he was delivered to the king of France (4). The Turkish annals relate, that he was poisoned by one Mustapha, sent to Rome by Bajazet with the annual pension, and that the pope gave his consent (5); which is in some measure confirmed by a letter of Bajazet to the pope, wherein he advises Alexander to hasten the death of his brother, which at any rate must happen some time, and promises him 30,000 crowns if he would send his corpse to any port in the Turkish dominions (6).

after his arrival, the Venetians being informed of the death of the dauphin of France, which freed them from their apprehenſions of a French invaſion, they therefore reſolved to free themſelves likewiſe from the emperor; and for that purpoſe perſuaded him to undertake the ſiege of Leghorn, which ſtill held for the French, and was ſtrongly fortified. Maximilian accordingly opened the ſiege; but his forces being inconſiderable, he quickly found the enterprize impracticable, and retired to Pavia, from whence he returned diſſatisfied to Germany, the Venetians having neglected to pay their part of the ſubſidy [r].

A FEW weeks before the departure of the emperor, Ferdinand died at Naples, after he had recovered all his kingdom except Taranto and Gaeta. As he left no children, he was ſucceeded by his uncle Frederic, who ſoon recovered Gaeta and Taranto, and detained Virginius Urſini, and his ſon Paul, priſoners in the caſtle of Naples, they having in the late troubles adhered to the party of the king of France. On this pretence the pope thought proper at this time to declare them rebels, and ſent his ſon, the duke of Candia, with ſome troops to take poſſeſſion of their eſtates, who quickly made himſelf maſter of ſix of their caſtles. Alexander impriſoned ſeveral of the cardinals who oppoſed his proceedings, while others of them, to ſave themſelves, were obliged to fly to different parts of Italy [s]. However, he was ſoon prevailed upon to conclude a peace, his forces having been ſurprized and defeated by thoſe of the Urſini, and the duke of Urbino, and many other perſons of diſtinction taken priſoners, among whom ſome authors mention the duke of Candia [t]. All the territories taken from the Urſini were reſtored to them, upon their paying 40,000 ducats. The pope then ſent Gonſalvo with his Spaniards, whom he had taken into his pay, againſt the caſtle of Oſtia, which was again ſeized by the adherents of the cardinal of St. Peter's. This fort ſurrendered after a ſhort reſiſtance to the Spaniſh general, who returned in triumph to Rome, where he was honoured with a golden roſe by the pope. Alexander, at the ſame time, was greatly ſollicited by the duke of Milan and the Venetians, to give aſſiſtance, according to the terms of the treaty, againſt the French, who made great efforts to obtain the poſſeſſion of Genoa. His compliance with their demands quickly became unneceſſary; for the king of Spain having advanced with an army as far as Perpignan, Charles VIII. conſented to a truce till the beginning of November, in which the Italian ſtates ſhould be included; and, in the mean time plenipotentiaries repaired to Montpelier to negotiate a peace.

SOON after the publication of the truce, all Rome was thrown into great confuſion, occaſioned by the murder of the duke of Candia, who was aſſaſſinated in the ſtreets by his brother, the cardinal of Valentia. The cardinal Borgia, according to Guicciardini, was prompted by jealouſy and envy to this horrid deed. As he had no inclination to an eccleſiaſtical life, he was ambitious of poſſeſſing that temporal grandeur which his brother enjoyed, and was beſides impatient to find that the duke had a greater ſhare in his ſiſter's affections than himſelf. Both the brothers are ſaid to have been rivalled by their father; who not being ſatisfied with his daughter's ſecond marriage, hired falſe witneſſes to prove the impotence of her huſband. The pope was afflicted beyond meaſure for the death of his ſon; and ſuſpecting the cardinal Sforza and the count of Mirandola as guilty of the murder, he cauſed them both to be apprehended: but a few days after, diſcovering the author, he deplored his miſery with tears in the conſiſtory, confeſſed the wickedneſs of his former life, and nominated ſeveral cardinals, by whoſe advice he ſolemnly promiſed to reform the manners of his court. He dropt theſe good reſolutions, however, in a few days, and returned with more eagerneſs than ever, to the practice of thoſe vices in which he had ſpent his life. Soon after he granted the inveſtiture of Naples to Frederic; and being informed that one Savonarola, a Dominican, of great authority at Florence, had prevailed with that city to reſtore the popular governor, and had written to the emperor, and to the kings of France, England, Spain, and Portugal, exhorting them to aſſiſt the church, which was corrupted from the crown of the head to the ſole of the foot, and to pluck up, by the authority of a general council, the abomination of deſolation which ſtood in the holy place, he prohibited him from preaching, and cited him to appear at Rome. As the monk refuſed to go to Rome, he threatened to excommunicate the Florentines, and lay their city under an interdict, unleſs they delivered him up bound, and refrained from hearing his ſermons: but this threatening being deſpiſed, he denounced an anathema againſt Savonarola at Rome [u].

Lewis XII. ſucceeds to the crown of France, and claims the duchy of Milan.

MEAN while, the truce being continued betwixt the kings of Spain and France, Charles again made preparations for an expedition into Italy, with the conſent of Alexander, who had entered into a private negotiation with him, in hopes of promoting his ſon cardinal Borgia. Charles dying of an apoplexy in the month of April, without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his couſin Lewis, duke of Orleans, who, far from dropping his pretenſions in Italy, immediately aſſumed the title of king of France, Jeruſalem, and both Sicilies, and duke of Milan, which duchy he claimed in right of his grandmother Valentina, daughter and heireſs of John Galeazzo Viſconti. Upon the unexpected death of the king of France, Alexander again ſolicited

a licited the friendſhip of the king of Naples: being deſirous of obtaining ſome ſecular dignity for his ſon, he propoſed an alliance betwixt him and Carlotta, the king's daughter, and that the principality of Taranto ſhould be granted to him as her dowry. Frederic rejecting this propoſal with diſdain, the pope immediately applied to the king of France; and as Carlotta was then at his court, he aſked his aſſiſtance in concluding the propoſed alliance. Lewis being reſolved upon an expedition to Italy, and being deſirous of obtaining a divorce from his preſent wife, complied readily with the pope's requeſt; accordingly Cæſar Borgia having reſigned the cardinalate, ſet out for France with the pope's bull, authorizing an examination of the king's marriage [u].

All Italy greatly exclaimed againſt this reſignation of the cardinalate, as the late pope
b had even refuſed to allow one of the cardinals to reſign, who was deſirous of aſſuming the monkiſh habit. Savonarola, who had abſtained from preaching for ſeveral months, again exclaimed againſt the pope; but the magiſtracy of Florence being deſirous of procuring his favour in a treaty which they were then negotiating, for the recovery of Piſa, ordered him to be ſilent. Savonarola obeyed; but ſeveral of his companions ſtill continued to reproach the pope in their ſermons with great freedom. The Franciſcans adopted the oppoſite party with great warmth; and the diſpute went ſo far, that one of the Franciſcans challenged a Dominican to walk with him into the midſt of a fire, in proof of the truth of their doctrines. The challenge being accepted, an immenſe crowd aſſembled to ſee the experiment, but the Dominican being afraid, deſired to enter the fire with the conſecrated wafer; which
c being oppoſed by the Franciſcans, and inſiſted upon by Savonarola, ſerved for an excuſe to delay the propoſed tryal. Savonarola, however, loſt his reputation with the people, and next day was ſeized, with two of his companions; and being degraded by the general of their order, they were delivered to the civil magiſtrate, who ordered them to be put to death [w]. Alexander, about the ſame time, degraded and impriſoned a biſhop of Rome, who was accuſed of Mahammediſm and hereſy [x].

During theſe tranſactions Cæſar Borgia arrived at Paris, where he was received with great honour by the king, who created him a knight, and duke of Valentinois in Dauphiny, and gave him the command of a body of 100 horſe, with an annual penſion of 20,000 livres. The following year he married Carlotta, a daughter of a peer of France, as the daugh-
d ter of Frederic had abſolutely refuſed to marry him. Lewis XII. in the mean time, having concluded a peace with the kings of England and Spain, and a truce with the emperor, made great preparations to take poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, having likewiſe ſecured the friendſhip of the pope and the Venetians. Lewis Sforza applied for aſſiſtance to the emperor; but being diſappointed in Germany, he ſent an embaſſy to Bajazet, deſiring him to declare war againſt the Venetians. Maximilian was prevented from aſſiſting Sforza, being then engaged in a war againſt the Swiſs: but being very deſirous of humbling the Venetians, he likewiſe ſollicited the grand ſignior to attack them, promiſing at the ſame time to make an irruption into the Treviſane [y]. The Turks accordingly fitted out a formidable fleet, with which they made themſelves maſters of the ſea; and aſſembling their forces in Boſnia, entered Italy by Friuli, e ravaging the country with fire and ſword as far as Lavenza, and carrying off with them many thouſands of captives.

The Venetians, in this extremity, ſolliciting the king of France to haſten his march into Italy, Lewis arrived at Lyons in the month of Auguſt, and ſent a conſiderable army over the Alps, under the command of the duke of Luxemburgh, the duke of Albany, and one Trivulzi, an Italian, who taking Alexandria by ſtorm, though garriſoned by 5000 men, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the other cities of the Milaneſe, that they ſurrendered without any oppoſition; Sforza, in a diſgraceful manner, abandoning Milan, and flying with his wife, children, and treaſure, into Germany. The French having in leſs than twenty days made themſelves maſters of the Milaneſe, and of Genoa, Lewis XII. arrived at Milan on the 6th of October, where f he received embaſſies of congratulation from all the potentates of Italy, except Frederic king of Naples [z]. The different ſtates put themſelves under his protection, and made alliances with him agreeable to their intereſts. The pope likewiſe laid hold of this opportunity; and ſolliciting the king to fulfil his engagements to the duke of Valentinois, who had come with him from France, Lewis granted him 300 lances at his own expence, and a body of 4 or 5000 Swiſs, to be paid by the pope; with which force Alexander propoſed to reduce the whole territory of Romagna, under the ſubjection of the Roman ſee (N); but in reality intended that country,

A jubilee celebrated at Rome. A. D. 1500.

As this year was ſuppoſed to begin a new century, Alexander had publiſhed two bulls, appointing the celebration of a jubilee, which began at Chriſtmas, but was not frequented by ſuch a great concourſe of pilgrims as in former years, on account of the war which then raged in Lombardy. To encourage ſtrangers to come to Rome, the pope ſhortened the time for their reſidence in the city, and extended the jubilee to the epiphany of the following year; after which time, he allowed it to be celebrated till Whitſuntide through all Italy. He likewiſe ſent nuncios into the different provinces of Chriſtendom, to publiſh the indulgences of the holy year, and appointed the tythe of the whole money, to be raiſed on that account, to be given to the Venetians, as a ſubſidy againſt the Turks [c]. Beſides, to prevent that republic from giving any aſſiſtance to the lords of Rimini, Faenza, Peſaro, and other territories in Romagna, againſt his ſon, he allowed them to publiſh a cruſade againſt the Turks. The aſſiſtance of the pope being very neceſſary for the Venetians, who were engaged in an unſucceſsful war with the infidels, they promiſed not to intereſt themſelves in the affairs of Romagna: however, being afraid to ſee Borgia in poſſeſſion of that country, they privately ſollicited their ally, the king of France, to recal the Swiſs and French from Romagna, being ſenſible that, without them, Borgia could not ſucceed in his enterprize. c d

Lewis Sforza recovers the poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe;

TRIVULZI, governor of Milan, accordingly ordered theſe troops immediately to return, not ſo much to gratify the Venetians, as to oppoſe Lewis Sforza, who had ſuddenly repaſſed the Alps with ſeveral thouſand Swiſs and Burgundians, and taken poſſeſſion of Como. Upon his arrival the whole Milaneſe revolted from the French, who had rendered themſelves deteſtable to the Italians by their inſolence and barbarity; and Trivulzi having but an inconſiderable body of men, was obliged to retire towards Novara. Borgia, in the mean time, having conquered Imola and Forli, at the expence of 130 000 ducats, ceaſed all hoſtilities in Romagna, and returned to Rome, but, before his departure, he is ſaid to have poiſoned cardinal Borgia, who was a favourite of the pope, and had been ſent by him as legate to Ceſena, with a yearly revenue of 20 000 ducats [d]. Soon after his arrival at Rome, Lewis Sforza was ſeized by the Swiſs in his own ſervice, and by them delivered to the French general, by which means the king of France again became maſter of the Milaneſe, in a more abſolute manner than before. All Italy was alarmed at this news, except the Venetians and the pope; the laſt of whom entered into an alliance with the king, promiſing to aſſiſt him with troops in his expedition againſt Naples, and appointing the cardinal of Rouen legate of France for eighteen months; in conſideration of which Lewis again allowed Borgia 300 lances and 2000 foot, and declared that he would look upon thoſe as his enemies who oppoſed the pope's ſon. This reinforcement having joined his other troops, which conſiſted of 600 horſe and 6000 foot, Borgia returned to Romagna, and without oppoſition made himſelf maſter of Peſaro and Rimini, the Florentines and the duke of Ferrara not daring to give any aſſiſtance to the feudatory lords, the Venetians even deſerting their cauſe, and honouring e f happened upon their return to Italy. The popes not being able to reduce thoſe tyrants by force, either granted the territories which had been uſurped to the uſurpers themſelves, as fiefs of the church, or gave the inveſtiture of them to others, with the titles of vicars. Thus the pope gave Ferrara to [illegible] of Eſte, at firſt with the title of vicar, but afterwards with that of duke. Many lords likewiſe in the march of Ancona, the patrimony of St. Peter, and the duchy of Spoleto, obtained the title of vicar, either by the free or extorted compliance of the pope. The cities of Romagna, though accounted feudatory to the church, had for a long courſe of years thrown off all ſubjection to the popes, many of the vicars neglecting entirely to pay their annual tribute, and all of them entering into the ſervice of other princes, without making the exception of not ſerving againſt the church, nay even ſtipulating to defend them againſt the authority and arms of the pope (7).

Borgia

a Borgia with the title of nobility. The city of Faenza, which was next inveſted, tho' deſtitute of all auxiliaries, reſolved to adhere to the family of Manfredi, and made ſuch deſperate ſallies on the beſiegers, that Borgia in great vexation was obliged, after ten days, to raiſe the ſiege, and put his troops into winter-quarters [e].

ALEXANDER in the mean time, to ſupply the expences of the war, promoted twelve perſons to the cardinalate, from whom he received a large ſum of money. Borgia likewiſe, having received new reinforcements of French and Spaniards, again inveſted Faenza, in the beginning of February. The inhabitants of this city, after a vigorous defence, were obliged to ſurrender in the end of April, Borgia promiſing them ſecurity in their perſonal eſtates, and to allow their lord 4000 ducats a year: however, having taken poſſeſſion of the place, b he ſent the lord, who was then only eighteen years of age, to Rome, where he was ſoon after put to death [f]. After the conqueſt of Faenza, Borgia having obtained the title of duke of Romagna from his father, with the approbation of the conſiſtory, he marched with his army againſt Bologna, propoſing after he had made himſelf maſter of that city, to attack Florence. Upon his march he received an order from the king of France, prohibiting his enterprize againſt Bologna, as he had taken that city, and its lord John Bentivoglio, under his protection. This news was very diſagreeable to the duke: however, being deſirous to extend his conqueſts, he came to an accommodation with Bentivoglio, who granted him a paſſage thro' his territories into Tuſcany, paid him 6000 ducats, and ſent his ſon to join him with 300 hundred horſe and 5000 foot.

c THIS reinforcement ſupplied the place of the French, who at this time returned to Lombardy, the king of France having put his forces in motion for the conqueſt of Naples, in conſequence of a treaty with the king of Spain, by which theſe two princes had agreed upon a partition of the kingdom of Naples. The pope readily confirmed this treaty, to the aſtoniſhment of all Italy, and gave the inveſtiture of the duchy of Apulia and Calabria to the king of Spain, and of all the reſt of the kingdom to the king of France, under the title of king of Naples and Jeruſalem. Frederic was quite confounded with this news, as the king of Spain had ſent a great body of troops into his kingdom, under pretence of oppoſing the French, who had now advanced as far as Rome. As he had one powerful enemy already in the midſt of his dominions, and was threatened with an invaſion from another, he left d a garriſon in Capua, and retired in deſpair to Naples. Mean while the Spaniſh general employed his forces in reducing Calabria and Apulia; and the French having taken poſſeſſion of Averſa, Nola, and ſeveral other places, attacked Capua, which they took by ſtorm. Borgia, who had entered into a defenſive treaty with the Florentines, and had left his army in the territory of Piombino, accompanied the French army with his guards as lieutenant-general, and at the ſacking of Capua, ſeized forty of the faireſt nuns as his own booty [g]. Frederic being informed of the loſs of Capua, immediately abandoned Naples, which ſurrendered to the conquerors; and he himſelf ſoon after, from his deteſtation of the king of Spain reſigned his whole kingdom to the French, and went with his family to France, where he was created duke of Anjou, and allowed a yearly penſion of 30,000 ducats.

The kings of France and Spain make a partition of the kingdom of Naples.

e MEAN while the affairs of the pope proceeded with their uſual proſperity; he having made himſelf maſter of all the poſſeſſions of the Colloneſi and Savelli in the Terra di Roma, which he divided betwixt the Urſini and his ſon Borgia, who had reduced Piombino to great diſtreſs. The lord of that city had ſent to the Genoeſe for aſſiſtance, and had even offered to ſell his whole eſtates to that republic; but while they were ſolliciting the conſent of the king of France, Piombino was obliged to ſurrender to Borgia [h]. Tho' the French king was diſſatisfied with the conqueſts of Borgia, he nevertheleſs gratified the pope in all his demands, and prevailed with the duke of Ferrara to conclude an alliance betwixt his eldeſt ſon Alphonſus and Lucretia the pope's daughter. The duke conſented to this match, to ſecure his poſſeſſions from the ambition of Borgia; accordingly (the pope allowing his daughter a f dowry of 100,000 ducats in gold, and the value of 111,000 ducats in jewels) ſhe arrived at Ferrara on the 1ſt of February, where ſhe was received with great magnificence, and, a few days after, the apoſtolic nuncio gave the inveſtiture of Ferrara to Alphonſus, and created him a knight of St. Peter [i].

ABOUT this time Maximilian, who had ſtill delayed to give the inveſtiture of Milan to the king of France, ſent an ambaſſador into Italy, to inform the pope, and the other potentates, that he intended a journey to Rome, to receive the imperial crown. This news alarmed the king of France, who, from the high demands of the Florentine ambaſſador at his court, ſuſpected that the ſtates of Italy had entered into an alliance with the emperor: he therefore renewed his treaty with the Florentines, in terms very favourable for that republic, and ſent a herald to Borgia, prohibiting him from attacking their territories. Romagna had then excited the city of Arezzo to revolt; and this enterprize ſucceeding to his wiſh, he left Rome, and ſurpriſed Cagli, a city of the duke of Urbino, whoſe duchy he quickly made himſelf maſter of, altho' the duke a few weeks before, had accommodated with the pope all his differences about the tribute. After this conqueſt he ſeized ſome places belonging to the lord of Camerino, whom, with his two ſons, he ordered to be ſtrangled. This proceeding alarmed the Urſini and other lords that ſerved in his army, who judged that, as his ambition had no bounds, they likewiſe in the end would ſhare the ſame fate with the reſt. Their fears, however were, in ſome meaſure abated, by the arrival of the king of France in Italy, who ſent ſome troops towards Florence, to recover ſome places belonging to that republic, which had been ſeized by one of Borgia's captains, and declared publicly, that he intended to march in perſon againſt Borgia, and oblige him to deliver up all his conqueſts. The king was excited to this enterprize by the ambaſſadors of the Italian ſtates, who waited upon him at Aſti; but the pope bribing his favourite, the cardinal of Rouen, with a new legation in France for eighteen months, and promiſing to aſſiſt him in his war aginſt Ferdinand in Naples, and to give no countenance to Maximilian, who laid claim to the Milaneſe as a fief of the empire, he again renewed his alliance with him and his ſon. This treaty being concluded, Borgia waited upon the king at Milan and Genoa, and to the mortification of the Italian ambaſſadors, was received by him with great careſſes [k].

The king of France promiſes to check the ambition of Borgia,

A confederacy formed againſt him.

SOON after, it being diſcovered that the king of France had promiſed to aſſiſt the duke in reducing Bologna, and the other feudatory lords, all the ſtates of Italy were under great apprehenſions for their own ſecurity. The Venetians were very earneſt with the king to induce him to renounce the alliance; and the Urſini, with the other lords who ſerved in Borgia's army, withdrew their troops, and entered into a league for their mutual defence againſt him, to which they were encouraged by the revolt of the duchy of Urbino. Borgia was greatly alarmed with this confederacy, as their forces were greatly ſuperior to his: however, with his uſual good fortune, he prevailed upon the Urſini, even after they had gained ſome advantages over him, to conſent to a ſeparate treaty of peace, to which the other lords were obliged to accede. The duke of Urbino and the lord of Camerino immediately fled, the one to Venice, and the other to Naples; and Borgia ſoon after made himſelf maſter of Fano and Sinigaglia, into which laſt city he enticed Paul Urſino, and three other chiefs of the late confederacy, two of whom next day he ordered to be ſtrangled.

A. D. 1503.

THE pope in the mean time, with the intention, as it was believed, of raiſing money for his ſon, propoſed a general cruſade againſt the Turks; for which purpoſe he ſent nuncios into the different kingdoms of Europe, but with little or no ſucceſs: his character made every propoſal from him to be ſuſpected. However, he ſtill ſucceeded in deceiving the Italian princes: upon being informed of the tragedy at Sinigaglia, he impriſoned the cardinal Urſino in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and ſent his youngeſt ſon the prince of Squillaci, to take poſſeſſion of the territories belonging to that family, and the other confederate lords. The cardinal dying (as it was ſuppoſed by poiſon) after twenty days impriſonment, Borgia immediately ordered the other two lords to be put to death at Sinigaglia, and marching from thence in the end of January, made himſelf maſter of Citta di Caſtello and Perugia; then deſiring an opportunity to ſeize Siena, he ordered them to baniſh their lord Pandolfo Petrucci as his enemy. Pandolfo was accordingly baniſhed; but the king of France interpoſing, Borgia was obliged to deſiſt from that enterprize: however, he took poſſeſſion of the territories of the Savelli, and ſeveral of the ſtrong places belonging to the Urſini, even againſt the command of the king of France, whoſe authority was greatly leſſened in Italy, as he had, by neglect, allowed the Spaniards to make themſelves maſters of almoſt the whole kingdom of Naples.

The Spaniards conquer Naples;

Borgia treats with them.

BORGIA, in hopes of making a conqueſt of Tuſcany, immediately began to treat with the Spaniſh general; but the king of France ſending a powerful army into Italy, the pope was in doubt which of the princes he ſhould declare for: therefore, under the pretence of being the common father, he reſolved upon a neutrality, allowed the French army a paſſage thro' his territories, and promiſed, during the Neapolitan war, not to attack Bologna, Siena, or Florence. It was ſuppoſed that the pope had no deſign to obſerve this laſt article, but rather reſolved to attack Tuſcany, while the French were occupied in the kingdom of Naples. Borgia, to provide money for that expedition, formed a deſign, according to ſome authors, with the concurrence of his father, to poiſon all the rich cardinals, and to ſeize their revenues and eſtates; but, by the miſtake of a ſervant, the plot proved fatal to the contrivers [l]. Authors differ a little, though not materially, in the circumſtances of this fact. According to Guicciardini, Borgia ſent a preſent of ſome flaſks of poiſoned wine to the cardinal of Corneto, in whoſe garden they propoſed to ſup, but ordered the ſervant to give

They both immediately felt the ſymptoms of the poiſon, and Alexander died the next day, being the 18th of Auguſt; but Borgia, having drank his wine much diluted, by the aſſiſtance of antidotes recovered, after a long illneſs, in which he loſt his ſkin and hair [m].

THOUGH the death of Alexander gave great joy to the Romans, and to all Italy, yet Rome itſelf was immediately full of tumult and confuſion, the French army being in the neighbour-b hood of the city, and Borgia poſſeſſing the Vatican and the caſtle of St. Angelo with 12,000 men. The party of the Urſini likewiſe took arms; and the cardinals having retired to the convent of Minerva, were apprehenſive, leſt the Spaniſh general ſhould march to the city to over-awe the election. They therefore reſolved to delay entering into the conclave, till the cardinals reſident in foreign parts beyond the Alps might be preſent. Borgia in the mean time, though ſollicited by the Spaniards, concluded a new alliance with the French, and promiſed his intereſt to procure the pontificate for the cardinal of Rouen, who a few days after arrived, with the other cardinals, at Rome. The French troops being prevailed upon not to advance, and Borgia likewiſe agreeing to quit the city with his forces, the cardinals to the number of thirty-eight, entered the conclave, where their apprehenſions from
c the ſurrounding armies made them come quickly to a concluſion.

Pius III. is elected:

THE cardinal of Rouen, finding his own views diſappointed by the ſtrength of the Spaniſh faction, conſented with them to chuſe Francis Picolomini, cardinal of Siena, who being old and infirm, would, in all probability, ſoon occaſion another vacancy. Picolomini was elected on the 21ſt of September, and, in memory of his uncle Pius II. likewiſe aſſumed the name of Pius. He immediately granted a ſafe-conduct to Borgia, who returned to Rome with a guard of 300 horſe and 800 foot; notwithſtanding which he was in great danger from the continual aſſaults of the people, and the faction of the Urſini, who attacked his houſe with great violence. Great numbers of his guards deſerting from him, he with his brother and ſeveral Spaniſh cardinals, was obliged to take refuge in the Vatican, from d whence he retired to the caſtle of St. Angelo. This diſturbance was no ſooner quieted, than all Rome was again alarmed by the death of Pius, which happened on the 26th day after his election. This pope was eminent for his prudence and learning, and was ſuppoſed to have had the reformation of the church much at heart, having declared, immediately after his election, that there was no longer any occaſion for arms; but that all men ought now to think of religion and piety [n]. He had likewiſe reſolved to call a general council; but death, which is ſaid to have been haſtened by poiſon, prevented his deſign [o].

He dies 26 days after.

The cardinal of Oſtia is elected pope, and takes the name of Julius II.

JULIAN de la Rovere, nephew of Sixtus IV. and cardinal of Oſtia, at the death of Alexander was a candidate for the pontificate; and reflecting on the infirm health of Pius, he ſtill continued to ſollicit the intereſt of the cardinals. Tho' he was of a bold impetuous ſpirit, e' had ſpent his life in continual travels, and was at variance and enmity with ſeveral great men, yet, as he was accounted liberal, and faithful to his word, and had amaſſed great wealth, he quickly made many friends; eſpecially by his extravagant promiſes, and a diſtribution of the money which, from an opinion of his punctuality, was preſented to him by the citizens of Rome. He procured the intereſt of the Spaniſh cardinals, partly by Borgia's means, whom he promiſed to confirm general of the church, and to conclude an alliance betwixt his daughter and his own nephew, prefect of Rome; ſo that the whole ſacred college had ſo unanimouſly fixed upon him, that on the 9th of October, when they entered the conclave, he was declared pope before the doors were ſhut [p]. He was crowned on the 25th of November, and aſſumed the name of Julius II. As he had reſolved to en-
f deavour to recover the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, he behaved with great reſpect to Borgia, to whom a few places in Romagna ſtill continued faithful. All the other places that he had conquered, immediately upon the death of Alexander, had revolted to their antient lords, or had choſen new ones.

The Venetians aſpire to the dominion of Romagna.

THE Venetians likewiſe ſeizing this opportunity of extending their territory, during the ſhort pontificate of Pius III. had taken poſſeſſion of Rimini, and ſeveral other places in Romagna, and had laid ſiege to Faenza, which city ſent to the pope, demanding his aſſiſtance. Julius, though he was greatly offended with the Venetians, yet had not force nor authority to compel them to deſiſt; he therefore only ſent a nuncio to that republic, exhorting them to ceaſe their hoſtilities againſt a city belonging to the church. They anſwered that Faenza
g could not be reckoned to belong to the church, as Alexander VI. had conferred the whole

About this time, the kings of France and Spain having concluded a truce, and the Venetians not venturing to irritate the pope by renewing hoſtilities in Romagna, all Italy enjoyed a profound peace, except Florence and Piſa; this laſt city having, with great reſolution, defended itſelf for ſeveral years againſt the Florentines, who endeavoured to reduce it again under their dominion. The pope, in the mean time, received a letter from the Soltan of Ægypt, who threatened to expel all the European Chriſtians from his dominions, and to deſtroy the ſepulchre of our Saviour, and all the ſacred relics in the Holy Land, unleſs he prevailed with the kings of Spain and Portugal to ceaſe from moleſting the Moors; the one of whom perſecuted them in Spain, and the other diſturbed their commerce in the Indian ſeas [q]. Julius ſent the Franciſcan, who brought the Soltan's letter to Spain, to receive an anſwer from Ferdinand and Emanuel; and being deſirous of recovering Romagna, he ſollicited the emperor to uſe his authority with the Venetians, to oblige them to reſtore the cities which they had ſeized. The Venetians, upon receiving an embaſſy from Maximilian, offered to reſtore to the pope all that they had conquered ſince the death of Alexander, if he would confirm to them Faenza and its territory: but Julius replied, that he would not allow them to poſſeſs a ſingle tower, and that he hoped, before his death, to recover Ravenna and Cervia, which they had likewiſe uſurped from the church. However, having no hopes of any aſſiſtance from the emperor or the king of France, he agreed to leave them Faenza and Rimini, and admitted their ambaſſadors to an audience. About the ſame time he publiſhed a bull againſt ſimony in the election of a pope, ordaining the election to be null and void if any ſimony ſhould be committed, either by the electors or the perſon elected; and that they ſhould likewiſe be deprived of their cardinalate, and all their eccleſiaſtical benefices: and that thoſe cardinals who ſhould not conſent to the ſimony, might proceed to the election of another pope, call a general council, and act againſt the ſimoniacal pope as a heretic [r].

Soon after Julius made a promotion of cardinals; but being offended with the king of France, for having, without his conſent, diſpoſed of the benefices in the duchy of Milan, vacant by the deaths of cardinal Aſcanius and others, he refuſed to confer the dignity of cardinal on two biſhops, recommended to him by Lewis, who, in reſentment, ſequeſtered the revenues of the cardinal of St. Peter, and other prelates, in the duchy of Milan. The king of France, however, beginning to be afraid of the grandeur of the houſe of Auſtria, as Maximilian formed pretenſions to the kingdom of Hungary, and his ſon Philip had now added the kingdom of Caſtile to his poſſeſſions in Flanders, he therefore reſolved to live in terms of friendſhip with the pope; and having taken off the ſequeſtration, in the beginning of the following year, ſent the apoſtolic nuncio, that was at his court, to Rome, with various propoſitions againſt the Venetians. Julius embraced the offers of the king of France with great eagerneſs, and immediately ſent back the nuncio to conclude a ſtrict alliance with Lewis, ſending with him a brief, by which he granted the dignity of cardinal to the two French biſhops, and allowed the king to diſpoſe of the benefices in the Milaneſe. The pope deſired immediately to attack Perugia and Bologna; but as Maximilian was then propoſing to enter Italy with an army to receive the imperial crown, and the Venetians threatned

a to assist the Bolognese if he did not confirm their right to Faenza, the French king entreated him earnestly to defer his enterprize, lest he should embroil all Italy.

JULIUS, who, contrary to his natural disposition, had been quiet ever since his election to the pontificate, refused now to hearken to any farther delay; and, on the 26th of August, marched from Rome with five hundred men of arms, desiring the inhabitants of Bologna to prepare for his arrival, and to provide quarters for 500 French lances. On his march to Perugia, where he designed to stop, unless he could prevail with the French actually to join him, he received the submission of Baglione, lord of that city, at Orvieto. Baglione surrendering the fortresses of Perugia and its territory into his hands, giving his two sons as hostages, and promising to assist him with 150 men of arms, the pope received him into b favour; and the king of France being prevailed upon by the cardinal of Rouen to grant him a reinforcement, he proceeded to Cesena, where he excommunicated Bentivoglio, lord of Bologna, and all his adherents, or those who conversed with him. Bentivoglio, in hopes of the protection of the French, prepared for a resolute defence; but being informed that the king of France had sent 600 lances and 3000 foot to join the army of the church, he fled with his family and treasure to the duchy of Milan, and, after his departure, the pope entered in triumph into Bologna on the 10th of November. Julius dismissed the French general with a present of 8000 ducats for himself, and 10,000 for his troops. He promised also to create his brother a cardinal. To render the dominion of the church agreeable to the Bolognese, he indulged them with a great many exemptions, and left them some shadow c of liberty, by appointing the new magistrates after the antient forms.

makes himself master of Perugia and Bologna;

DURING these transactions, Philip, the emperor's son, died of a fever at Burgos in Spain; and Ferdinand king of Arragon, who had ceded Castile to him, had arrived at Naples. Upon the news of his arrival, he immediately received embassies from all the states of Italy, not only to congratulate him, but also to negociate with him concerning their different interests. Julius endeavoured to excite him against the Venetians, who were in possession of several maritime places in the kingdom of Naples. The pope, being greatly exasperated against the republic for attacking Romagna, and disposing of ecclesiastical benefices in their territories without his consent, likewise sollicited the king of France to declare war against the Venetians, and invited him to a conference in Lombardy (P). As the city of Genoa about d this time had revolted from the French, Lewis declined entering into a war against the Venetians, but consented to a personal conference with the pope; however, Julius understanding that he intended to march with an army into Italy, to the assistance of the Genoese nobles against the people, as he himself favoured the popular faction, he endeavoured to dissuade him; but, not succeeding, he in a disgust published his return to Rome, and, to the astonishment of every one, quitted Bologna in the end of February. The king of France resenting this fickleness in the pope, and suspecting that he privately favoured the rebellious Genoese, immediately assembled a powerful army; and, passing the Alps in the beginning of the spring, struck the Genoese with such a panic by his sudden march, that they surrendered at discretion. Having entered the city on the 29th of April, he e executed some of the chiefs of the rebels, and fined the inhabitants in 240,000 ducats; after which he disbanded his army, and went to Milan. A few weeks after he returned to Savona, to have a conference with Ferdinand king of Arragon, who arrived there on the 27th of June in his voyage from Naples to Spain. The two kings treated each other with great marks of friendship and esteem, and, during the three days which Ferdinand staid at Savona, they held several private conferences, as it was conjectured, for the reformation of the church by a general council, and for uniting their arms against the Venetians[t].

A new rupture betwixt the pope and the king of France.

THE French king had disbanded his forces, to shew the emperor, the pope, and the Venetians, that he had no other intention, by marching an army into Italy, than to recover Genoa. For Julius, from his hatred to the king, had written to the emperor and the elec- f tors, informing them that Lewis, under pretence of reducing Genoa, intended to conquer the ecclesiastical state, confer the pontificate on the cardinal of Rouen, and assume the imperial title to himself. Maximilian, having received the same intelligence from the Venetians, held a very numerous diet at Constance; which, with great alacrity, promised to raise a very powerful army to assert the rights of the empire in Italy. Maximilian accordingly wrote to the pope, that he had declared the king of France a rebel, and that he intended himself to enter with a powerful army into Italy to receive the imperial crown. As the French king had likewiſe ſent ambaſſadors to Conſtance, to juſtify himſelf from the falſe accuſations of the pope, the ardour of the diet for the Italian expedition greatly abated, ſo that very few troops appeared at the general rendezvous; and, the Venetians refuſing a paſſage through their b territories for a German army, the emperor, after a fruitleſs attempt, was obliged to delay his march [u] (Q).

A FEW months afterwards, his army being reinforced, he demanded from the Venetians a paſſage through their territories; but the republic having fortified their frontier, and received a reinforcement of 6000 French, refuſed his demand. The pope likewiſe, to prevent his march into Italy, ordered his legate to confer upon him the title of emperor; which the popes had always refuſed to his predeceſſors, unleſs they came perſonally to Rome [x]. Maximilian, however, having made himſelf maſter of ſome places belonging to the Venetians, and being deſirous of extending his conqueſts, left his forces in Trent, and, repairing to Ulm, ſollicited a reinforcement from the circle of Suabia. During his abſence, the Venetians de- c feated his army in Trent, and made an incurſion into Iſtria and Carniola, while their fleet reduced Trieſte, Capo d' Iſtria, Rovigna, and Pola. Theſe loſſes inclined the emperor to think of an accommodation, which was likewiſe agreeable to the king of France, who was jealous of the power of the Venetians; but the republic having agreed to a peace with the emperor, before the demands of the king of France were ſatisfied, and having afterwards granted a triumph to their general, they thereby offended both Maximilian and Lewis. The pope likewiſe, having received a freſh inſult from the republic, which had refuſed to grant the biſhopric of Vicenza to his nephew, and had conferred it upon another perſon, he ſent a nuncio to the king of France, to excite him againſt the Venetians. The cardinal of Rouen, inclining to ſatisfy the pope and Lewis, being likewiſe ſollicited to the ſame purpoſe by the d emperor, a league againſt the Venetians was concluded on the 9th of December at Cambray, betwixt theſe three powers and Ferdinand of Arragon, which was confirmed and publiſhed the next day in the cathedral church, under the name of a defenſive alliance.

The pope enters into an alliance with other princes againſt the Venetians. A. D. 1509.

THIS treaty, to which the king of Hungary and the dukes of Savoy, Mantua, and Ferrara, acceded, was quickly ratified by the ſecular princes; but, as it had been concluded without the pope's concurrence, tho' under his name, Julius delayed ratifying it, and in the mean time declared to the Venetians, that, if they would reſtore Rimini and Faenza, he would not join in the alliance; which, without the authority of the apoſtolic ſee, would not be of any dangerous conſequence. The Venetians rejecting this offer of the pope, he immediately ratified the treaty, and, the king of France having paſſed the Alps with a numerous army, e he publiſhed a dreadful bull againſt the republic, under the name of a monitory, ordering them to reſtore, within twenty-four days, all that they had uſurped from the apoſtolic ſee, under pain of eccleſiaſtical cenſures; and, in caſe of their diſobedience, he allowed the ſubjects of the republic to be made ſlaves, and their merchandize every where to be ſeized. The Venetians prepared with great ſpirit to oppoſe this formidable alliance; but their army being entirely defeated by the king of France at Ghiaradadda, who immediately after took poſſeſſion of Bergamo, Breſcia, and Cremona, while the pope entered Romagna with an army of 9000 men, they reſolved wholly to abandon the continent: being informed that the emperor had put himſelf in motion towards their German frontier, and that the king of Arragon had ſent a fleet againſt the cities which they held in Naples, they ſent orders to the gover- f a venues that they had intercepted. However, ſoon after, Julius, whoſe great deſire was to free Italy from the dominion of foreigners, conſented to admit the ambaſſadors of the republic to an audience [y]; and about the ſame time, the German garriſon being ſurpriſed in Padua, the hopes of the Venetians began to revive. The grand deſign formed by Julius was to raiſe the temporal power of the apoſtolic ſee; for this purpoſe he concluded a new alliance with the king of France, who promiſed to give no protection, for the future, to any vaſſal of the church; in conſequence of which the pope allowed him to confer all the vacant biſhoprics in his dominions. The king then returned to France; while Maximilian, who had hitherto done nothing in conſequence of the league of Cambray, now arrived with an army in Lombardy, and beſieged Padua; but winter approaching, he was obliged to b raiſe the ſiege, and even reduced to aſk a truce from the Venetians, who refuſed his demand.

In the mean time, the pope, contrary to the late treaty, having conferred a biſhopric in Provence, vacant by the death of the biſhop at Rome, the king of France, in reſentment, ſequeſtered all the revenues of the Milaneſe eccleſiaſtics belonging to the Roman court, which occaſioned a freſh miſunderſtanding betwixt theſe two princes. Though Julius, at length, complied with the king, and confirmed the biſhopric to the perſon nominated by him, yet he, from that time, deſired to ſee the king deprived of all that he poſſeſſed in Italy. Thinking it againſt the intereſt of the Roman ſee that the Venetians ſhould be farther depreſſed, he reſolved to abſolve them from the eccleſiaſtical cenſures, and, to prevent Lewis from giving any aſſiſtance to the emperor againſt the republic, he endeavoured to excite
c Henry VIII. of England to declare war againſt France, and ſollicited the Swiſs to march an army into the Milaneſe to the aſſiſtance of the church. Lewis ſpared no pains to regain the favour of the pope, but his endeavours were fruitleſs; for, on the 24th of February, the peace was concluded betwixt him and the Venetians, who were abſolved from the excommunication, on condition that they ſhould leave the navigation of the Adriatic free to the ſubjects of the church, give ſatisfaction for all the damages they had done to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and renounce all claim to any juriſdiction in eccleſiaſtical affairs; that they ſhould not preſume to confer any vacant benefices, but ſhould freely admit thoſe who were nominated by the Roman court [z]. Julius beſides, to the ſurprize of the emperor and the king of France, gave permiſſion to the vaſſals and ſubjects of the church, to enter into the d ſervice of the Venetians, and by the means of the biſhop of Sion, who had great intereſt with the Swiſs, he prevailed with the cantons not to renew their alliance with France, but to declare for the apoſtolic ſee.

who is reconciled to the Venetians;

As the duke of Ferrara ſtill adhered to the king of France, the pope ſought an opportunity of a rupture with him, and prohibited him, under ſevere penalties, from making ſalt at Commachio, which territory had been ſurrendered by the Venetians to the church. He likewiſe threatened to attack him with an army, if he did not annul ſome new duties that he had impoſed upon veſſels ſailing on the Po. As the pope's troops marched into Romagna and the county of Bologna, the French and German generals united their forces, and took poſſeſſion of ſeveral towns belonging to the Venetians on the continent, to prevent the eccle-
e ſiaſtical army from acting againſt the duke. However, as the king of France was apprehenſive of a revolt, both in the Milaneſe and at Genoa, he very willingly hearkened to the propoſals of an accommodation with the pope, who, being unprepared to oppoſe his arms, wanted to draw him into a negociation. After ſome conferences, by which the pope gained time, he abſolutely refuſed to agree to an accommodation, unleſs the French king would abandon the protection of the duke of Ferrara; to which article Lewis refuſing his conſent, Julius fully reſolved upon a war. He refuſed to accept of the annual tribute from the duke: in order to ſeparate Ferdinand of Arragon from the intereſt of the king of France and the emperor, he granted him the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Naples, and reduced the annual tribute to 2000 ducats and a white horſe [a].

The pope, however, having the promiſe of the aſſiſtance of 12,000 Swiſs, declared war againſt the king of France and the duke of Ferrara; and, while his army entered the territory of the duke, he ſent the Venetian fleet, with ſome gallies of his own, to Genoa, to excite that city to revolt; in both which enterprizes he was unſucceſsful, by the vigilance of the French general. He nevertheleſs refuſed to hearken to an accommodation, though Lewis even offered to leave the city of Genoa free, and to abandon the intereſts of the duke of Ferrara. So far was he from inclining to peace, that he impriſoned and put to the torture a Savoyard, who declared that his duke was willing to act as mediator; and, thinking his generals did not behave with vigour, he himſelf ſet out from

Lewis asks the advice of the Gallican clergy.

LEWIS, despairing of any accommodation with the pope, made a new alliance with the a emperor; and, that he might shew his moderation, called an assembly of the Gallican clergy at Tours, to have their opinion concerning his disputes with Julius. This assembly confirmed by their authority, all the propositions that were offered to them by the king; particularly they affirmed, that the pope had no right to declare war against any prince, unless on account of religion, or in defence of the ecclesiastical state; that the prince unjustly attacked by the pope, might, in his own defence, invade the territories of the church, and might even withdraw obedience, in some measure, from such pope, and constitute a pragmatic sanction for regulating ecclesiastical affairs within his kingdom, without any regard to the Roman see [b]. The emperor greatly approved of the proceedings of the Gallican clergy; and, upon the b repeated complaints of the princes and prelates of Germany, ordered a pragmatic sanction to be drawn up for the empire, which however was never confirmed by any diet [c]. Besides, according to some authors, he formed a design of calling a general council to depose Julius, with the intention of succeeding him in his own person [d].

THE pope in the mean time, notwithstanding the severity of the season, resolved upon the siege of Ferrara, and proposing to leave Bologna, where he had been in great danger of being surprised by the French general, he sent his army towards Concordia and Mirandola, which two cities he determined to take possession of, although he had no complaint against the young duke, whom he had formerly taken into his protection. Concordia surrendered the same day that it was attacked; but, at Mirandola, the pope's army met with a vigorous c opposition from the French garrison. Julius, rendered quite impatient by the slow progress
A. D. 1511. The pope takes possession of Mirandola, and of the siege, on the 2d of January left Bologna, and, contrary to the intreaties of the Venetian ambassador, and of all the cardinals, went to the camp, and took the command of the army upon himself, as though he had even desired to give the Christian princes a stronger reason for calling a general council against him. Having obliged the city to capitulate, he marched with his army through the breach, and obliged the inhabitants to pay 6000 crowns to save themselves from being pillaged. He afterwards granted the investiture of the two fiefs to John Francis Picus for 20,000 crowns, and resolved to proceed immediately to the siege of Ferrara; but the French general Chaumont having with great diligence reinforced his army, Julius abandoned this enterprize, and returned to Bologna, from whence he went d to Ravenna, where he created eight new cardinals. A few weeks afterwards he returned to Bologna, to have a conference with the bishop of Gurck, the emperor's envoy, who had held a congress at Mantua with the ambassadors of the kings of France and Spain, to negociate a general peace. The pope very warmly sollicited the German bishop to prevail with the endeavours to detach the emperor from his alliance with France. emperor to desert the interest of the king of France, and to conclude a separate peace with the Venetians; but without any effect; for Gurck insisted, that the French king and the duke of Ferrara should both be included in the peace; to which the pope refusing to consent, he returned to Modena. The emperor and king of France having granted a suspension of arms during the conferences at Mantua, the pope seized that opportunity to attempt the surprising of Genoa; but, by the vigilance of the French general, the design was frustrated [e]. e

The French general retakes Bologna. THE king of France, being informed of the conference betwixt the bishop of Gurck and the pope, was apprehensive lest the emperor should be prevailed upon to agree to a separate peace; he therefore gave orders to his general to act with vigour against the pope. Trivulzi, who, upon the death of Chaumont, had succeeded to the command, immediately put his troops in motion; and, having taken Concordia and several other places, marched directly for Bologna, being attended by Bentivoglio, the ancient lord of that city. The pope leaving the command of his army to his nephew the duke of Urbino, and the cardinal of Pavia as legate in the city, retired to Ravenna; but a few days after he was informed, that both the cardinal and the duke had fled, that his army was almost wholly dispersed, and that the city had submitted to its ancient lord, and had admitted the French, who had seized the f greatest part of the baggage and artillery of his army, and of that of the republic. The cardinal and the duke both repaired to Ravenna, and mutually accused each other; but the duke, presuming upon his relation to the pope, prevented the cardinal from justifying himself by stabbing him with a poniard. According to Mariana [f], the pope was conscious of this murder; however, he pretended to be greatly afflicted with the cardinal's death, and, being driven almost to distraction by the bad success of his affairs, he set out on his return to Rome; but he had scarcely arrived at Rimini, when he was informed, that citations for a general council were affixed in Bologna, Modena, and other cities, and that he was summoned to appear personally.

a THE biſhop of Gurck, after his departure from the pope, had ſent three deputies to Milan to treat with the cardinals who had deſerted from Julius when he firſt marched againſt Bologna. Three of theſe cardinals, in their own name, and in the name of ſix others, whoſe commiſſion they ſaid they had received, appointed a general council to be held at Piſa, on the 1ſt of September; which convocation was immediately confirmed by the deputies of the emperor and the king of France, and a few weeks after ratified by Maximilian and Lewis. The cardinals affirmed, that as the pope, contrary to his oath at his election, had neglected to call a council, they, without his authority, might lawfully convoke one, on account of the evident neceſſity of reforming the church both in the head and members, and as they were authoriſed by the decrees of the council of Conſtance, and countenanced by b the emperor and the king of France.

The ſchiſmatic cardinals appoint a council to be held at Piſa.

THE pope, being greatly apprehenſive leſt the French ſhould take poſſeſſion of the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and march to Rome, made an indirect offer of peace to Lewis, and ſollicited the cardinals at Milan to return to the unity of the church, promiſing them all the ſecurity that they could deſire; but they refuſing his offer, and the king of France ordering his general to return to the Milaneſe, the pope, on the 16th of July, publiſhed a bull, annulling the proceedings of the cardinals at Milan, and appointing a general council to be held at Rome the following year, on the 19th of April [g]. He likewiſe publiſhed a monitory, ordering the three cardinals to return to Rome within ſixty-five days, under the penalty of being deprived of their cardinalate, and of all their benefices; and, while he was amu-c ſing the deputies of the king of France at Rome with the hopes of peace, he negociated a new alliance againſt him with Ferdinand and the Venetians. Mean while all Italy was in hopes of peace, by the news of the death of the pope, which was ſoon after found to be a miſtake; for he recovered after continuing ſome hours in a fainting fit; and remaining in the ſame diſpoſition, with regard to the king of France, he endeavoured to excite the young king of England againſt him, by means of Ferdinand, whoſe daughter Henry VIII. had married (R).

The pope publiſhes a bull for a general council to be held at Rome.

DURING theſe proceedings, the council was opened at Piſa, on the 1ſt of September, by three proxies ſent thither by the cardinals from Milan. The cardinals themſelves did not arrive till the 29th of October, when they were accompanied with ſeveral of the French
d clergy, who alone compoſed the council; for the emperor had neglected to ſend any ame baſſadors to repreſent himſelf, and had called an aſſembly of the German clergy at Augsburg, to have their opinion of the lawfulneſs of the Piſan council. Mean while the clergy at Piſa held their firſt ſeſſion on the fifth of November, in which they choſe the cardinal of Carvajal preſident, and declared null and void all that the pope had done againſt the cardinals and ſynod. In the ſecond ſeſſion, which was held two days after, they regulated the order of ſitting; and, an inſurrection happening in the city againſt the French guards, they in great confuſion held the third ſeſſion on the 14th of the month, and transferred the council to Milan. There they were alarmed by 16,000 Swiſs, who, at the inſtigation of the pope, made an incurſion into the Milaneſe; on which account they deferred their next ſeſ-
f ſion till the 4th of January.

The council opens at Piſa; but, on account of a riot, is transferred to Milan.

THE pope, beſides exciting the Swiſs to enter Lombardy, had concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, who promiſed him auxiliaries againſt the French. He likewiſe depoſed the cardinals who adhered to the council of Piſa, and declared them obnoxious to the penalties due to ſchiſmatics and heretics, and ſent the cardinal of Medicis, with ſome troops, towards Bologna, to over-awe Florence and Piſa, which two cities he put under an interdict for favouring the ſchiſmatic cardinals. Soon after, the Spaniſh auxiliaries arriving, under the command of Peter Navarra, they marched with the other forces of the pope into Romagna; upon whoſe approach all the places belonging to the duke of Ferrara, on that ſide of the Po, ſurrendered, except one caſtle, which the Spaniſh general took by ſtorm on the g laſt day of December. The united army then marched under the command of the cardinal of Medicis, and beſieged Bologna; but, after they had made the breach almoſt practicable for an aſſault, the garriſon was reinforced by Gaſton de Foix, the French general; who, obliging the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, marched from thence, through the ſnow, to the relief of the caſtle of Breſcia; which city, during the ſiege of Bologna, had revolted to the Venetians. Though he had only 400 men of arms and 6000 foot, he defeated part of the Venetian army that oppoſed his march, and retook Breſcia by ſtorm, putting almoſt the whole

LEWIS about this time being informed that the emperor and the kings of England and Arragon had joined in a league againſt him with the pope, and that the Florentines had likewiſe gone over to that party, ſent orders to his general to march directly in ſearch of the enemy's army, and, without reſpect, to attack the pope in Rome; and, that he might not ſeem to make war on his own account, a legate from the council of Milan attended his army, who was to receive all the places that were conquered in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate (S). The legate having joined the army, Gaſton de Foix marched, with 18,000 foot and near 2000 men at arms, in ſearch of the enemy; who being inferior in number, and expecting that the kings of England and Arragon would cauſe a diverſion in France, declined coming to an engagement. Foix advanced with his troops, and laid ſiege to Ravenna, which obliged the enemy at laſt to venture a battle; which was fought with obſtinacy on the 11th of April, when the French obtained a complete though bloody victory; for they loſt their general Foix, and, according to ſome authors, upwards of 10,000 men [i]; but Guicciardini mentions only 3000 ſlain on the ſide of the French, and about 7000 on that of the enemy [k]. Palice, who ſucceeded to the command of the French army, immediately after took poſſeſſion of Ceſena, Imola, Forli, and Ravenna, which cities were delivered to the cardinal of Sanſeverino, legate from the council of Piſa; and as the pope's army was almoſt wholly diſperſed, and the cardinal of Medicis taken priſoner, if the French general had marched directly to Rome, he might, with eaſe, have made himſelf maſter of that city, ſo great was the conſternation both of the pope and cardinals. Julius was intreated by the cardinals to agree to a peace with the king of France; but a few days after being informed of the weakneſs of the French army, and the reſolution of Palice, who was at variance with Sanſeverino, he reſolved to continue the war; and, in caſe of neceſſity, ordered ſome gallies to be prepared for his flight from Rome. The pope is in great conſternation. c

THE pope, though in appearance reduced to the greateſt extremity, was quickly after more formidable than ever; for Palice, inſtead of proceeding to Rome, was obliged to return to the Milaneſe to oppoſe the Swiſs; and the Engliſh and Spaniards having invaded Guienne, Lewis was obliged to draw ſome of his troops from Italy, to defend his own kingdom. The pope, in the mean time, being freed from his apprehenſions of the French, on the 3d of May opened the council of the Lateran, and appointed the firſt ſeſſion to be held on the 10th of the month, when, he himſelf preſiding, the officials and miniſters of the council were named. In the ſecond ſeſſion, which was held ſeven days after, the conventicle or ſchiſmatic council of Piſa was condemned, and cenſures were decreed againſt thoſe who either directly or indirectly adhered to that aſſembly. The third ſeſſion was then deferred till the beginning of November. The pope in the mean time, having rejected the terms of peace which he himſelf had propoſed to the king of France, and which had been accepted by that prince, afterwards pronounced a monitory againſt him, threatening him with excommunication if he did not ſet the cardinal of Medicis at liberty. This cardinal was then a priſoner at Milan, where, to the great offence of the ſchiſmatic council, he was acknowleged by the people as apoſtolic legate, and gave abſolution to thoſe ſoldiers who promiſed not to ſerve any more againſt the church.

The French are almoſt wholly expelled from Italy.

THE French commander in the Milaneſe, upon the news of the victory at Ravenna, had imprudently diſcharged a great many Italian ſoldiers, a circumſtance which haſtened the ruin of the king's affairs in Italy; for the emperor, having now openly declared for the pope, and recalled 5000 Germans that had hitherto acted in conjunction with the French, and the Swiſs having likewiſe joined the Venetian army, Palice was no longer able to make oppoſition, and therefore retired with the greateſt part of his troops into Pavia, and put the reſt of them into one or two other places. About the ſame time the Venetians and Swiſs, taking poſſeſſion of Cremona and Bergamo, and the inhabitants of the country, in many places of the duchy, riſing againſt the French, Trivulzi, with many other gentlemen, abandoned the city of Milan, and fled towards Piedmont, along with whom went the ſchiſmatic cardinals and their adherents. The cardinal of Medicis was carried with them as a priſoner, but eſcaped in paſſing the Po, while the Venetians took poſſeſſion of Pavia, Lodi, and ſeveral other f towns, in the name of the holy league. Parma and Placenza surrendered voluntarily to the pope, who claimed them as belonging to the exarchate of Ravenna; and Janus Fregoso, having obtained some troops from the Venetians, marched towards Genoa, which city revolted from the French, and created him doge [l]. All those cities likewise, which the French had seized in Romagna, returned to the obedience of the pope; who also, by the means of the duke of Urbino, recovered Bologna; which, as a punishment for its rebellion, he laid under a heavy contribution, and had even resolved totally to have destroyed it, if he had lived [m].

JULIUS was still intent upon accomplishing his other designs, namely, to take possession of the duchy of Ferrara, to expel the Spaniards and Germans from Italy, and to re-establish the houses of Sforza and Medicis at Milan and Florence. He was prevailed upon to agree to an accommodation with the duke of Ferrara, who, having obtained a safe-conduct, went to Rome to ask his pardon; and at the congress, which a few weeks after the allies held at Mantua, he procured the duchy of Milan to be restored to Maximilian, the son of the late Lewis Sforza, contrary to the inclination of the king of Arragon and the emperor, who designed it for one of their grandsons. He then sent his army, with the Spanish auxiliaries, against the Florentines, who were compelled to surrender the government of their city to Laurence Medicis II. nephew of the cardinal.

As the Swiss, from their enmity to the king of France, had been the chief instruments of the revolution in Lombardy, Julius sent a standard, a cap, and a sword, to the cantons, and conferred upon them the title of Defenders of Ecclesiastical Liberty. Soon after the bishop of Gurck, the emperor's plenipotentiary at Mantua, arrived at Rome, where Julius received him with the greatest respect, and concluded an alliance with Maximilian against the Venetians, who obstinately refused to deliver up Vicenza to the emperor. After the conclusion of this treaty, the German bishop was present at the third session of the council of the Lateran, which had been deferred till the third of December. In this session the emperor approved of the Lateran council, and the pope denounced a sentence of interdiction against the kingdom of France, especially the city of Lyons, where the schismatic cardinals still pretended to hold their council. In the fourth session, held on the 11th of the month, the letter of Lewis XI. of France was read, abrogating the pragmatic sanction; and a monitory was then pronounced, citing the French king, and all the prelates, chapters, and parliaments, in that kingdom, to appear within sixty days before the council, to justify the repealing of the said abrogation (T).

THOUGH all Italy now enjoyed a profound tranquillity, and Julius was in possession of almost the whole territories to which, as pope, he could form any pretensions, yet his restless spirit still formed new designs to disturb the public peace. He resolved in the spring to attack the duke of Ferrara, and, as the cardinal of Medicis seemed to adhere more to the king of Arragon than to him, he determined to alter the state of Florence. He likewise recalled the cardinal of Sion from his legation in the Milanese, because the new duke had conferred upon him a revenue of more than 30,000 ducats; and to encourage the king of England in the war against France, he resolved, by a decree of the Lateran council, to transfer to him the title of Most Christian King; for which purpose a bull was expedited, whereby likewise the kingdom of France was granted to whoever should take possession of it. But he was prevented from executing these and other designs by death, which happened to him on the 21st of February, having a few days before caused the council, in their fifth session, to confirm the bull formerly published by him against simony. Being sensible of his approaching end, he declared that the election of his successor belonged to the sacred college, and not to the council, and intreated the cardinals to give the vicariate of the city of Pesaro to his nephew the duke of Urbino. Julius, a few days before his death, according to some authors, expressed great penitence for his proceedings against the king of France, and wished, with great earnestness, that he had never enjoyed the pontificate [n].

He dies at Rome.

UPON the news of the death of the pope, Parma and Placenza were immediately annexed to the duchy of Milan, and the duke of Ferrara recovered all his territories in Romagna. The state of the church suffered no other alteration, and all was quiet at Rome; where, after the usual time for the obsequies of the pope, twenty-four cardinals entered the conclave, and, having agreed to several articles for moderating the authority of the future pope, on the 10th of March they unanimously chose the cardinal of Medicis, who assumed the name of Leo X. He was then only thirty-seven years of age; however, his election gave univerſal ſatisfaction, as he had rendered himſelf famous by his liberality and humanity, and was beſides of unblemiſhed manners, and a great lover of learning and men of genius (U). Four days after his election, the ſchiſmatic cardinals, who, upon the news of the death of Julius, had ſet out for Italy, voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves to the new pope; who ſent the biſhop of Orvieto to them at Florence, to give them hopes of a reconciliation, but deſired them to lay aſide the habit of cardinals, as they had been deprived by the Lateran council, and to remain in that city till they ſhould be recalled to Rome [o]. On the 11th of April, the ſame day that he had been taken priſoner the year before, he was crowned with the greateſt magnificence in the Lateran church; in that ſolemnity, which coſt him 100,000 ducats, the duke of Ferrara, who had obtained a ſuſpenſion of the cenſures denounced againſt him, carried the banner of the church. a b

THE change of the pope and other circumſtances were not ſufficient to procure tranquillity to Italy; for the emperor refuſing to deliver up Verona to the Venetians, that republic would not hearken to a peace; and the king of France, having concluded a truce with the king of Spain for twelve months, again made preparations for recovering the Milaneſe, having for that purpoſe concluded an alliance with the Venetians, who preferred his friendſhip to that of the emperor. Tho' the pope ſeemed inclined to peace, and had publiſhed a brief, exhorting the Venetians to conclude the war, yet he ſtill excited the king of England to make war upon France, and negotiated with the Swiſs to enter Lombardy for the defence of the Milaneſe. In the mean time the French army, under the command of Tremouille and Trivulzi, paſſed the Alps, and, with great rapidity, recovered the whole duchy of Milan, except Como and Novara, while the Venetians took poſſeſſion of Breſcia, Peſchiera, Lodi, and Cremona. This proſperity, however, was of very ſhort continuance; for the French being ſurpriſed and defeated by the Swiſs in a ſally from Novara, the Milaneſe quickly revolted to Sforza, and the Spaniards, declaring for the emperor, attacked the Venetian territories, took ſeveral places, and entirely defeated the army of the republic [p].

DURING theſe tranſactions in the field, Leo held the ſixth ſeſſion of the Lateran council on the 27th of April, when he publiſhed a bull, approving of all their paſt proceedings, and declaring his intention of continuing the aſſembly till peace ſhould be concluded among the Chriſtian princes. In the ſeventh ſeſſion, which was held on the 16th of June, the deputies of the king of Poland, and of the dukes of Mazovia, Ruſſia, Milan, and Mantua, were admitted; and the king of France having ſent the biſhop of Marſeilles to treat of his reunion to the church, the pope, by a decree of the council, gave a liberty to the French biſhops, till the firſt of September, to clear themſelves from their contumacy. A writing was then read, ſigned by the depoſed cardinals Carvajal and Sanſeverino, wherein they approved of the Lateran council, and confeſſed themſelves juſtly deprived of their dignities. Notwithſtanding the great oppoſition of the cardinals of York and Sion, and the ambaſſadors of the emperor and the king of Spain, yet Leo conſented to their reſtoration, judging that the ſchiſmatic council of Piſa would be more eaſily extinguiſhed by lenity than rigour. Tho' the pope, by this proceeding, gratified the French king, he nevertheleſs did his utmoſt to detach the Venetians from their alliance with France, and to mediate a peace betwixt them and the emperor. After the defeat of their troops by the Spaniards, the Venetians conſented to accept of Leo as mediator, and ſent deputies to Rome; whither likewiſe Maximilian ſent the biſhop of Gurck, whom the pope promoted to the dignity of cardinal. The conferences continued three months, during which time the pope publiſhed a ceſſation of hoſtilities; however, he had not influence ſufficient with the two parties to prevail with them to abate of their mutual demands, ſo that the time for the arbitration elapſed without any thing being determined [q].

a liament of Provence, which assumed to itself an authority over the clergy, and would not allow of appeals to the apostolic see, nor suffer the pope's letters to be put in execution without their leave. A decree of the pope was then read against certain philosophers, who affirmed, that the rational soul was mortal, and identically the same in all men. A bull was likewise read for sending cardinals to exhort the Christian princes to peace and concord, and for inviting the Bohemian heretics, with a safe-conduct, to the council; another was issued for reforming the officers of the Roman court, and for putting a stop to their rapaciousness [r].

THE kingdom of France being now re-united to the see of Rome, Leo no longer desired to see it depressed; and tho' he still continued in his resolution of preventing Lewis from possessing the Milanese, he had no desire to see his kingdom attacked by the English and b Germans, and was besides afraid lest Lewis should be persuaded to enter into an alliance with the emperor and the king of Spain, and assist them in conquering the Milanese for their grandson Charles, by which the liberty of Italy would be more endangered than if the duchy were in his own possession. He therefore exhorted the Swiss to an accommodation with the king; but they refusing the offers made to them by Lewis, the pope again endeavoured to mediate a peace betwixt the Venetians and the emperor, to prevent him from having any pretence to enter Italy, and proposed a cessation of arms in Lombardy on certain conditions; which being rejected by the Venetians, as greatly prejudicial to their interest, the pope sent a considerable body of troops to take possession of Crema, to oblige the republic to agree to the preliminaries which he had proposed. His troops, however, were defeated, and c obliged to retire with considerable loss. Leo in the mean time being informed, that a peace was negociating betwixt the kings of France and England, he offered his mediation; which was accepted by both the princes, and a treaty of peace was concluded on the 7th of August. Tho' the pope had exhorted the king of England to this peace, yet, in reality it was concluded against his inclination; but Henry VIII. after having made great preparations for the campaign, being disappointed by the emperor and his father-in-law, who had both agreed to a truce with the French king, resolved no longer to be their tool, and in his turn, disappointed them by entering into a defensive alliance with Lewis [s]. Soon after the conclusion of this treaty, the pope sent some preliminaries into France for an alliance with Lewis against the catholic king, having an intention of expelling the Spaniards from Italy, and con- d ferring the kingdom of Naples upon his brother Julian; but Lewis, neglecting to return an immediate answer to his proposals, Leo in the mean time renewed his alliance with the emperor and the catholic king for one year: and, despairing of conquering Naples, he procured the investiture of Modena and Reggio from the emperor for 40,000 ducats, which he intended as a settlement for his brother, together with Parma, Placenza, and the dutchy of Ferrara; which last he still formed pretensions to, notwithstanding his promises to the duke.

DURING these transactions the king of France was making great preparations for recovering the Milanese, and Leo had celebrated the ninth session of the Lateran council on the 2d of May, when the ambassadors of the king of Portugal were admitted, and the deputies from the Gallican church, tho' they had not appeared, were absolved from all censures, as e by a letter to the pope, and a public instrument taken in a monastery in Savoy, it was proved they could not obtain a safe conduct from the Genoese or the duke of Milan. A decree was then read, enjoining prayers thro' all Christendom for obtaining peace among Christian princes, and union against the Turks. Indulgences were likewise published, and the divine wrath denounced against those who should interrupt the legates or apostolic nuncios, either directly or indirectly, in disposing of the indulgences, and in collecting the revenue arising from their sale. Another decree was also published for the reformation of the Roman court; first, as to the supplying the vacancies of churches, monasteries, and parishes, and prohibiting for the future all grants of reversion; likewise, for the right administration of all benefices, for the correction of the vices of all ecclesiastics and laics, and for regulating the manners of f the cardinals. The ancient canons were also renewed against all violators of the ecclesiastical liberty [t].

ITALY was at this time alarmed with the rumour of an invasion from soltan Selim; who, having poisoned his father Bajazet II. formed pretensions to the western empire as successor of the emperors of Constantinople, and was making immense preparations at Adrianople for some warlike expedition. Leo, to avert the storm from Italy, had ordered a crusade to be preached in Hungary; but Selim, having no intention to attack that kingdom, concluded a peace with Ladislaus (W), and transported his army into Asia against the sophi of

Tho' Selim himſelf a few months afterwards was defeated by the ſophi, yet, upon the news of his firſt victory, Leo wrote to all the Chriſtian princes, exhorting them to unite their forces againſt the infidels [u], who profeſſed publickly their intention of attacking Italy; which kingdom was not only threatened with a war from the Turks, but alſo from Francis I. who upon the death of Lewis XII. which happened on the 1ſt of January, ſucceeded to the crown of France. a

FRANCIS ſollicited the friendſhip of the pope by means of his brother Julian, who had married his aunt, the ſiſter of the duke of Savoy, and likewiſe ſent ambaſſadors for that purpoſe to Rome, among whom was the famous Budæus; but his endeavours were in vain, for Leo had privately acceded to the alliance of the emperor, the king of Spain, and the Swiſs againſt him, and, while he amuſed his ambaſſadors, he celebrated the tenth ſeſſion of the Lateran council on the 2d of May, in which the deputies of the duke of Savoy were admitted. Several decrees were then read for puniſhing delinquent canons and ſecular clerks; concerning the juriſdiction of the ordinary; concerning the celebration of dioceſan and provincial ſynods; and prohibiting the printing of any book or manuſcript without the approbation of the ordinaries and inquiſitors. After the reading of theſe decrees, the proctor of the council produced a writing, containing the ſubmiſſion of the parliament of Provence; which being ingroſſed in the acts, the pope abſolved them from the cenſures contained in the former monitory. During theſe proceedings at Rome, the king of France, having renewed the alliance with the Venetians, marched towards the Alps with an army of upwards of 55,000 men. Leo, tho' he had not openly declared againſt him, yet ſent ſome troops into Lombardy, under pretence of guarding Placenza and Parma; but Proſpero Colonna being ſurpriſed by the French in Piedmont, the pope heſitated greatly whether he ſhould not agree to an accommodation with Francis; who, in the mean time, arriving at Vercelli, there firſt heard that he was his enemy. The king, having continued a few days at Vercelli, advanced with his army to Marignan; where being attacked by the Swiſs, after a furious engagement of two days, he gained a ſignal victory, in conſequence of which he got poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, except the caſtles of Milan and Cremona [w]. b c

THIS victory of the French obliged Leo to think ſeriouſly of an accommodation with Francis. A treaty was accordingly concluded by the mediation of the duke of Savoy, by which the pope ceded Parma and Placenza to the king of France, and promiſed to reſtore Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara; Francis, on his part, engaging to defend the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and to ſupport the authority of the houſe of Medicis in Florence. The king afterwards had a conference with the pope at Bologna, about the middle of December, to conſult about invading the kingdom of Naples. At the ſame time he agreed upon certain articles inſtead of the pragmatic ſanction, in conſideration of which Leo granted him the tythe of all eccleſiaſtical revenues in his kingdom for one year, and allowed him to nominate all biſhoprics and abbacies, on condition, however, that the annates ſhould be paid to the court of Rome; not according to the ancient regulation, but according to the real value. The king likewiſe interceded for the duke of Urbino, the nephew of the late pope, with whom Leo was offended, becauſe, from a diſguſt of Laurence de Medicis, he had recalled his troops from the eccleſiaſtical army; but the pope having been informed that the duke had endeavoured to excite Francis againſt him, and being beſides deſirous of annexing his territories to his own family, refuſed the king's requeſt. Francis, after the conference, returned to Milan, and having concluded an alliance with the Swiſs, diſbanded his army, and repaſſed the Alps in the beginning of January. d e

THE pope about the ſame time went to Florence, and during his reſidence in that city aſſiſted the biſhop of Petrucci, his antient friend, to take poſſeſſion of the city of Siena; and, notwithſtanding his late treaty with the king of France, upon hearing that the emperor had entered Italy, to recover the Milaneſe, he appointed the cardinal Bibiena to attend him as his legate, and gave permiſſion to Marc Antonio Colonna to join him with 200 men at arms. However, he did not openly break with the French; for, at the requeſt of the king, he ordered his nephew Laurence to ſend from Florence a ſubſidy ſufficient to pay 3000 Swiſs for one month, and he deſired the legate to ſtop on his journey under pretence of ſickneſs. Leo by this proceeding, in ſome meaſure ſaved his honour; for Maximilian, being in great want of money, was obliged to leave his army upon a feigned excuſe, and return to Germany, while great part of his troops enliſted in the ſervice of the French and Venetians, and the reſt returned to Germany and Swiſſerland. While the emperor was in Italy, the pope, hearing of the death of the king of Hungary and Bohemia, wrote to the cardinal of Strigonia to take care of the education of his ſon Lewis, then a boy of ten years of age, and diſſuaded him from hearkening to the propoſals of the Turks, who had ſent an embaſſy, deſiring a peace or a truce with the Hungarians [x]. f a About the ſame time, being deſirous of poſſeſſing the duchy of Urbino, Leo publiſhed a monitory againſt the duke, in which he accuſed him of diſloyalty, as a vaſſal of the church, and, in a few weeks having conquered the territories of Urbino, Peſara, and Sinigaglia, he gave the inveſtiture of them to his nephew Laurence, obliging all the cardinals to ſign with their own hand the bull expedited for that purpoſe [y]. After this conqueſt he endeavoured to diſſuade the archduke Charles, who had ſucceeded his grandfather Ferdinand of Arragon, from engaging in an alliance with France, and he ſecretly ſollicited the emperor, the king of England, and the Swiſs, to attack the Milaneſe. Francis, being informed of theſe deſigns of the pope, laid aſide the thoughts of an expedition againſt Naples, and concluded an alliance with the young catholic king at Noyon. The emperor had a liberty for two months to b accede to this treaty, on condition of accommodating all his differences with the Venetians [z]. Maximilian accordingly embraced this opportunity of ſupplying his empty coffers, and promiſed to deliver up Verona to the Venetians, on conſideration of receiving from them 200,000 ducats; which article was actually put in execution in the beginning of the following year.

The pope ſeizes upon the duchy of Urbino.

A treaty concluded betwixt the emperor and the kings of France and Spain.

The news of this accommodation betwixt the king of France, the emperor, and his grandſon Charles, was very diſagreeable to the pope; who, in the mean time celebrated the eleventh ſeſſion of the Lateran council on the 19th of December, in which three deputies were admitted from the patriarch of the Maronites, who deſired to be inſtructed in the faith and rites of the Roman church [a]. A decree was then read againſt vain preachers, who were ordered, under ſevere cenſures, not to publiſh falſe miracles and prophecies, but c to explain the ſcripture according to the interpretation of the fathers. The council after this confirmed the Concordata concluded betwixt the pope and the king of France at Bologna; and in the twelfth and laſt ſeſſion, which was held on the 16th of March, a letter from the emperor was read, in anſwer to one from the pope, who had exhorted him to declare war againſt the grand ſignor, then more formidable than ever by his late conqueſt of Syria. Maximilian, in his turn, exhorted the pope and the cardinals to the ſacred expedition, and promiſed to attend them, and aſſiſt them with his forces. After the reading of his letter, a bull was publiſhed, impoſing a tythe upon all eccleſiaſtical revenues for three years for the Turkiſh war; and, all the acts of the fathers being confirmed, the council was ſolemnly diſſolved, as the ſchiſm occaſioned by the council of Piſa was at an end, and a peace con- d cluded among the Chriſtian princes (X).

A. D. 1517.

The Lateran council is diſſolved.

Tho' this general peace procured tranquillity to the Venetians and the Milaneſe, yet the pope was thereby engaged in a new war; for upon the delivery of Verona to the Venetians, 6000 foreign ſoldiers entered into the ſervice of the duke of Urbino, by whoſe aſſiſtance he quickly recovered his former duchy. The pope was greatly afraid that the duke was ſupported by the king of France, who he believed was greatly diſſatisfied with him, as he had not only neglected to fulfil his part of the treaty concluded at Bologna, but upon his return to Rome, had even publiſhed a bull contrary to the convention. However, the kings of France and Spain, from their mutual jealouſy of each other, gave aſſiſtance to Leo againſt the duke of Urbino, and Francis renewed with him the treaty of Bologna. Notwithſtand- e ing the French and Spaniſh reinforcements, the pope's army was not powerful enough to venture an engagement; and ſoon after ſome thouſands of Spaniards and Germans deſerting to the duke of Urbino, his army became more formidable than in the beginning of the campaign.

The duke of Urbino makes war upon the pope;

In the mean time the pope himſelf was threatened with a conſpiracy at Rome, which was headed by the cardinal of Siena, who, with his brother Borgheſe, had been expelled from that place, altho' it was chiefly by his means that the family of the Medicis had recovered Florence, and Leo himſelf had obtained the pontificate. The plot being diſcovered, the cardinal of Siena, with ſeveral others of leſſer note, were put to death, and two other cardinals were degraded. By theſe ſeverities, Leo being ſenſible that he had rendered himſelf f odious to the ſacred college, he therefore reſolved upon a promotion of new cardinals, and on the 26th of June nominated thirty-one perſons to that dignity, without regard to their merit, many of them having bought their preferment with money, and others owing their

The levying of the tythe was likewiſe objected to by the clergy of Spain, who, in a council held at Madrid in the month of September, declared that they would not conſent to that tax (8). There is alſo a ſpeech extant, in the name of Francis Picus of Mirandola, ſaid to have been ſpoken by him in the laſt ſeſſion; by which, in the moſt earneſt manner, he recommended to the pope and the council to think of a reformation of manners (9).

Having by this new promotion provided for his ſafety at Rome, Leo proſecuted the war againſt Urbino, who, being unable to ſupport his troops, ſoon after conſented to a peace on theſe conditions, namely, that the pope ſhould pay to the Spaniſh troops 45,000 ducats, and 60,000 to the Gaſcons and Germans, who ſhould thereupon, within thirty days, evacuate the territories of the church, and of Florence; that the duke of Urbino ſhould reſign his duchy; that the pope ſhould abſolve him from all cenſures, and ſhould allow him to retire to Mantua with all his effects, particularly with his artillery, and the famous library that had been collected by his grandfather by the mother's ſide [c]. By this ſubmiſſion of the duke of Urbino, all hoſtilities ceaſed in Italy, which for many years had been the ſeat of ruinous wars; the temporal power of the pope was raiſed higher than ever it had been before, and his ſpiritual authority was quietly ſubmitted to by all Europe: however, this ſame year the papal uſurpations met with ſuch an oppoſition in Germany, as not only put a ſtop to their further progreſs, but gave them ſuch a blow, that they have been declining ever ſince.

THE apoſtolic ſee, by its inſatiable avarice, was itſelf inſtrumental, though not deſignedly, in promoting this great revolution; for beſides the indulgences which had been granted by the Lateran council for an expedition againſt the Turks, Leo, who was in great want of money, this year, by the advice of cardinal Pucci, publiſhed other indulgences through all Chriſtendom, to be ſold indiſcriminately to all purchaſers (Y). Theſe he farmed out to the higheſt bidders; and his ſiſter Magdalen, who had received from him the revenue of thoſe that were diſpoſed of in ſeveral parts of Germany, appointed Arcimboldus, archbiſhop of Upſal, her commiſſary, who exerciſed his office with great avarice and extortion [d]. The Dominicans, who had received the commiſſion from the archbiſhop of Mentz to publiſh the indulgences, acted with great indiſcretion; they printed ſeveral books, extolling the power of their abſolutions, to which they gave the name of the Grand Pardons; and for certain rates, ſet down in a tariff which had been given them, they not only abſolved the living from all their ſins, but delivered the ſouls of the dead from the pretended pains of purgatory. They likewiſe ſold the liberty of eating fleſh, eggs, milk, and cheeſe, upon prohibited days, and publickly ſquandered a great part of the money, ariſing from the ſale of the indulgences, in taverns, where they frequently ſtaked their abſolutions at a game of tables [e].

THESE proceedings occaſioned great murmurings over all Germany; and John Stanpitz, vicar-general of the Auguſtines, offended, as it is ſaid, that his order had not been employed in diſpoſing of the indulgences, preached againſt them with great warmth at Wittemberg, where he was likewiſe aſſiſted by Martin Luther, a monk of his order, and profeſſor in that univerſity, who not only exerted himſelf in his diſcourſes againſt the indulgences, but likewiſe wrote to the archbiſhop of Mentz, complaining of the proceedings of the Dominicans; and, on the laſt day of October, publiſhed ninety-five propoſitions or theſes againſt indulgences, penance, purgatory, and the authority of the pope (Z). The archbiſhop took no notice of his letter, but ſoon after John Tetzel, a Dominican, and director of the ſales of indulgences in Saxony, publiſhed a hundred and ſix propoſitions in defence of the pope's authority, and, as inquiſitor of the faith, ordered thoſe of Luther to be burnt. (Y) Indulgences were originally exemptions from taxes, granted by the emperors and governors to provinces that had been harraſſed by enemies, earthquakes, unfruitful ſeaſons, &c. the popes applied them to ſpiritual matters, and granted them to thoſe who went to recover the Holy Land from the Saracens. They diſpenſed them likewiſe to thoſe who, inſtead of marching perſonally againſt the infidels, contributed to the expence of the expedition. Afterwards the indulgences and pardons became more common; but Leo, at this time, proſtituted them to a greater degree than they had ever been before.

(Z) Martin Luther was born in 1483, at Iſlebe, in the county of Mansfield, in Upper Saxony. His father, whoſe name was Lotter, or Lauther, intended that he ſhould follow the profeſſion of the law; but Luther, after he had finiſhed his courſe of philoſophy, having, while he was walking in the fields, being terrified with a clap of thunder, which killed his companion, he made a vow of becoming monk, which he accordingly performed two years afterwards at Erford, in the 22d year of his age. He was ſoon after appointed profeſſor in the univerſity, which Frederic the Wiſe, duke of Saxony, a few years before had eſtabliſhed at Wittemberg, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his active genius, his great memory, and natural eloquence. In 1516 he began to ſtudy the Greek and Hebrew, and publiſhed ſeveral theſes concerning free-will, the merit of good works, and human traditions, contrary to the opinions of the ſcholaſtic divines, for whom he had long teſtified a great contempt, as corrupters of the goſpel by their ſophiſtical philoſophy. By this proceeding it would appear, that the diſappointment of publiſhing the indulgences was not the only motive of his preaching againſt them. In 1524 he quitted the habit of a monk, and the year after married a wife, by whom he had three ſons. He died on the 18th of February 1546. According to Baſnage, he had many faults, as all great men have; but he always preſerved that devotion which appeared in his early youth. He had an ardent zeal for the glory of God, and the re-eſtabliſhment of the church, and a firmneſs of mind that was unſhaken by the greateſt dangers (1).

a pute, which at firſt was looked upon only as a ſcholaſtic controverſy, quickly began to be regarded in a more ſerious manner. The theſes of Luther were greatly read and approved; however, one Eckius, a profeſſor of divinity at Ingolſtadt, wrote againſt them; and at Rome they were impugned by one Prieras a Dominican, and maſter of the ſacred palace, who, in his book, treated Luther with contempt and ridicule, not knowing that he was attacking his adverſary with his own weapons; for ſoon after Luther publiſhed an anſwer to Prieras, in which he retorted the ridicule upon his opponent. He uſed the ſame arms againſt one Holſtraten, another Dominican, who had written with great bitterneſs againſt him, and exhorted the pope to condemn him as a heretic [f]. Luther judging likewiſe that his adverſaries were endeavouring to defame him, in the month of June he wrote in a b ſubmiſſive manner to the pope, in his own juſtification, promiſing all obedience to the apoſtolic ſee, and declaring that he had publiſhed his theſes only with the intention of diſputing in a ſcholaſtic manner [g].

A. D. 1518: The Dominicans defend the pope's authority, and condemn the theſes of Luther.

LEO gave but very little attention to theſe commotions in a remote part of Germany, being much more alarmed by the progreſs of the grand ſignor Selim, who the year before had conquered Egypt, and put an end to the government of the Mamalukes. As he was a prince of great ambition, and had now no enemy in Aſia, Leo was apprehenſive leſt he ſhould turn his victorious arms againſt Italy; he therefore cauſed devout proceſſions to be made at Rome, and walked himſelf barefoot, with all his court, from the Vatican to the church of Minerva [h]. He then wrote to all the Chriſtian princes, exhorting them to a mutual truce for five years; c and having ſettled the plan of the expedition, he ſent legates into the different kingdoms of Europe, to excite the princes to grant their contingents [i]. But Selim remaining inactive, the danger ſeemed to vaniſh; ſo that the ſecular princes, upon various pretences, refuſed to act, and the Spaniſh clergy abſolutely refuſed to pay the tythe, as they gave no credit to the reaſons urged by the pope. Cardinal Cajetan, a Dominican, went as legate to Germany, and was preſent at the diet of Augsburg, held in the beginning of Auguſt, where the emperor, the electors, and many other German princes, aſſembled, to conſult of the Turkiſh expedition. Cajetan, in the preſence of the diet, conferred a cardinal's hat on the archbiſhop of Mentz, a brother of the elector of Brandenburg, by which proceeding he diſguſted the German princes, who were offended that one of their members ſhould take a particular oath of obedience to d the holy ſee. The elector of Saxony, and many other princes, made great complaints of the violation of the Germanic Concordata, and propoſed to ſuppreſs the mandates and grants of reſervation ſtill uſurped by the popes; but as the diet was not unanimous, nothing was effected [k].

The pope endeavours to promote a general cruſade againſt the Turks.

A diet held for that purpoſe at Augsburg.

THE emperor, in the beginning of the diet, had written to the pope, deſiring him to proceed againſt Luther; but before his letter arrived at Rome, Leo having received repeated complaints againſt Luther from Germany, had cited him to appear at Rome within ſixty days, and had written to the duke of Saxony to deliver him to Cajetan. However, at the interceſſion of the elector of the univerſity of Wittemberg, he conſented that his cauſe ſhould be tried at Augsburg. Luther, having obtained a ſafe-conduct from the emperor, appeared e before Cajetan about the middle of October, and had ſeveral conferences with him; but the legate inſiſting abſolutely upon his recantation, and refuſing to enter into any diſpute, excepting ſlightly urging the authority of a decree of Clement VI. Luther declared, that he would not retract the doctrines that he had preached and written, unleſs he was convicted of their error; but, as he was a man, and therefore fallible, he ſubmitted his opinion to the deciſion of the church, and to the univerſities of Germany, and particularly to that of Paris. As he was then threatened by the legate, he privately left Augsburg; but before his departure he cauſed an appeal to the pope to be fixed up in the public places of the city [l]. Cajetan immediately wrote to Rome, complaining of Luther's obſtinacy, and ſent a letter to the duke of Saxony to baniſh him from his dominions. At the ſame time Luther wrote a ſubmiſſive f letter to the pope, complaining againſt Cajetan; and, a few weeks after, being informed that his appeal was rejected, he again appealed from the pope, who, like other men, was fallible, to a future general council.

LEO, to put a ſtop to the diſputes in Germany concerning the ſupremacy of the pope, on the 9th of November publiſhed a new bull, confirming his indulgences; in which he affirmed, that all ought to believe that the biſhop of Rome had a power of forgiving ſins. Soon after he ſent a golden roſe to the duke of Saxony, and ſollicited his counſellors to perſuade him to withdraw his protection from Luther. However, his endeavours were in vain; for the elector, upon the death of the emperor, which happened on the 12th of January, aſſuming, as vicar, the government of great part of the empire during the interregnum, Luther's g authority increaſed, and he began to be looked upon as a man ſent from God, to remedy the diſorders and abuſes of the Roman church. The elector refuſed to accept of the roſe; however the nuncio, who was a German, prevailed upon Luther to write in a ſubmiſſive manner to Rome, and to ſubmit his cauſe to the judgment of a German biſhop. Luther accordingly wrote in very reſpectful terms to the pope, but he added, that he would not retract his opinions, unleſs they were proved to him to be erroneous. He afterwards refuſed to ſubmit to the deciſion of the archbiſhop of Triers, as he heard that cardinal Cajetan was to be preſent at the conferences, and the pope had not authorized the archbiſhop to give a final determination. However, he conſented to a public diſpute with Eckius of Leipſic, a city under the dominion of George, duke of Saxony, couſin of the elector Frederic, whither he repaired with Caroloſtadt and Philip Melanchthon, who the year before had been appointed Greek profeſſor at Wittemberg. The diſpute continued for ſeveral days, each party claiming the victory; but the univerſities of Cologn, Louvain, and Paris, which laſt had been choſen as judge of the diſputation, decided in favour of Eckius [m]. a b

During theſe proceedings, Charles of Auſtria, king of Spain, was elected emperor on the 28th of June, cardinal Cajetan having, by the pope's authority, diſpenſed with the impediment of his being king of Naples. Leo ſoon after, to prevent a war in Italy, granted him the inveſtiture of that kingdom, and wrote to him in Spain, exhorting him to war againſt the Turks. In the mean time, notwithſtanding his nephew Lorenzo had died witnout iſſue, he ſtill kept poſſeſſion of the duchy of Florence, and endeavoured to ſurprize the city of Ferrara; but his deſign being diſcovered, it proved ineffectual [n]. Mean while the favourers of Luther not only increaſed in the empire, but, according to Guicciardini, his doctrines began to be attended to in Italy [o]. The king of Denmark publicly approved of his proceedings [p]; and Laurence and Olaus Petri, two brothers that had ſtudied at Wittemberg, publiſhed his doctrines in Sweden, where they met with a favourable reception [q]. It appears likewiſe from the letters of Eraſmus to him and the duke of Saxony, that his opinions were well received in England and Flanders [r] (A). While his writings and doctrines engaged the attention of great part of Europe, Ulric Zuinglius, born in the canton of Glaritz, preached againſt the abuſes and errors of the Roman church in Switzerland, without having any correſpondence with him, from whom he differed in ſome points of his new doctrine. Notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the biſhop of Conſtance, the magiſtrates of Zurich approved of the proceedings of Zuinglius, and that whole canton, with thoſe of Bern, Baſil, and Schaffhauſen, embraced his opinions [s]. c d

A. D. 1520. LUTHER, in the mean time, being aſſured of the protection of the duke of Saxony, and other princes of the empire, publiſhed a treatiſe on Chriſtian liberty, which he ſent to Rome, with a letter addreſſed to the pope, in which he declared, that he had no other deſign than the glory of God, and the diſcovery of truth, the profeſſion of which he would never forſake. He then affirmed that the court of Rome was more corrupt than ever Babylon or Sodom had been; and that it were better for Leo to be a ſimple prieſt, than to be ſurrounded by ſo many flatterers, like a lamb in the midſt of wolves. About the ſame time he publiſhed ſeveral other treatiſes concerning confeſſion, vows, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communicating under both kinds, ſome of which were ſoon after cenſured by the univerſities of Cologn and Louvain. Luther quickly wrote an anſwer in his own juſtification, and in his preface treated the univerſities with great freedom, affirming, that Ariſtotle was their chief God, and that it was their practice to perſecute great men, ſuch as Picus of Mirandola, Laurence Valla, and Reuchlin. To protect himſelf from the malice of his enemies, he wrote at this time to the emperor, intreating him to defend him from all violence, till his cauſe ſhould be tried. Charles V. about the ſame time, was ſollicited by cardinal Adrian, the pope's e

(A) Eraſmus was at this time about fifty years of age, and had rendered himſelf famous by his writings over all Europe. As he had written very freely againſt the monks, the ſcholaſtic divines, and ſeveral ſuperſtitions of the Roman church, Luther expected that he would declare for him, and both he and the elector of Saxony wrote to him to know his ſentiments. Eraſmus, in his anſwer, declared, that he had not read Luther's books; that he greatly diſapproved of the bad uſage he had received from the monks, who had likewiſe expreſſed great enmity againſt himſelf; that he could neither condemn nor approve of his proceedings; and that what had not yet been examined, ought not to be condemned; but for the future he counſelled him to proceed with more moderation, and rather attack thoſe who abuſed the pope's authority, than the popes themſelves. Although he all his life refuſed to declare for the party of Luther, yet, on account of the notes which he publiſhed on ſeveral parts of ſcripture, contrary to the received opinions of the ſchool divines, and the liberty he took in ridiculing the ignorant clergy; he was looked upon by many as Luther's forerunner and inſtructor, and was accuſed by the monks of hereſy, error, and impiety. His opinions, which after his death were condemned by the council of Trent, appeared ſo dubious, that they gave riſe to the proverb, Aut Lutherus Eraſmiſat, aut Eraſmus Lutheriſat; Luther has either turned Eraſmian, or Eraſmus turned Lutheran (z).

a nuncio in Spain, to order Luther to be apprehended; but he declaring that he could not satisfy the pope till after his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, Leo assembled the cardinals and divines at Rome, and, on the 15th of June, drew up a bull, by which he condemned forty-one of the propositions of Luther, and ordered them, and all his writings, to be burnt, commanding likewise the author, and all his followers, to recant within sixty days, under pain of being excommunicated and reckoned heretics [t]. He is excommunicated.

By this bull, which was read for several days in the churches in Germany, Luther saw himself cut off from all hopes of an accommodation, unless he would recant, for otherwise it was impossible for the pope, without contradicting his claim to infallibility, to retract his decree. Resolving, at all hazards, to defend the propositions which he had advanced, he immedi-
b ately published a book against the church of Rome, exhorting the German nation to shake off its authority, and to oblige the pope and bishops to submit to the emperor. He likewise renewed his appeal to a future council; and as his books had been burnt at Rome, Louvain, and Cologn, he, in return, erected a pile of wood without the walls of Wittemberg, where, in presence of almost the whole city, and a great many doctors, he set fire to the wood, and threw the canon law and the pope's bull into the flames [u]. A few weeks after the pope celebrated a diet at Worms, which was opened on the 6th of January. Among other matters, this assembly proposed to take cognizance of the cause of Luther, notwithstanding the objections of Alcandre, one of the pope's nuncios, who asserted, that they ought not to intermeddle in an affair that had been already determined by the pope. The emperor having
c granted his safe-conduct to Luther, he arrived at Worms on the 16th of April, where he again absolutely refused to retract his opinions, unless he was convinced, by reason or scripture, that they were erroneous. The elector of Treves, a few days after he had appeared before the diet, advised him, at a private conference, to think of some remedy for the present disorders: but he still continuing in his former sentiments, the emperor ordered him to leave Worms, and granted him a safe-conduct for twenty-one days [w]. After his departure he put him to the ban of the empire, by an edict which was published on the 8th of May, by which, after accusing him of heresy, he confirmed the pope's bull against him and his followers, prohibited all from affording him any protection, and ordered him to be seized and imprisoned after the expiration of the time prescribed in his safe-conduct. All his books
d were likewise prohibited, and ordered to be burnt [x]. He exhorts the Germans to shake off the authority of the church of Rome. A. D. 1521. and is put to the ban of the empire.

Mean while the pope, who now began to be alarmed by the commotions in Germany, held frequent consistories at Rome, to consult of means to oppose Luther [y]. On the 2d of January he not only excommunicated him, but denounced the same sentence against all who favoured or protected him [z]. This bull he again repeated on the Thursday before Easter [a]; and having received a book from Henry VIII. king of England, in defence of the doctrines of the Roman church impugned by Luther, he conferred on that prince the title of Defender of the Faith. About the same time he, with great imprudence, fomented the jealousies betwixt the emperor and the king of France, who had been rivals for the empire. In the vain expectation of expelling the French and Spaniards from Italy, and enlarging the pose session of the church by the acquisition of Ferrara, Parma, and Placentia, instead of using his authority as a mediator, he, with great earnestness, promoted a war [b]. At first he adhered to the king of France; but being informed of his unsuccessful expedition against Navarre, he entered into an alliance with the emperor and the king of England against him: and soon after sending troops to the Milanese, which were reinforced with others from Germany, he quickly made himself master of Milan, Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia. In the midst of these conquests, and while he was soliciting the Venetians to declare against the French, he was cut off by a sudden death, which happened to him on the 2d of December, and which was believed to be the effect of poison, administered to him by Barnabas Malaspina, gentleman of his bedchamber, who, on that suspicion was imprisoned, but aff terwards set at liberty by the cardinal of Medicis, who suppressed all examination on that affair [c]. According to Guicciardini, Leo was possessed of a great many good qualities, which were blemished with a great number of bad ones; and he discovered, during his pontificate, more prudence, and much less probity, than was expected [d]. He had a great love for the fine arts and sciences, and was very liberal to learned men; but he is accused of having been a voluptuary, ambitious, and extremely revengeful. Paul Jovius charges him with the crime of sodomy, and Picus of Mirandola affirms that he was an atheist [e]. Leo renews the excommunication against him, and enters into an alliance with the new emperor against the king of France. He dies suddenly.

Upon the death of Leo, the college of cardinals were at a loss whether to espouse the party of the king of France or the emperor; and giving no orders to the army in the Mi- laneſe, the duke of Urbino, while they were deliberating at Rome, recovered his former duchy, a and the duke of Ferrara again got poſſeſſion of ſome of his antient territories in Romagna; but the French ſtill continued too weak to face the imperialiſts. The cardinal of Ivrea, who favoured the French, being ſeized in Lombardy on his journey to Rome, the college made a decree not to proceed to the election of a pope till he was ſet at liberty. He ſoon after arriving at the city, thirty-nine cardinals entered the conclave on the 27th of December, and, after a long conteſt, on the 9th of January unanimouſly choſe Adrian cardinal of Tortoſa.

THE conteſt was occaſioned by the great number of competitors, the chief of whom at firſt was the cardinal of Medicis; but he was oppoſed by the others, in the intereſt of the emperor and of cardinal Wolſey, who relying on the emperor's promiſe in his favour, and the influence of his money, was in great hopes of ſucceeding. Though Charles had indeed made great promiſes to Wolſey, in order to ſecure the friendſhip of Henry VIII. yet he had b no intention at that time of fulfilling them, but deſired to have a pope, who he knew would be entirely in his intereſts. He therefore, not to offend Wolſey, with great ſecreſy intrigued with the conclave; and, after having ſecured the majority of votes, one of the cardinals, Adrian VI. is elected A. D. 1522. on the laſt day of the election, propoſed Adrian as it were by chance; and being ſeconded by another, who made a long ſpeech in his favour, all that faction declared for him, and were followed by the whole conclave[f] (B). As Adrian was utterly unknown to the cardinals, had never been in Italy, and was entirely unacquainted with the cuſtoms of the court of Rome, the Romans were greatly offended at his election; and when the conclave broke up, inſulted and abuſed the cardinals, who, in their own defence, alleged, that they had been directed by the holy ſpirit[g]. c

THE new pope received the news of his election in Spain, where he was governor during the abſence of the emperor; and retaining, contrary to the uſual cuſtom, his own name, He arrives at Rome, he embarked at Terragona, and arrived at Rome on the 29th of Auguſt, where two days protect him from the conſequence of the ban, had ordered a troop of maſked horſe-men to continued near ten months, neither his friends nor enemies at firſt knowing what was being informed that Caroloſtadt was making himſelf a chief of a party at Wittemberg, and had excited the young people to deſtroy the altars, and pull down the images and crucifixes, he left Wartburg in the beginning of March, without leave of the elector, and again appeared in public. He blamed the proceeding of Caroloſtadt, who in reſentment quitted *Wittemwhich, not being conformable to the vulgate, and wanting ſeveral canonical books, was

to underſtand the affairs of his court; but putting little confidence in the cardinals, his chief favourites were John Rufus biſhop of Conſenza, and William Eikenwort, and Theodoric Hetius, Having made great progreſs in learning, he was promoted to the vice-chancellorſhip of the univerſity of Louvain, and afterwards appointed preceptor to Charles V. who created him one of his chief counſellors of ſtate; and by the intereſt of his grand-father Maximilian, procured for him a cardinal's hat from Leo X. in 1519 (3).

a knights, quitted the iſland, and ſailed for Crete[i]. Adrian was more intent on recovering Rimini, which had revolted during the vacancy of the ſee; for that purpoſe having ſent forces into Romagna, he obliged Sigiſmond Malateſta to quit the city, and ſoon after was reconciled to the dukes of Ferrara and Urbino, having annulled all the bulls that had been publiſhed againſt them by his predeceſſors, Julius II. and Leo X[k].

MEAN while Luther, having procured a copy of the pope's letter to the diet, tranſlated it into the German language; and Adrian having confeſſed that there was great need of a reformation, but that they ought to proceed ſtep by ſtep, Luther, in his notes, added, that the popes had hitherto taken 100 years betwixt each ſtep to reform any grievances. The diet likewiſe declared to the nuncio, that it was impoſſible to put the edict of the emperor
b againſt the Lutherans in execution, without hazarding a civil war, as the people, by the books that were lately publiſhed, were now well inſtructed in the oppreſſions of the court of Rome; and that the beſt means to quiet the diſturbances would be to aſſemble a general council, with the condition that the members ſhould ſwear to declare their ſentiments freely, and without diſguiſe. Notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the legate, they alſo drew up a memorial, which they intitled Centum Gravamina, or the Hundred Grievances; and on the 6th of March, they publiſhed an edict, prohibiting the preachers to diſcourſe of any ſubject tending to diſturb the public peace, which, with the memorial, the pope's brief, and their anſwer to the legate, they ſent over all Germany, and even to Rome, where the ingenuous confeſſion of the pope, that his court and the clergy were the original ſource of the evil, gave great of-which remonſtrates againſt the oppreſſions of the church of Rome.

DURING theſe proceedings in Germany, the king of France was making great preparations for an expedition into Italy, eſpecially as he heard the Venetians were ſtrongly ſollicited to enter into an alliance with the emperor. Adrian at the ſame time earneſtly exhorted the Chriſtian princes to agree to a truce, and to turn their arms againſt the Turks; but Francis I. not agreeing to this propoſal, which would deprive him of the opportunity of recovering the Milaneſe, the pope, at the perſuaſion of the emperor and the king of England, on the laſt day of April publiſhed a bull, ordering all the Chriſtian princes to obſerve a truce for three years, under pain of excommunication and interdict. Francis ſtill continuing his preparations for his intended expedition, the pope, at the inſtigation of the viceroy of Naples, ac-
d ceded on the 3d of Auguſt to the treaty that had been formed againſt France by the emperor, the king of England, the archduke of Auſtria, the duke of Milan, the Florentines, the Genoeſe, Venetians, Luccheſe, and Sienneſe. Notwithſtanding this formidable alliance, Francis ſoon after ſent an army into the Milaneſe, where he quickly recovered ſeveral towns, as Proſpero Colonna, the general of the confederate army, had neglected to repair the fortifications. Mean while Adrian, having granted to the emperor Charles, the right of preſenting to all biſhoprics in Spain[m], died at Rome on the 14th of September, in the 65th year of his age, and the 2d of his pontificate. His death, which was ſuſpected to be the effect of poiſon, gave great joy to the Romans, who were offended with his ſobriety and regular manners, having been debauched by the luxury introduced by his predeceſſor Leo[n] (C).

e AFTER the funeral obſequies of Adrian, the cardinals entered the conclave, where they ſpent thirty days in diſputes before they were determined in their choice of a ſucceſſor to the papal dignity. According to ſome authors, Nicolas Scomberg, a German, and archbiſhop of Capua, was propoſed as a candidate[o]; but the chief conteſt was occaſioned by the cardinals Colonna and Medicis, the firſt of whom was ſupported by the intereſt of the king of France, and the laſt by that of the emperor. After long diſputes, the cardinal of Medicis, having increaſed his party by promiſing the vice-chancellorſhip of the church to cardinal Urſino, was at length unanimouſly elected on the 18th of November, and aſſuming the name of Clement VII. was ſolemnly crowned on the 25th of the ſame month[p] (D). of the Roman church, and was distinguished for his gravity, constancy, and application to business, great expectations were raised among the Christian princes upon the news of his election. The duke of Ferrara immediately laid aside his design upon Modena, and John de Saffatello ceased all hostilities in Romagna, into which province, during the vacancy of the see, he had marched with a considerable body of troops [q] (E). a

He refuses to become a party in the war betwixt the emperor and the king of France. A. D. 1524.

CLEMENT, soon after his election, received an embassy from the emperor and the king of France, each of whom endeavoured to draw him into their alliance; but he refused at first to engage in their disputes, otherwise than as mediator; and in the beginning of the year sent legates to them, and to the king of England, to exhort them to a peace or truce, which proposition was rejected by all the princes. About the same time he sent the cardinal Campegio, as his legate, to the diet of Nuremberg, who, at the desire of the princes, entered the city without any pomp, not to give any offence to the Lutheran party, which was there very powerful. He complained to the diet, that the ban published against the Lutherans was not put in execution; but the princes replying, that the most proper means to restore the public peace, was to redress immediately the grievances they complained of, he declared that he had seen a copy of the Centum Gravamina at Rome, which neither the pope nor cardinals believed to have been published by order of the Germanic body, as it contained many things derogatory to the authority of the apostolic see, on which articles he had no commission to treat; but that he was willing to regulate, with their concurrence, other matters tending to reform the abuses in Germany [r]. He accordingly drew up a form of reformation, which was rejected by the princes, as it regarded only the inferior clergy, and tended in the main to enlarge the pope's authority, and that of the ecclesiastic princes of the empire, to the prejudice of the lay princes [s]. The diet therefore, on the 18th of April, published a decree for observing the edict of Worms as far as possible, and for soliciting the emperor and pope to convoke a free council in Germany [t]. The legate objected to several articles in this new edict, as derogatory to the authority of the pope; but the diet breaking up, he went with the archduke Ferdinand, the two dukes of Bavaria, the archbishop of Saltzburg, the bishops of Trent and Ratisbon, with the deputies of nine other bishops, to the city of Ratisbon, where, on the 6th of July, they entered into a mutual alliance, and published a decree, ordering the edict of Worms to be fully executed within their respective dominions. On the other hand, the deputies of the states, that had embraced Luther's doctrines, assembled in the same month at Spire, where they ordered all the controverted articles of religion to be collected by their own divines, with the intention of presenting them at the following diet, which was to be held in the same city in the month of November. c d

A league formed for the support of the religion of the church of Rome.

This diet, however, never assembled; for the pope having written to the emperor, complaining of the proceedings of the diet of Nuremberg, Charles, who had great need of Clement's assistance against the French in Italy, wrote from Burgos in Spain to the German princes, annulling the edict of Nuremberg, and prohibiting the assembling of the diet at Spire [u]. Notwithstanding this declaration of the emperor in favour of the papal authority, Clement still refused to join in the alliance against France: however, he secretly granted 70,000 ducats to the duke of Bourbon, the commander of the imperialists; who receiving a reinforcement of 6000 Germans, obliged the French army to evacuate Italy, and entering Provence took Aix, and several other places, and laid siege to Marseilles; but Francis I. marching to the relief of that city, with an army of 40,000 men, he was obliged to raise the siege, after forty days open trenches, and retreat with precipitation into Lombardy. Francis pursued him, retook Milan, and several other towns, and invested the city of Pavia, which he soon reduced to great extremity. The pope, by this unexpected success, was prevailed upon to conclude a treaty with him, and, according to some authors, advised him to attack the kingdom of Naples [w], though Guicciardini expressly affirms, that he dissuaded him from that expedition, and that the king intended chiefly by that diversion, to oblige the Spaniards to surrender Pavia. However it was, it proved very fatal both to the king of France and the pope; for the imperialists having received several reinforcements from Germany, on the 24th of February attacked the French army, weakened by the detachment to Naples, and harrassed with a siege that had continued four months, and after a fierce engagement of some hours, entirely defeated them, and took the French king, with many nobles and chief officers, prisoners. e f a DURING theſe hoſtilities, the pope, on the 21ſt of December, had publiſhed a bull for the celebration of a jubilee, to commence at Chriſtmas. He accordingly on that day opened the Holy Gate of St. Peter's with great ſolemnity; but by the ſpreading of Luther's doctrines, indulgences had greatly ſunk in their value, ſo that very few perſons appeared at Rome, eſpecially as their pilgrimage was rendered dangerous by the great number of troops in Lombardy [x]. Upon the news of the victory at Pavia, all Italy was ſtruck with conſternation, but the pope eſpecially was filled with great terror, as he had a few weeks before publiſhed his alliance with the French king, which had greatly irritated the emperor. The Venetians likewiſe were very apprehenſive of the emperor's reſentment; but being informed that the king of England, from a jealouſy of the emperor's over-grown power, inclined to favour b France, they immediately ſollicited the pope to enter into a league for the defence of Italy, and propoſed to hire 10,000 Swiſs, which, with the Italian troops, would be ſufficient to oppoſe the imperialiſts, who, ſince the victory of Pavia, had even mutinied for want of pay. But Clement, by the arrival of his ſecretary, the archbiſhop of Capua, from Lombardy, having received ſome hopes of an accommodation, preferred his particular intereſts to the general welfare, and concluded a treaty with the viceroy of Naples, who ſtipulated that the emperor Charles ſhould oblige the duke of Ferrara to reſtore Reggio, ſhould allow the pope to diſpoſe of all benefices in the kingdom of Naples, and ſhould grant the inveſtiture of Milan to Francis Sforza; on which account the pope ordered the Florentines, who were included in the treaty, to pay 100,000 ducats to the viceroy, and promiſed to pay another 100,000

c upon being put in poſſeſſion of Reggio.

A jubilee celebrated at Rome.

The pope ſeeks an accommodation with the emperor:

THE Venetians had twenty days allowed them for acceding to this treaty, which was concluded on the firſt of April, but they refuſed to ſtrengthen their enemy by furniſhing them with money, which might be employed to better purpoſe againſt them: however, many other Italian ſtates followed the example of the pope, and purchaſed their peace with money. Clement being diſappointed by the emperor, who refuſed to ratify the treaty concluded with the viceroy, he entered into a confederacy againſt him, a few months afterwards, with the marquis of Peſcara his general, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, whoſe chancellor, offended at the extravagant conditions on which the emperor offered the inveſtiture of the Milaneſe, formed the deſign of expelling the Spaniards and Germans from Italy. The d pope promiſed to give the inveſtiture of Naples to the marquis, who on that account engaged to diſperſe the imperial army in ſuch a manner, that it ſhould not be able to make any reſiſtance againſt the confederates; but inſtead of fulfilling his engagements, he diſcovered the whole treaty to the emperor, who on that pretence ſeized the duchy of Milan [y].

THE great commotions in Italy prevented the pope from attending to the affairs of Germany, where the enemies of the Roman church were divided into ſeveral ſects. Muncer and Pliffer, and ſeveral other anabaptiſt preachers, had excited the peaſants to take arms againſt the nobles and magiſtrates, but they were at laſt reduced, with the loſs of 100,000 men. The emperor, upon the news of this general inſurrection, wrote to the German princes, appointing a diet to be held at Augſburg, which was deferred till the following year by the arch-
e duke Ferdinand [z]; and, in the mean time, a controverſy about the euchariſt was carried on, with great warmth, betwixt Luther and Zuinglius, whoſe opinion was embraced by Oecolampadius, miniſter at Baſil. Though Clement did not interfere in the affairs of Germany, yet being informed by the queen regent of France, that the doctrines of Luther began to be attended to in that kingdom, he wrote to the parliament of Paris, exhorting them to be vigilant in oppoſing the German hereſy, and defending the ancient religion [a].

BEING recovered from his conſternation, occaſioned by the victory of Pavia, the pope wrote to the emperor with great earneſtneſs in behalf of the duke of Milan: but Charles delaying, upon various pretences, to declare expreſly in what manner he intended to diſpoſe of the Milaneſe, Clement ſoon after concluded an alliance with the Venetians and the king of f France, who, in conſequence of a treaty with Charles at Madrid, had returned to his own kingdom. Immediately after the papal and Venetian troops took the field, under the command of the duke of Urbino; and all Lombardy, eſpecially the city of Milan, being ready to revolt from the Spaniards, the imperial ambaſſador at Rome was very earneſt with the pope to abandon Sforza. Clement rejected all his offers; however, the negligence and bad conduct of the duke of Urbino gave leiſure to the imperialiſts to fortify themſelves; and they having received ſome reinforcements, not only quieted the diſorders in Milan, but obliged Sforza to ſurrender the caſtle, while the duke of Urbino continued inactive, waiting for ſuccours from Switzerland.

Clement concludes an alliance with the king of France and the Venetians.

A. D. 1526.

THE imperialiſts were not only ſucceſsful in Lombardy, but by the aſſiſtance of the family of Colonna, who were wholly addicted to the emperor's intereſt, ſurpriſed the pope in Rome, and obliged him to agree to a truce with the emperor for four months, to forgive the outrage, and recal his troops from the Milaneſe [b]. The Neapolitan troops, however, had no ſooner retired from Rome, than Clement, refuſing to fulfil the articles which he had been compelled to promiſe, depoſed the cardinal of Colonna, declared all his family rebels, and ſending a conſiderable body of troops into their territories, plundered and burnt a great number of their towns. The cardinal of Colonna, in the mean time, reſiding at Naples, appealed to a future general council; and knowing that the name of a council was a great terror to the pope, he cauſed writings to be fixed to the church doors in Rome, citing him, in the name of the emperor, to appear at Spire before a council [c]. A general diet of the empire had been held in that city in the months of July and Auguſt, in which the party of the Lutherans appeared more powerful than ever. The princes propoſed to petition the emperor to aſſemble a general council, or at leaſt a national one, to ſettle the diſputes about religion; and it was reſolved, that, till the celebration of the council, each prince ſhould ſo govern his ſubjects, as he ſhould be able to give an account to God and the emperor [d]. Charles likewiſe being greatly exaſperated againſt the pope, for abſolving the king of France from his obligations to obſerve the treaty of Madrid, and for entering into an alliance with him and the Venetians, he wrote a long letter to him, complaining of his proceedings, and appealing from him to a general council, which he inſiſted upon being immediately convoked [e]. In the mean time continual ſuccours arrived in Lombardy from Spain and Germany, and the viceroy of Naples returned to that kingdom from Spain with a ſtrong reinforcement. The pope likewiſe, having received a ſubſidy of 30,000 crowns from the king of England, paid no regard to the remonſtrance of the emperor, but ſent his troops againſt the kingdom of Naples, which was likewiſe at the ſame time attacked by his gallies, in conjunction with thoſe of France and Venice. The land-forces made themſelves maſters of Aquila, while thoſe at ſea took Salerno, Sorrento, and ſeveral other maritime places [f]. However, the pope not being able to bear the expence of the war, as he received very little aſſiſtance from the king of France, and as the imperialiſts were daily growing more powerful both in Naples and Lombardy, he agreed to a truce for eight months with the viceroy of Naples, in conſequence of which the conquered places on both ſides were immediately reſtored.

Liberty of conſcience allowed to the Lutherans in Germany.

A. D. 1527.

The pope agrees to a truce with the viceroy of Naples.

THE chief motive which induced the pope to conclude a truce, was the fear of an invaſion of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate from the imperialiſts in Lombardy; for the duke of Bourbon having left 7 or 8000 men at Milan, had marched with about 30,000 men towards Bologna, the greateſt part of whom were Germans, and ſome Lutherans [g], who for five months that they had been in Italy, had received almoſt no pay. During their reſidence in the Milaneſe they had lived at free quarters, and ſubſiſted on their march by levying heavy contributions; and tho' Bourbon publiſhed that his intention was to march to Naples, yet it was generally believed that he propoſed only to ravage Tuſcany. The pope therefore, by the truce concluded with the viceroy, promiſed to pay Bourbon 60,000 ducats, on condition that he withdrew his army from the eccleſiaſtical ſtate and the territories of Florence; and as he had reſtored the towns in the kingdom of Naples, he, in full aſſurance of a peace, immediately diſmiſſed the greateſt part of his army. The duke of Bourbon, who had already advanced to the Bologneſe, refuſed his conſent to the truce, notwithſtanding the viceroy had come to his camp, and had offered to cauſe 140,000 ducats to be paid to him within two months. As his troops had already mutinied twice, and allowed him only the ſhadow of command, he was conſtrained to ſubmit to their impetuoſity, they calling out in a tumultuous manner, to Rome, to Rome. He accordingly, partly by inclination and partly by conſtraint, continued his march; and as there was no army to interrupt him, and as he was not encumbered with baggage or artillery, he arrived before Rome on the 5th of May, and demanded a paſſage through the city to Naples. His demand being refuſed, next morning he aſſaulted the city; and tho' he was killed himſelf in the beginning of the attack, yet his troops about ſun-ſet gained the place by ſtorm, and while the pope and the cardinals retired to the caſtle of St. Angelo, they were employed in committing all manner of violences and barbarities. The ſacking continued for ſeveral days: the Lutherans diſcharged their fury againſt the church of St. Peter, and the tombs of the popes, and dragging the bodies of the ſaints from their ſhrines, trampled them under their feet, while the Spaniards and Italians, more rapacious and cruel than the Germans, tortured the nobles, prelates, and magiſtrates, to oblige them to pay exceſſive ranſoms. As the duke of Urbino, tho' at the head of a numerous army, delayed advancing to the relief of Rome, the pope was obliged to capitulate with the prince of Orange, who, upon the death of Bourbon, ſucceeded to the a chief command. It was agreed that the pope ſhould immediately pay 100,000 ducats, and 300,000 more within two months; that he ſhould put into the hands of the emperor the caſtle of St. Angelo, Civita Vecchia, Citta Caſtellana, Parma, Placenza, and Modena; and that upon paying the firſt 150,000, he ſhould be conducted with the cardinals to Gaeta or Naples, but until that payment ſhe ſhould remain a priſoner. Upon theſe and ſome other conditions, proviſions were carried into the caſtle, where he continued ſix months longer a priſoner, not having money to complete the firſt payment [h]. Mean while the plague raged with great violence in Rome, by which great numbers of the imperialiſts daily periſhed. The Florentines, upon the news of the pope's calamity, expelled Hippolito and Alexander de Medicis from their city, and creating a Gonfalonier, reſtored the antient republican govern-

b ment. They likewiſe broke the ſtatues of Leo X. and of Clement, and perſecuted all thoſe that favoured that family. About the ſame time the emperor, being informed of the great ſucceſs of his arms in Italy, diſſembled his joy, and even put on mourning, and ordered proceſſions and public prayers, to implore the aſſiſtance of heaven for the diſtreſſed church. However, his actions did not correſpond with theſe profeſſions; for, to draw all the advantage that he could from the pope's diſtreſs, he delayed giving any orders to ſet him at liberty, tho' the plague was then very mortal, not only in Rome, but even in St. Angelo.

The pope is detained a priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo.

NOTWITHSTANDING this proſperous appearance of the emperor's affairs in Italy, by his too great ſecurity he ſoon found them in a worſe ſituation than in the beginning of the c campaign; for while he neglected to reinforce his army, two thirds of which were cut off with the plague, the king of France prevailed with Henry VIII. of England to enter into the league with the Venetians, and other Italian ſtates, againſt him. In the beginning of Auguſt, he ſent an army into Italy, under the command of Lautrec, who took Alexandria, and ſome other places: and Genoa likewiſe ſubmitting to the French, he paſſed the Po about the middle of October, with the intention of marching to Naples. Charles, being informed of the conqueſts of Lautrec, immediately ſent deputies to Rome to negotiate with the pope, with whom they concluded a treaty, much to the advantage of the emperor; but the conditions being ſuch, that it was impoſſible for the pope to fulfil them, by the aſſiſtance of cardinal Colonna, to whom he was reconciled, he eſcaped, on the 9th of December, from the d caſtle, and was conducted to Orvieto [i].

He eſcapes,

SOON after he received an ambaſſador from the king of England, who deſired him to renew his alliance with the confederates, and to declare his marriage with the queen Catherine null, which the divines and lawyers of England had already affirmed to be unlawful, as ſhe had been firſt married to his elder brother prince Arthur (F). Clement was likewiſe ſollicited by the king of France to declare for the league; but as he had ſuffered ſeverely for interfering in the emperor's diſputes with France, and by the firſt article of the late treaty in St. Angelo had promiſed not to act againſt him, he excuſed himſelf to the French and Engliſh ambaſſadors, and declared for a neutrality. He ſeemed inclined to ſatisfy the king of England in his demand of a divorce, but ſtarted ſeveral difficulties as to the manner of proceed-
e ing, which only heightened the king's hopes, and increaſed his importunity [k]. At length, however, he appointed ſeveral cardinals and divines to examine the validity of the marriage, who unanimouſly declared, that it was agreeable to the law of God [l]. This examination of the cardinals was perhaps only propoſed by the pope as a means of delay, as he afterwards protracted the time for the deciſion of the affair upon various pretences. The Engliſh ambaſſadors again urging, that they could prove the diſpenſation of Julius II. in favour of the marriage not canonical, he appointed a ſecond examination; and, at the deſire of the cardinals, two judges were named to decide the affair in England, namely, the cardinals Wolſey and Campegio, to which laſt he gave a bull, annulling the marriage, with leave to ſhew it to the king and Wolſey, but with expreſs orders not to give ſentence till he ſhould

(F) Henry VIII. had then lived with his queen many years, and is ſaid to have requeſted this divorce from various motives. He himſelf pretended a ſcruple of conſcience, on account of his queen's former marriage with his brother, and was beſides very deſirous of having male iſſue, which he could not then expect from Katherine. His love for Anne Bullen is aſſigned by ſome as his chief motive for objecting to his firſt marriage; and others affirm, that cardinal Wolſey chiefly excited him to think of a divorce, and intended for his ſecond wife Margaret Alençon, the ſiſter of the king of France, thereby to gratify his own reſentment againſt the emperor, who was nephew of queen Katherine; and had not only baulked him twice in his expectations of the pontificate, but had lately refuſed him the archbiſhopric of Toledo, the richeſt benefice in Chriſtendom (1).

The emperor is greatly ſuperior to the allies in Italy.

THIS dilatory proceeding of the pope was owing to the unexpected ſucceſs of the emperor's affairs in Italy; on which account Clement began to think of abandoning the neutrality, and attaching himſelf to Charles, by whoſe aſſiſtance he might recover the dominion of Florence. Lautrec, the general of the league againſt the emperor, had, about the middle of January, marched from Bologna to invade Naples, great part of which kingdom he quickly reduced. The remains of the imperial army, which for nine months had committed all manner of violences in Rome, upon the motion of Lautrec's army, left that city, and proceeded to the defence of Naples; but before their departure, not content to have ſtript the city of all its ornaments and riches, they inſiſted upon receiving two months pay. Their joining the Neapolitan troops did not interrupt the progreſs of Lautrec, who having reduced a great many cities, about the end of April ſat down before Naples; but here he expe- b rienced a reverſe of fortune, for during the ſiege, which continued four months, the plague carried off almoſt his whole army, and at laſt proved mortal to himſelf. The remains of the army retired to Averſa, where, in their turn, they were beſieged by the garriſons of Naples, and ſome other towns, and obliged to capitulate on very diſadvantageous terms; while Doria, the Genoeſe admiral, deſerted their alliance, and prevailed with that city to declare for the emperor.

DURING theſe tranſactions the pope, who had fixed his court at Viterbo, and recovered ſome places that had been ſeized during his confinement, ſeemed inclined, in the beginning of the campaign, to declare for the league; but obſerving the ſucceſs of the imperialiſts, he entered into a private negotiation with Charles, before the departure of Cam- c pegio from Rome, who was ordered on that account to delay giving judgment on the divorce as long as poſſible. To prevent giving ſuſpicion to the allies, he pretended to be wholly occupied in reforming the church, and publiſhed his reſolution of going into Germany to oppoſe the progreſs of Lutheraniſm. The princes of that perſuaſion having entered into a league for their own defence, to which they invited the ſacramentarians, or followers of Zuinglius, whoſe doctrines had been received this year in Berne, Conſtance, and Geneva, in conſequence of which the magiſtrates of Straſburgh publiſhed an order prohibiting the celebration of the maſs [n] in their juriſdiction (G).

A. D. 1529. THE pope had no real intention of going to Germany, but was chiefly attentive to the affairs of Italy; and as the king of France was ſtill in poſſeſſion of ſeveral places in Naples, he d promiſed to adhere to the league, if he would oblige the Venetians to reſtore Cervia and Ravenna, which they had ſeized during his impriſonment [o]. At the ſame time he continued his negotiations with the emperor; and as he had greater expectations from him, and as he and his brother Ferdinand, king of Hungary, had both proteſted againſt judging of the affair of the divorce in England, he ſent a nuncio to Campegio, with orders to burn the bull, and to delay the trial. Soon after, having concluded a treaty with Charles at Barcelona, and queen Katherine having appealed from Campegio and Wolſey as partial judges, he wrote to his legates, declaring his intention to judge the cauſe of the divorce at Rome, with which proceeding the king of England was greatly offended [p]. By the treaty with the emperor, e which was publiſhed in the end of June, the pope promiſed to grant the inveſtiture of Naples to Charles, for the yearly tribute of one white horſe; but the conceſſions made by the emperor were very advantageous to Clement, Charles engaging to eſtabliſh Alexander de Medicis, grand nephew of the pope, as prince and ſovereign of the city and territory of Florence, and to give him his natural daughter Margaret in marriage, with a dowry of 20,000 ducats yearly revenue; to put the pope in poſſeſſion of Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubiera, to aſſiſt him in reducing the duke of Ferrara, and to reduce the Lutherans by force to the obedience of the church [q].

The pope concludes a treaty with him.

THO' the affairs of the king of France were quite ruined in Italy, yet Charles a few weeks after concluded a treaty of peace with him at Cambray, as the grand ſignor, who had in- f vaded Hungary with an immenſe army, threatened an irruption into Auſtria, and the tranquility of Germany was in great danger of being diſturbed by the diſputes about religion. In conſequence of his mandate, the ſtates of Germany had aſſembled at Spire on the 15th of March, and, after long debates, publiſhed a decree, revoking the former edict, which allowed liberty of conſcience, as they alledged it had been productive of great miſchiefs. Several princes, and the deputies of fourteen imperial cities, proteſted againſt this edict, and appealed to the emperor and a free council, from whence the name of Proteſtants was given

After the diſmiſſing of the diet, the proteſtants ſent ambaſſadors to the emperor to juſtify their proceedings; but Charles, who had then arrived in Italy from Spain, would not admit of their excuſe, and ordered them to obey the edict, under pain of his diſpleaſure. The ambaſſadors informing the proteſtants of this determination of the emperor, they aſſembled in the end of November at Smalcald, where they propoſed to enter into an alliance for their mutual defence.

The pope and Charles V. have a conference at Bologna;

In the beginning of the ſame month Charles and Clement both arrived at Bologna, where they had ſeveral conferences concerning the ſuppreſſing the reformation in Germany, and the reducing of the Florentines, who ſtill refuſed to ſubmit to the family of the Medicis. b Beſides, at the ſolicitation of the pope, the emperor reſtored the duchy of Milan to Francis Sforza, and concluded a peace and an alliance with the Venetians, who, among other articles, reſtored to the emperor the towns they poſſeſſed in Apulia, and to the pope all that they had ſeized in Romagna [s]. By this laſt treaty tranquility was reſtored to Italy after a long and A. D. 1530. deſtructive war of eight years continuance; however, the city of Florence muſt ſtill be excepted, which, refuſing to ſubmit to the pope, was at this time inveſted by the imperialiſts. Mean while Charles being earneſtly ſollicited by his brother Ferdinand, and the other electors, to return to Germany, would not proceed to Rome, but received the imperial crown at Bologna, on the 24th of February, being the day of his birth, and that on which he had gained the ſignal victory of Pavia. A few weeks after, having obtained a promiſe from the pope c to conſent to a general council, if it ſhould be found neceſſary, for the extirpation of the Lutheran hereſy, he ſet out for Germany, attended by cardinal Campegio.

The pope's nephew declared ſovereign of Florence.

The pope, after his departure, returned to Rome; and, in the mean time, the imperial and papal troops continuing the ſiege of Florence, that city, after being reduced to the greateſt extremity, was at length obliged to capitulate on the 9th of Auguſt, ſubmitting their form of government entirely to the pleaſure of the emperor, on condition that their liberties ſhould not be violated, and promiſing to pay 80,000 ducats within a few days to the beſieging army, provided a full pardon ſhould be granted to all thoſe who had injured the pope or his friends. In conſequence of this capitulation, the articles of which were afterwards obſerved with very little fidelity, Alexander de Medicis was acknowledged prince and ſovereign d of Florence, with power to receive and ſend ambaſſadors, to coin money, to conclude alliances, and to make peace and war as he ſhould think proper [t].

During theſe proceedings in Italy, the emperor had aſſembled a diet at Augſburg, to conſult of the affairs of religion and of a war againſt the Turks. A few days after the opening of the diet, the Lutherans preſented their confeſſion of faith, which, after ſeveral objections, was publickly read in the emperor's palace on the 25th of June, and being examined by the popiſh doctors, a refutation of it was read in the ſame place on the 3d of Auguſt. The emperor and the catholic princes approved of this refutation, and deſired that it might be received by the proteſtant princes: but they ſtill adhered to their former confeſſion, and demanded that a free general council might be called, to whoſe determinae tion they would ſubmit. Several private conferences were afterwards held for an accommodation of both parties, and the emperor privately ſollicited the elector of Saxony, the langrave of Heſſe, and the marquis of Brandenburgh, by temporal motives, to be re-united to the church of Rome; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, he, on the 22d of September, publiſhed a decree, declaring, that tho' the proteſtant confeſſion had been refuted by ſcripture, yet he allowed them till the 15th of April to conſider of returning to the boſom of the church; in the mean time prohibiting them from publiſhing any thing concerning religion, and promiſing to uſe his endeavours with the pope and Chriſtian princes, that a general council ſhould be convoked within eighteen months. Next day the proteſtants proteſted againſt this decree, affirming, that their confeſſion had not been refuted by f ſcripture; and, after their departure, their deputies, who remained at the diet, requeſted the emperor to grant a general peace through the empire, and liberty of conſcience in affairs of religion. The emperor, inſtead of granting their demand, entered into a league for the defence of the old religion, with the catholic princes and deputies that ſtill remained at the diet; and on the 19th of November publiſhed an edict, prohibiting any other religion than that of the church of Rome [u].

Although the emperor had acted with great zeal in defence of the popiſh cauſe, Cle- A. D. 1531. ment nevertheleſs was greatly diſſatisfied with the proceedings of the diet. He blamed the emperor for allowing the proteſtant confeſſion to be read, and for conſenting to aboliſh ſome ceremonies; but what chiefly offended him, was his promiſe for procuring a general council, the thoughts of which ſtruck him with great apprehenſions: he therefore aſked the advice of the cardinals, who declared that the convocation of a general council at that time, when the Turks were threatening to invade Germany, was very improper [w]. The pope likewiſe thought himſelf greatly aggrieved by the ſentence which Charles ſoon after gave in favour of the duke of Ferrara, by which Reggio and Modena were declared to belong to the duke, who was ordered to pay the pope 100,000 ducats, for a new inveſtiture of his duchy. Clement proteſted againſt this ſentence, and refuſed to accept of the money which was offered him by the duke, who, to excite the emperor againſt him, wrote to Charles that he had intercepted two letters of the pope to the kings of France and England, by which he promiſed to grant them whatever they ſhould deſire, provided they would, by any means, prevent the aſſembling of a general council. The pope challenged the duke to produce the letters, aſſured the emperor of his innocence, and ſoon after ſent his nephew, the cardinal of Medicis, to Germany, to attend him as legate in his expedition againſt the Turks, promiſing him likewiſe a ſubſidy of 40,000 ducats a month during that war [x].

Reggio and Modena declared to belong to the duke of Ferrara.

A. D. 1532.

CHARLES, about that time, held an imperial diet at Ratisbon, to conſult of the means to quiet the diſturbances in Germany, with regard to religion, and to provide againſt the invaſion of the grand ſignor, who was making immenſe preparations to invade Auſtria. As he had offended the proteſtant princes the year before, by cauſing his brother Ferdinand to be elected king of the Romans, and by his rigorous proceedings againſt the Lutherans, they refuſed to appear at the diet, and aſſembled by themſelves at Schweinfurt, where they compoſed thirteen articles, for ſecuring the liberty of their religion, and the rights of the empire, which were rejected by the emperor. However, the proteſtants ſoon after aſſembling at Nuremberg, the elector palatine and the archbiſhop of Mentz, who acted as mediators, agreed to an accommodation with them on the 23d of June, which a few weeks after was ratified by the emperor, who ordered all proſecutions of the proteſtants to be ſuſpended, and a general peace to be obſerved through all Germany; and that all perſons ſhould enjoy a liberty of conſcience, till the aſſembling of a general council, which he would endeavour to prevail with the pope to convoke within ſix months, to be aſſembled a year after [y]. In conſequence of this peace, the proteſtants, with great ardour, raiſed the ſupplies for the Turkiſh expedition, and Charles ſoon found himſelf at the head of an army of near 200,000 men; however, the grand ſignor not daring to advance, and retiring to Conſtantinople, Charles likewiſe retreated to Germany, disbanded the greateſt part of his army, and marched with the Italian auxiliaries towards that kingdom. The Italians on their march, notwithſtanding the preſence of the emperor, plundered and burnt ſeveral towns and villages in Germany; and the cardinal legate, and one Piermaria Roſſo, being accuſed as the authors of the ſedition, the emperor ordered them to be apprehended, but quickly after ſet the cardinal at liberty, and excuſed himſelf to the pope.

Liberty of conſcience again granted to the proteſtants.

The emperor returns to Italy.

THOUGH Clement was greatly offended that the emperor had preſumed to grant liberty of conſcience to the proteſtants, yet he received him with great appearance of affection at Bologna; however, he ſtill refuſed to conſent to a general council, or to give his niece Katherine in marriage to Francis Sforza. A few weeks after he renewed the alliance with the emperor and the Italian ſtates, for ſecuring the peace of Italy, and to oppoſe the deſigns of the king of France, who ſtill formed pretenſions to the Milaneſe. Clement conſented very willingly to renew his alliance with the emperor, that he might thereby awe the kings of France and England, who, at a conference in the neighbourhood of Boulogn, had reſolved to compel the pope to grant their demands, by threatening to withdraw their kingdoms from the obedience of the apoſtolic ſee, as they ſuppoſed the Turks would find employment for the emperor in Hungary. By the unexpected retreat of the Turks, and the emperor's journey to Italy, their deſign was fruſtrated: however, Henry VIII. on his return to England, prohibited his ſubjects from all intercourſe with the court of Rome, prejudicial to the juriſdiction or prerogative of his kingdom; and Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſoon after pronouncing a ſentence of divorce betwixt him and queen Katherine, in the beginning of April he publicly married Anne Bulleyn, although the pope had prohibited, under ſevere cenſures, any proceedings in England with regard to the divorce. Clement being informed of the king's ſecond marriage, immediately laid him under an interdict, and threatened to excite all Chriſtendom againſt him.

To oppoſe the progreſs of Lutheraniſm in Sweden, Clement likewiſe created John Magnus, the hiſtorian, archbiſhop of Upſal; and having given him the pall, ſent him to that kingdom with the authority of legate à latere. The pope ſoon after embarked at Piſa with his cardinals, and in a few days landed at Marſeilles, where he had a conference with the king of France. The reaſons he pretended for this journey were, a deſire to promote an expedition againſt the Turks, to obtain the conſent of the king of France to a general council, and to uſe his mediation in reconciling the king of England to the church of Rome; but his chief purpoſe was to conclude a marriage betwixt Francis, ſecond ſon of the duke of Orleans, and his own niece. The marriage was accordingly ſolemnized with great pomp; and though there was no treaty concluded be-
b twixt the pope and the king, Clement conſented to the ſeizing of the Milaneſe for his ſiſter's husband; and Francis declared, that he would not oppoſe the judicial proceedings of the pope againſt the king of England, whoſe ambaſſadors at Marſeilles appealed from the deciſion of the pope to a general council [a].

Clement, having continued ſome weeks in France, returned to Rome in the end of December, and ſoon after, at the inſtigation of the emperor's ambaſſadors, he excommunicated the king of England and all his ſubjects, becauſe he had rejected his lawful wife and married another. Henry VIII. was no ſooner informed of this ſentence, which was publiſhed on the 24th of March, than he withdrew his obedience from the church of Rome, and by an act of parliament aboliſhed the pope's authority in England, and even made it capital c to name the word pope. He declared the king head of the church under Chriſt in England, ordered the archbiſhop of Canterbury to lay aſide his title of apoſtolic legate, and prohibited the payment of the annual tribute to Rome, commonly called St. Peter's pence. Clement ſurvived this ſentence but a few months, and died at Rome on the 25th of September, in the 57th year of his age. Although he had a great capacity, was very grave and moderate, yet, according to Guicciardini, he died hated by his whole court, as he was reckoned avaricious and deceitful, and ſeldom ſhewed any inclination to oblige [b].

The funeral rites of Clement being performed with the uſual ceremonies, thirty-five cardinals entered the conclave on the 10th of October, and the ſame day, according to Guicciardini, or two days after according to others, unanimouſly elected cardinal Farneſe biſhop
d of Oſtia, then in the 67th year of his age, who by artfully ſeeming more infirm than he really was, thereby more eaſily acquired all the votes. The new pope aſſumed the name of Paul III. and was ſolemnly crowned on the 2d of November, to the great joy of the Romans, who had again got a pope of their own nation, after an interruption of 103 years (H). Paul, immediately after his promotion, created two of his relations cardinals, though they were both baſtards; and being deſirous to know the ſtate of Germany, he recalled his nuncio Vengerius from that country: however, he quickly ſent him back to feed the Germans with the hopes of a council [c], and to excite them againſt the king of England (I). He likewiſe ſent nuncios to the emperor, the king of France, and other princes, to declare
e that he had determined upon celebrating a council, though he had not yet fixed a time or place. As he was naturally inclined to peace, he endeavoured to effect an accommodation betwixt the emperor and the king of France; and obſerving a ſtrict neutrality with regard to their diſputes, he refuſed to renew the treaty of Bologna. Peter Paul Verger, the nuncio in Germany, endeavoured to prevail with the proteſtants to agree to the celebration of the council at Mantua; but the princes of that profeſſion aſſembling in the beginning of December at Smalcald, to renew their league, declared, that they deſired a free council, unawed by the pope, and inſiſted that it ſhould be held in Germany, according to the emperor's promiſe. assists the emperor in his expedition against Barbarossa the pirate;

During these proceedings in Germany, the pope granted the tythe of the Gallican church to the king of France, on condition that he should maintain thirty gallies for the defence of the Italian coasts. He also granted the tythe of the ecclesiastical revenues in Spain to the emperor, to assist him in his expedition against Barbarossa, the pirate, who had expelled the prince of Algiers, and seized his government; and as a reinforcement to the emperor's fleet, he fitted out thirteen gallies, and went to Civita Vecchia, where he gave his benediction to the whole armament. A few months after the emperor, having restored the banished prince and returned to Naples, Paul sent two legates to him, to congratulate him upon his victory.

At the same time, being informed that Henry VIII. of England had seized the revenues of 376 monasteries, had obliged upwards of 10,000 monks and nuns to resume the lay habit, and had executed Thomas More his late chancellor, and Fisher bishop of Rochester, lately created a cardinal, because they had refused to acknowlege the king as supreme head of the church, he published a bull against him, ordering him to repent, under pain of excommunication and deposition, allowing him ninety days to appear by proxy at Rome; and, in case of his disobedience, declaring him immediately excommunicated and deposed, absolving his subjects from their obedience, and prohibiting all catholics from holding any commerce with the English. He likewise ordered all the clergy to quit his dominions, the nobles to take up arms against him, and absolved foreign princes who were in alliance with him from the obligation of their treaties. This bull, which was published on the 28th of November, he ordered to be fixed up in several places on the opposite shore of Holland, [e]; but his attention was soon after called off in some manner from the affairs of England, by new commotions in Italy. b

FRANCIS SFORZA, duke of Milan, dying in October without heirs, the Milanese again became the subject of dispute between the king of France and the emperor. Francis I. renewed his pretensions in right of his great grandmother Valentina Viconti, and, having commenced a war against his uncle the duke of Savoy, threatened to enter Lombardy with a formidable army. Charles, who claimed the Milanese as a fief devolved to the empire, immediately ordered forces into Italy from Spain and Germany, and, leaving Naples, arrived in a triumphant manner at Rome on the 5th of April, where he continued 13 days. The day before his departure, in a full consistory, and in the presence of the foreign ambassadors, he made a long harangue in Spanish against the king of France, for disturbing the peace of Italy by his ambition, and concluded with requesting the pope's mediation for an accommodation, or his assistance in case the king of France should obstinately continue the war. The pope declared his willingness to act as mediator, and, as the emperor was very importunate for the convocation of a general council, he ordered six cardinals and three bishops to draw up the bull [f]; which was accordingly published a few weeks afterwards, appointing a general council to be held at Mantua, to begin the following year on the 22d of May. d

PAUL likewise, refusing to engage as a party in the war betwixt the king of France and the emperor, in the month of September published another bull for reforming the corrupt manners of the city of Rome, and ordering all persons, under severe penalties, to obey those cardinals to whom he had given the direction of that affair. Soon after he sent cardinal Poole, a relation of Henry VIII. as his legate to the king of France, to excite him, and James V. of Scotland, who was then at Paris, against the king of England. But Henry being informed that the cardinal intended to raise an army in France to invade his kingdom [g], desired of the French king to deliver him up as his subject, and set a price of 50,000 crowns upon his head; which obliged the pope to recal him to Rome, and to appoint him a guard of soldiers for his protection [h]. Paul about the same time appointed four cardinals, and three other learned men, to draw up a form of reformation of the church, with regard to manners and discipline (K); and, as the duke of Mantua made several objections to the assembling of the council e

(K) This plan of reformation was presented to the pope in the beginning of the following year; however, it was then kept secret, and no alteration or amendment ensued. Though it proposed a very superficial and partial reformation, and was therefore ridiculed by Luther and Sturmius at Strasburgh, who procured a copy of it from Rome, yet it contains several particulars which scarcely could have been expected from the composers. They complained of the pride and ignorance of the bishops, and proposed that none should receive orders but learned and pious men, and therefore care should be taken to have proper masters to instruct the youth. They condemned transportations from one benefice to another, grants of reservation, non-residence, and pluralities; and declared it intolerable, that bishoprics should be conferred on cardinals, or that an Italian should enjoy a benefice in Spain or England, and a Spaniard or Englishman in Italy. They proposed that some convents should be abolished, that printers should be prohibited from publishing some kinds of books, and that the colloquies of Erasmus should not be taught in the schools; that the questors of St. Antony, and of many other saints, should be a council in that city, he prorogued the time of its meeting till the month of November, and soon after appointed it to be held at Vicenza, and to be opened on the first of May the year following. The king of England, however, objected to the assembling of the council in Italy, and published a writing, wherein he affirmed, that the emperor and other Christian princes had an authority to call a general council, and not the pope.

The assembling of which is prorogued.

The protestants of Germany likewise, in their diet at Smalcald, declared to Helde, the emperor's vice-chancellor, that they would not consent to a council in Italy, where the pope, who was their adversary, would likewise be their judge, and had even already, in some measure, condemned them, by declaring in his bull, that the council was called on account of some late raised heresies. They insisted on a free council in Germany, in which b they intended to accuse the pope and his accomplices of having corrupted the doctrine of the church, and ordained many things in direct opposition to the laws of God [i]. Helde, not being satisfied with the answer of the protestants, retired from Smalcald, and, assembling the catholic princes at Nuremberg, concluded a league with them, in the name of the emperor, for eleven years, for the defence of their religion, which was afterwards known by the name of the holy league. The protestants, being informed of this league, assembled the following year at Brunswick, and received into their alliance Christiern king of Denmark, who a few months before had entirely renounced the authority of the pope in his dominions, and had been solemnly crowned by Bugenhagius, a Lutheran minister, sent thither at his desire by Luther [k].

c PAUL in the mean time concluded an alliance with the emperor and the Venetians at Rome against the Turks, with such assurance of success, that he even made a partition of the Turkish empire with his allies. By the treaty, which was concluded in February, the war was to be carried on every year with 200 gallies, 100 armed ships, 50,000 foot from Italy, Germany, and Spain, and 4,500 horse. The pope was to bear one sixth-part of the expences of the war, and to furnish 36 gallies; and Andrew Doria, who some years before had been created prince of Melphi by the emperor, was to have the chief command of the confederate fleet. In consequence of this alliance a numerous fleet assembled at Corcyra; but, instead of making conquests on the Turks, Doria, who commanded, twice declined the engagement, though his fleet was superior to that of the enemy; which behaviour gave confi- d dence to Barbarossa, who pursued him, and took and sunk several ships [l].

The pope concludes an alliance against the Turks, and

Immediately after the conclusion of the alliance, and before the confederate fleet had assembled, the pope earnestly sollicited the king of France and the emperor to agree to a peace or truce, and was so successful as to prevail with them to consent to a personal conference with him at Nice, a maritime city belonging to the duke of Savoy. The pope accordingly arrived there in the end of May, and Charles and Francis arriving a few days after, he prevailed with them to agree to a truce for ten years. At the same time he concluded a treaty of marriage betwixt his grandson Octavian and Margarite the emperor's natural daughter, and widow of the duke of Florence, who died a few years before. He could not, however, prevail with the emperor and the king of France to see each other, which Jovius and Onuph- e rius say, was owing to their resentment against the pope, who, they found, was chiefly intent upon his own private interest [m]. But others affirm, that Paul endeavoured from policy to prevent their conference, which he thought would interrupt his private schemes [n]. He pressed them both earnestly to repair to the council at Vicenza, and to order the prelates of their dominions thither; but, each excusing himself, he returned to Genoa by sea, accompanied by the emperor; where, being informed that only a very few prelates had arrived at Vicenza, he prorogued the council till the following year at Easter.

He likewise soon after sent cardinal Alexandre into Germany at the request of Ferdinand king of the Romans, who had declared, that there were some hopes of reconciling the Lutherans to the church of Rome. This declaration, however, was false; for the protestants absolutely refused to acknowlege the authority of the pope, and only continued to express their desire of living in friendship and peace with the catholics: but Ferdinand, who had come to an accommodation with his competitor, the vayvode of Transilvania, and had received certain intimation from him and the king of Poland, that the Turks were making great be abolished, and that the effects and personal estate of ecclesiastics should, at their death, be given to the poor. They concluded with complaining of the infinite number of indigent and ragged priests that frequented St. Peter's church, and declared that it was a great scandal to see the whores lodged so magnificently in Rome, and riding through the streets on fine mules, and the cardinals and others accompanying them in a familiar manner. The several articles of this plan of reformation were published at Antwerp two years after, with the answer of Cochlæus to the objections of Sturmius. They are likewise prefixed to the History of the Council of Trent by Peter Cabre, and were afterwards published at Paris in 1612 (1).

preparations to invade Germany, resolved, if possible, to conclude a peace with the protestants, that he might have their assistance against the infidels [o]. Accordingly a diet was held at Frankfort of the catholics and protestants, where, after long debates, an accommodation was agreed to on the 19th of April; by which a truce was granted to the protestants for fifteen months, excluding however, the anabaptists and sacramentarians. It was decreed likewise, that, during the time of the truce, a conference should be held betwixt learned and moderate men of both parties to settle the contested points of religion; that, if they could not come to an agreement in that affair, nevertheless the peace should continue till the first general diet of the empire; and lastly, that the present treaty should have no effect, unless it was ratified by the emperor within six months. a

The pope blames the emperor for granting a truce to the protestants. A. D. 1540.

The pope, upon the news of this accommodation, was greatly offended with the catholic princes for daring to treat of religion to the prejudice of the council which he had convoked, and immediately sent a nuncio to Spain, who dissuaded the emperor from ratifying the treaty. About the same time, as no prelates repaired to Vicenza, he suspended the celebration of the general council for an unlimited time; and soon after, being informed that the emperor intended to pass through France to quell a revolt of the city of Ghent in Flanders, he sent cardinal Alexander Farnese as his legate to him, who accompanied him from Paris to Ghent, where Charles immediately received an embassy from the protestants to desire the continuation of the peace. The protestants a few weeks after received a very ambiguous answer from the emperor, which was laid before their deputies, who were then assembled at Smalcald. As Charles, by the persuasions of his counsellor Granvelle, was inclined to prevent a rupture, and had sent two ambassadors to that assembly, the protestants, on the 11th of April, presented a long memorial to them, in justification of their proceedings. b c

The pope's legate exerted himself with great earnestness to prevent an accommodation, and declared that it could not be done without the authority of the apostolic see; however the emperor, being persuaded of the necessity of a peace, appointed a diet to be held at Haguenau for that purpose, at which the legate, who had not been consulted, was greatly offended, and immediately left Flanders [p]. Paul in the mean time was engaged in reducing Perugia, which had revolted on account of the imposition of a new tax. Having quieted that insurrection, he soon after confirmed the order of the Jesuits; but as the great multitude of monks began now to be even a nusance at Rome, he restricted the number of the professed in the new order to sixty [q]. Finding likewise, that the emperor and his brother Ferdinand inclined greatly to an accommodation, and that, though nothing had been effected at the diet of Haguenau, yet a conference was appointed at Worms, to put an end, if possible, to all differences, he sent Campegio, bishop of Feltri, to be present at the assembly as his legate, being afraid that something should be transacted to the prejudice of the church of Rome. Both parties started a great many difficulties about the manner of disputing, and the papists particularly, being apprehensive lest the majority of the votes of the assembly would be against them, proposed very extravagant conditions. d

He confirms the order of the Jesuits.

A public disputation betwixt the catholics and protestants.

It was at last agreed, that Eckius for the papists, and Melancthon for the protestants, should begin the dispute; but three days after the assembly was transferred by the emperor's order to Ratisbon, where cardinal Contareni, famous for his learning and abilities, soon after arriving as legate from the pope, the diet was opened on the fifth of April. A few days after the emperor nominated three doctors of each party, and ordered them to resume the dispute which had been begun at Worms. They accordingly debated for more than two months, but were as far from an accommodation as at first. At length the protestants presented a memorial to the emperor, containing several articles for a general reformation, which Charles immediately communicated to the legate Contareni, who insisted that the whole should be referred to the determination of the pope, or a general council, who alone had authority to decide in matters of faith. The emperor, after considering the remonstrances of both parties, finally determined to continue the truce, and to postpone all farther disputes till the assembling of a general or national council; which last abuse greatly offended the legate, who wrote to all the princes, desiring it to be annulled, as a German council could not decide affairs that concerned the universal church [r]. e

The legate wants the contended articles to be referred to the pope. f

However Contareni might seem to the protestants to have defended the popish cause, yet he was accused by the catholics, both in Germany and at Rome, of having betrayed their religion to the heretics. Cardinal Caraffa accused him in the consistory, and Eckius condemned him in an apology which he soon after published for the catholics; however, he was defended by his friend cardinal Fregosa, and the emperor, arriving in Italy, justified him to the pope at Lucca, where he had a conference with his holiness, and, contrary to his advice, embarked for Africa with an army of 23,000 men, which was almost entirely de- g

THE emperor having returned to Spain with the remains of his army, ſoon after, by his deſire, a diet was held at Spire by his brother Ferdinand, who had lately been defeated by the Turks in Hungary. The pope ſent the biſhop of Modena as his nuncio to this aſſembly, who exhorted the princes to arm againſt the infidels, promiſing, in the name of the pope, a body of 5000 foot, if the emperor ſhould command in perſon. He likewiſe declared, that the pope had abſolutely determined to celebrate a council in the city of Trent, on the confines of Germany, as the proteſtants had objected to a city in Italy, and as he himſelf, being loaded with years and infirmities, could not be able to bear the fatigue of a journey into b Germany. The proteſtants ſtill refuſed to acknowledge the pope's authority to call a council, and declared they would not appear at Trent; but, as the catholic princes gave their aſſent, the pope, on the 20th of May, publiſhed a bull for the aſſembling of the council on the 1ſt of November of the ſame year [t], and about the ſame time ſent Alexander Vitellius with 3000 foot, as a reinforcement to the allied army in Hungary; which, acting without unanimity and vigour, ſpent the campaign without gaining any advantages over the infidels.

IN the mean time the pope endeavoured by his legates to reconcile the emperor and the king of France, which laſt had renewed the war, and attacked the dominions of Charles in five different places, but without any conſiderable advantage. As the time for the opening the council approached, he likewiſe ſent three cardinals to Trent to preſide as his legates à c latere; and, being informed that the doctrines of Luther began to meet with a favourable reception in many places of Italy, he appointed a congregation of ſix cardinals, who ſhould act with full power as inquiſitors of the faith [u]. Soon after hearing that the emperor, who lately had concluded an alliance with Henry VIII. of England againſt France, intended to paſs into Flanders by the way of Italy, he reſolved to have a conference with him on his journey, and for that purpoſe left Rome on the 26th of February, and ſoon after arrived at Bologna, where he continued till the middle of ſummer, when Charles landed at Genoa. The emperor conſented, with great difficulty, to an interview; but upon repeated intreaties, he agreed to meet the pope at Buſetto, a caſtle betwixt Parma and Placentia. Paul intreated the emperor to reſtore theſe cities to the holy ſee, and, according to Sleidan, made an offer d to purchaſe the duchy of Milan for his grandſon Octavius Farneſe [w]; but the emperor rejecting both theſe propoſals, he then began to treat of public affairs, and exhorted him to a reconciliation with the king of France, that the Chriſtians might be at leiſure to turn their arms againſt the infidels. Charles, who was greatly exaſperated againſt Francis, refuſed likewiſe to hearken to this exhortation; ſo that the pope, having ſpent three days at Buſetto, returned diſappointed to Bologna: where, on the 4th of July, he ſuſpended the celebration of the council of Trent, as ſcarce any prelates had arrived at that city. From Bologna likewiſe he wrote to the chapter of Cologn, commending them for their zeal in oppoſing the innovations introduced by their archbiſhop, who was eminent for his piety and charity; but, having employed Bucer, Melancthon, Piſtorius, and other reformers, to preach in the cities of his juriſe diction, and to reform abuſes, was now ſtiled a wicked captain of heretics [x].

SOON after the pope ordered public proceſſions and ſupplications to be obſerved through all Chriſtendom, and granted the ſame indulgences to thoſe who prayed for the peace and tranquility of the church, as the pilgrims enjoyed who viſited Rome in the year of the jubilee: and, being informed that the emperor had convoked a diet at Spire, he ſent the biſhop of Amalphi as his nuncio to Germany. This diet, which was very numerous, opened in the month of January, and, with great unanimity, ſubſidies were decreed againſt the king of France and the Turks his allies. As their united fleets a few months before had made an unſucceſsful attempt on the city of Nice, on the Genoeſe coaſt, ſome of the princes, at the deſire of the emperor, wrote to the pope, thanking him for the aſſiſtance that he had given to f the duke of Savoy, and intreating him to continue his ſuccours to that prince, as they were informed that the Turks were refitting their fleet at Toulon, and intended a ſecond deſcent in Savoy. Paul, in his anſwer, related the great pains he had taken to oppoſe the Turks, and, in his turn, recommended to the diet the care of the Chriſtian commonwealth, and exhorted the princes to a reconciliation with France, that the council might aſſemble for the reformation of the church. Not long after, being informed that the emperor had prolonged the truce to the proteſtants, had ordered a ſuſpenſion of all proceſſes againſt them, and had even promiſed to cauſe a plan for a general reformation to be drawn up, he wrote a long letter to him, reproving him for intermeddling with ſacred affairs, which only belonged to the apoſtolic ſee; and declaring, that by treating of religious matters in the diet, he had endg dangered his ſoul. He therefore enjoined him, under pain of his diſpleaſure, to revoke the conceſſions he had made to the rebels of the holy ſee [y].

CHARLES paid no regard to this letter; but, having entered France with a powerful army, advanced in the month of September within two days journey of Paris, which obliged the king of France to make propoſals of peace; in conſequence of which a treaty was concluded betwixt them at Crepy. The pope expreſſed great ſatisfaction upon the news of this peace, congratulated both princes by his nuncios, and ordered ſupplications for three days through all Chriſtendom; however, he is ſaid to have been a little piqued, that he had not been deſired to act as mediator. A few weeks after, having publiſhed another bull for the aſſembling of the council of Trent in the month of March, he thereby irritated the emperor, who expected to have been firſt conſulted; and therefore ſoon after Charles prohibited three Spaniards, whom, among others, the pope had promoted to the dignity of cardinal, from aſſuming the title of wearing the habit. a b

A. D. 1545. As it had been an article of the peace concluded at Crepy, that both the princes ſhould uſe their utmoſt endeavours to reſtore the old religion, the king of France ordered the Pariſian divines to aſſemble at Melun, to compoſe ſome fundamental articles of religion proper to be eſtabliſhed at the council. They accordingly aſſembled at Melun, and confirmed twenty-five articles, which had been drawn up two years before at Paris. About the ſame time the emperor, by an imperial edict, confirmed thirty-two fundamental articles that had been drawn up by the divines of Louvain, and ordered them to be taught and received thro' all the provinces of Lower Germany (L). He likewiſe gave ſeveral orders to the prelates of Spain and Flanders, and that he might ſeem the principal promoter of the council, he ſent ambaſſadors to different princes to intreat them to ſend their deputies to Trent. Paul, in the mean time, being informed that the emperor intended to be preſent at the diet of Worms, which was opened at the end of March, ſent his nephew cardinal Farneſe to attend him as his legate. The cardinal arrived at Worms about the middle of May, but he did not concern himſelf with the diet, or tranſact any buſineſs in public; however, it was firmly believed, that the intent of his journey was to excite the emperor to declare war againſt the proteſtants, as news ſoon after arrived from Rome, that the pope had promiſed 12,000 foot and 500 men at arms to act againſt the heretics. c

He excites him to declare war againſt them.

They refuſe to acknowledge the council of Trent.

WHAT probably provoked the pope was the firmneſs of the proteſtants, who inſiſted that the peace ſhould be continued and maintained without any reſpect to the determinations and concluſions of the council of Trent, the authority of which they abſolutely refuſed to acknowledge: nor would they grant any ſuccours againſt the Turks, till their religion was ſecured; on which account the emperor, who replied, that he could not exempt them from obedience to the council, ſent his ſecretary to Solyman to demand a truce, and on the 4th of Auguſt broke up the diet, when he renewed the former edicts for the peace, appointed another diet to be held in January at Ratiſbon to determine the affair of religion, and in the mean time nominated four doctors of each party to ſettle the diſputed point of a conference [z]. This condeſcenſion of the emperor gave great offence to the biſhops aſſembled at Trent, who thought it very injurious to the council that points of religion ſhould be debated in a diet; and therefore, notwithſtanding the intreaties of the legates, many of them, upon various pretences, returned home. About the middle of March, the pope had ſent three cardinals to preſide at the council as his legates à latere. The emperor, the king of the Romans, and the king of France, had likewiſe ſent their ambaſſadors to Trent; however, as the diet about the ſame time opened at Worms, the legates deferred opening the council till they received an immediate anſwer from the pope [a]. A decree for that purpoſe at length arriving from Rome, the council was opened with great ſolemnity on the 15th of December, and the ſecond ſeſſion appointed to be held on the 7th of January. d e

The firſt ſeſſion of the council.

PAUL in the mean time cited the archbiſhop of Cologn to appear within ſixty days at Rome, to juſtify himſelf with regard to the charge of favouring heretics. He likewiſe, without any regard to the general murmur of the public, and the oppoſition of ſeveral cardinals, gave the inveſtiture of Parma and Placentia to his ſon [b]. Being alſo greatly offended with the proteſtants for ſtill refuſing to acknowledge the council of Trent, he ſollicited the emperor, with great earneſtneſs, to declare war againſt them. By the great warlike preparations in Germany, it ſoon appeared that the ſollicitations of his holineſs were not without effect; for the emperor, without publiſhing his deſign, gave orders for raiſing troops with f

MEAN time, beſides his levies in Germany, he ordered Spaniſh and Neapolitan troops to march from Italy, and ſent the cardinal of Trent to the pope, to demand the ſuccours which he had formerly promiſed. As Paul was greatly terrified with the news of the ſtrength of b the proteſtants, who were reported to have a deſign of marching directly to Rome with an army of 80,000 foot and 40,000 horſe [c], he immediately concluded a treaty with the emperor on the following conditions: that he ſhould depoſit 200,000 crowns for the expences of the war, ſhould furniſh 12,000 foot and 500 horſe, ſhould grant the emperor one half of the eccleſiaſtical revenues of Spain for one year, and allow him to mortgage 500,000 crowns of the income of the monaſteries in that kingdom, provided he gave ſecurity for repayment of that ſum out of his royal domains; that the emperor ſhould not make any peace with the proteſtants for ſix months without the pope's conſent, who ſhould likewiſe be intitled to a certain portion of the conqueſts [d]. Soon after the concluſion of this treaty, which was ſigned on the 26th of June, the pope's troops began their march for Germany, under the c command of his grandſon Octavius, and his elder brother cardinal Farneſe; which laſt, upon his departure from Italy, was reported to have ſaid, That there would be ſuch a fine butchery in Germany, that his horſe would ſwim in the blood of the Lutherans [e]. Beſides theſe troops, the duke of Florence ſent 200 bombardeers, and the duke of Ferrara 100 men at arms.

The emperor makes preparations for war, and concludes a treaty with the pope.

DURING theſe tranſactions, the fathers of Trent held their ſecond ſeſſion on the 7th of January; in which a decree was read, ordering prayers for the unity of the church, the celebration of maſs every Sunday, the obſervation of a faſt each Friday, and the beſtowing of alms; after the reading of which, the following ſeſſion was appointed to be held on the 4th of February. They accordingly aſſembled on that day, when a decree was read concerning the creed uſed by the Roman church, which was accounted a ſhield againſt all hereſies. They d afterwards appointed the fourth ſeſſion to be held on the 8th of April, to give time to ſeveral prelates to arrive at the council, as there were then only preſent five cardinals, ſix archbiſhops (M), thirty biſhops, three abbots, and five generals of monkiſh orders. Mean time general congregations were held twice a week, on Mondays and Fridays, in which the points to be treated of in the ſeſſions were examined and diſcuſſed. Beſides, ſeveral extraordinary congregations were held, after which the fourth ſeſſion was celebrated according to appointment; in which a decree was publiſhed, whereby the fathers profeſſed, that, according to the example of the orthodox fathers, they received all the books of the Old and New Teſtament, together with the traditions regarding faith and manners, as dictated verbally by Chriſt, or by the Holy Spirit, and preſerved by a continual ſucceſſion in the catholic e church. An anathema was then denounced againſt thoſe who did not receive the ſacred books as canonical, as they were publiſhed in the old vulgate Latin, or who wilfully deſpiſed the aforeſaid traditions. The ſcripture was ordered to be received according to the ſenſe of the church, which alone has a right to interpret the ſacred writings; and all were prohibited from printing books on ſacred ſubjects without adding the name of the author, or from keeping or ſelling them without the leave of the ordinaries [f].

Proceedings of the council of Trent.

As the emperor had not yet proceeded to an open rupture, the proceedings of the council gave him great offence. He was afraid leſt the deciſion of controverted points of faith would alarm and irritate the proteſtants, who, perceiving their doctrines ſo publicly condemned, would unite more firmly in their own defence; whereas he intended to detach the f imperial cities from the princes of the Smalcaldic league, and had even ſucceeded ſo far, that he had received ſeveral reinforcements of proteſtant troops. He therefore intreated the pope and the fathers at Trent to defer deciding points of faith for a few months, till he had finiſhed the war, and in the mean time to treat only of a reformation. However, his requeſt was refuſed both by the council and his ally the pope, who, notwithſtanding the pretences of the emperor, declared war to be undertaken on a religious account, and preſſed Charles to allow his legate to publiſh a cruſade [a]. The fathers at Trent likewiſe, in their fifth ſeſſion, which was held on the 17th of June, publiſhed a decree concerning the doctrine of original ſin; in the end of which they declared, that they had no intention to comprehend, under original ſin, the bleſſed and immaculate virgin Mary. They alſo added ſome rules for regulating the manner of inſtructing the people and preaching the goſpel, and appointed the next ſeſſion to be held on the 19th of July; which, however, was afterwards prorogued till the 13th of January in the following year, the fathers in the mean time aſſembling in general congregations, and diſcuſſing other points of faith [b].

Several proteſtant princes ſubmit to the emperor.

A FEW weeks after this prorogation, the pope's troops with 5000 Spaniards and Neapolitans, having joined the emperor's camp, he marched againſt the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe, whom he had put to the ban of the empire. Tho' the proteſtant army at firſt was more numerous than the imperialiſts, and gained ſome ſmall advantages, yet, upon account of diviſions among their chiefs, the emperor, before the end of the campaign, was greatly ſuperior, and obliged the elector palatine, the duke of Wirtemberg, and ſome imperial cities, to ſubmit and aſk pardon [i]. The pope being offended, that, in the accommodation which he made with thoſe who had ſubmitted, he had tolerated hereſy, recalled his troops from the emperor's ſervice, and refuſed to continue the grant of the ſubſidy from the church revenues of Spain, as Charles would not allow his legate to preſide in the army, and had not, according to the treaty, ſhared with him the contributions which he had raiſed from the proteſtant towns.

The ſixth ſeſſion of the council. A. D. 1547.

As the emperor likewiſe would not agree to a ſuſpenſion of the council, Paul wrote to his legates at Trent to proceed to determine the points of faith. They accordingly, on the 13th of January, held the ſixth ſeſſion of the council; in which, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the imperial prelates, a decree was read and approved concerning juſtification, containing the doctrine of the Roman church on that point, and thirty anathemas were added againſt thoſe who ſhould corrupt that doctrine in any article. Another decree was likewiſe read concerning reformation; namely, regarding the reſidence of prelates, and the puniſhment of thoſe who ſhould be abſent from their dioceſes above ſix months at a time, and for compelling the inferior clergy to reſidence; concerning the viſitation of the chapters of cathedral churches, and for prohibiting any from officiating as prieſts out of their own dioceſes, without the leave of the ordinaries [c]. Before the following ſeſſion, which was appointed to be held on the 3d of March, the fathers held ſeveral congregations, in which they debated with great warmth concerning the ſacraments, and the compatibility or incompatibility of holding more benefices than one. At length, after many conferences and diſputes, the decrees were publiſhed; firſt, concerning the ſeven ſacraments in general, in thirteen canons, with as many anathemas; then particularly of baptiſm; and laſtly of confirmation. A decree was afterwards added concerning reformation, and the eighth ſeſſion appointed to be held on the 21ſt of April; however, it was celebrated on the 11th of the ſame month, when a decree was publiſhed for transferring the council for a time to Bologna, on account of a dangerous diſtemper that prevailed in Trent and its neighbourhood, owing, as it was ſuppoſed, to continual rains that had altered the temperament of the air, and, according to the opinion of the phyſicians of the council, rendered it dangerous for the prelates to remain in that city. Of the ſixty fathers who at that time compoſed the council, cardinal Paciecus, and fifteen other biſhops of the imperial party, diſſented from this decree, affirming that the danger of the diſtemper was magnified beyond the truth, and that the conſent of the pope, the emperor, and other princes, was neceſſary to the transferring of the council [d]; they therefore remained at Trent, and their conduct was approved by the emperor.

The council is transferred to Bologna.

THOUGH the pope two years before had given his legates a power to transfer the council, yet it is probable the laſt decree was publiſhed in conſequence of an immediate order from himſelf; for he was greatly diſſatisfied with the emperor for granting liberty of conſcience to the proteſtants that had ſubmitted, and he even began to be afraid of his power. The emperor had likewiſe diſobliged him, by refuſing to confirm the inveſtiture of Parma and Placentia to his ſon Peter Lewis, and the prelates of the imperial faction had advanced ſome things in the council derogatory to the authority of the apoſtolic ſee [e]. Soon after his jealouſy of the emperor's power was greatly increaſed; for Charles, on the 24th of April, having entirely defeated the proteſtants near the city of Muhlberg, took the duke of Saxony priſoner, and deprived him of his electorate, oliged the landgrave to ſurrender himſelf, and beſides the immenſe ſums of money which he raiſed from the proteſtant cities, ſtripped

The pope expreſſed great joy upon the news of this victory, and immediately ſent cardinal Sfondrato to Germany with a letter of congratulation to the emperor; however, he would not agree to his requeſt, for the return of the council to Trent [o]; but ſollicited Charles to order the Spaniſh biſhops to repair to Bologna, where, on the 21ſt of April, the council had held the ninth ſeſſion, in which they had only read a decree appointing the next ſeſſion to be celebrated on the 2d of June, when they again prorogued the ſeſſion to the 15th of September. As there were very few prelates at Bologna, the council was afterwards prorogued to a limited time [p].

PAUL in the mean time ſent a legate to France, to congratulate Henry II. who had
b ſucceeded his father Francis on the 31ſt of March, and ſoon after he granted a bull for eſtabliſhing the tribunal of the inquiſition in the kingdom of Naples, to which he had been ſollicited by the Spaniſh viceroy; but, upon the publication of the edict for the eſtabliſhment of the holy office, ſo violent an inſurrection followed, that the emperor was apprehenſive of a general revolt, and a few months after conſented to repeal his decree [q]. During theſe diſturbances at Naples, the pope was alarmed with the news of the murder of his ſon Peter-Lewis; who, having rendered himſelf odious by his infamous vices, was aſſaſſinated in his palace at Placentia. This city was immediately after ſeized by Ferdinand Gonzaga, the emperor's lieutenant in Lombardy; which raiſed a great ſuſpicion that Charles himſelf was conſcious of the murder. About the ſame time he likewiſe received a letter from the prin-
c ces and prelates of Germany, aſſembled at the diet of Augſburg, intreating him to reſtore the council of Trent, and a few weeks after an ambaſſador arrived at Rome from the emperor, to inform him that the proteſtant princes and cities had agreed to ſubmit to the council (N) of Trent, and to urge him to order the fathers to return to that city [r].

THE pope ſeemed inclined to grant the requeſt of the imperial ambaſſador, but deſired
d firſt to have the opinion of the fathers at Bologna, who declared that they could not return to Trent without violating the dignity of the council. He himſelf had no real inclination to gratify the emperor, and had even ſeveral months before propoſed an alliance with Henry II. of France againſt him, which he ſollicited with greater earneſtneſs ſince the murder of his ſon and the ſeizing of Placentia. Henry II. having ſent the cardinal Guiſe to Rome, to declare his obedience to the apoſtolic ſee, and having likewiſe given his ſecret orders to offer aſſiſtance to the pope, Paul, in the beginning of January, wrote an anſwer to the letter from the German biſhops, wherein he blamed them ſeverely for declaring, that, unleſs the council returned to Trent, they ſhould be obliged to take other meaſures, and aſſured them he was indifferent in what city the council was celebrated; but at the ſame time affirmed, that there was no place more proper than the city of Bologna [s]. The emperor, finding the pope unmoved by all his ſollicitations, ſent ambaſſadors to Bologna, who, on the 16th of the ſame month, proteſted againſt the tranſlation of the council as frivolous and illegal, while Diego Mendoza, his ambaſſador at Rome, read the ſame proteſtation, with a few alterations, to the pope and cardinals, in the preſence of all the foreign ambaſſadors [t].

The emperor proteſts againſt the tranſlation of the council.

e The pope in his anſwer, which he made to Mendoza on the firſt of February, accuſed him of having exceeded his inſtructions, and affirmed that the emperor had not ordered him to proteſt againſt him and the ſacred college, but to proteſt before them againſt the fathers at Bologna; he therefore, as lawful judge of the diſpute concerning the legality of the tranſlation of the council, cited the fathers at Trent and Bologna to juſtify their proceedings within a month before the cardinals Paris, Burges, Creſcentius, and Poole.

A new form of reformation drawn up by his order;

NOTWITHSTANDING this anſwer, Mendoza, in a ſecond declaration affirmed, that he had received expreſs orders from the emperor to proteſt in the manner he had done [u]; and Charles, reſolving to accommodate the differences with regard to religion independently of the council, about this time appointed ſeveral doctors to draw up a form of eccleſiaſtical
f reformation [w]. Paul in the mean time cited the fathers at Trent and Bologna, the firſt of whom excuſed themſelves from appearing; but the others immediately ſent their proxies to Rome; yet the judges, being apprehenſive of a ſchiſm, delayed giving ſentence during the whole pontificate of Paul, ſo that the prelates at Bologna diſperſed, excepting a few penſionaries of the holy ſee [x].

THOUGH the pope, in compliance with the emperor, ſuſpended the council, and would not proceed againſt thoſe prelates that remained at Trent, yet he expreſſed great diſſatisfaction upon receiving a copy of the new form of reformation drawn up by the doctors in Germany, which was called the Interim, denoting, by that title, that its articles were to remain in force till others ſhould be compoſed by the pope and an univerſal council. He ordered his legate Sfondrato, who had continued with the emperor ſince the victory at Muhlberg, to cenſure it in general, but particularly the two articles allowing the marriage of prieſts, and the communicating under both kinds; the firſt of which had never been known, and the other could not be permitted by any authority but that of the apoſtolic ſee. Charles paid no regard to this remonſtrance; but, on the 15th of May, preſented his Interim to the diet, for which the archbiſhop of Mentz thanked him in the name of all the princes, without having previouſly demanded their conſent. The emperor, interpreting this ſpeech as a general approbation of his book, immediately ordered it to be printed in Latin and German, and peremptorily commanded it to be received both by the catholics and proteſtants. By this proceeding, inſtead of putting an end to the diviſions, he greatly inflamed both parties againſt himſelf; for the proteſtants objected to the book as containing the doctrines of popery, artfully diſguiſed, and the catholics rejected it for not having the ſanction of eccleſiaſtic authority; however, he would receive no excuſe from the Lutherans, many of whom were compelled by his Spaniſh and Neapolitan troops to give their aſſent to his book, while many doctors of that perſuaſion, to avoid perſecution, were obliged to quit Germany [y].

CHARLES likewiſe intreated the pope to ſend legates into Germany, to aſſiſt in putting his edicts into execution. Paul refuſed this requeſt, as derogatory from the apoſtolic authority; however, he ſent three nuncios into Germany, with full power to reſtore all perſons, even kings and princes, to their dignities, to grant the privilege of communicating under both kinds upon certain conditions, and to abſolve the uſurpers of eccleſiaſtical poſſeſſions, after reſtitution made by them of the lands, and a reaſonable compoſition for the revenues already conſumed. They had likewiſe authority to abſolve the catholics from their oaths given to heretics, and to unite eccleſiaſtical benefices to univerſities, ſchools, and hoſpitals; but though the bull was expedited on the laſt of Auguſt, they did not lay their mandates before the emperor till the 25th of May in the following year [z]. Charles, being diſſatisfied with their powers, prohibited the nuncios from putting them in execution, till they ſhould be altered in ſome articles by the pope; and even after they received ſome alteration, the nuncios were ſtill prevented from acting, by new difficulties that were ſtarted; ſo that they were at laſt obliged to delegate their powers to the German biſhops, to each within his own dioceſe, and to the other prelates within the extent of their juriſdiction [a].

A. D. 1549.

DURING theſe tranſactions, the pope earneſtly ſollicited the emperor to reſtore Placentia, which city he affirmed belonged to the dominions of the church; but finding his ſollicitations had no effect upon the emperor, he began to think of reſtoring Parma to the church, and to give his grandſon Octavius another territory. He accordingly appointed Camillo Urſini governor of Parma; but his grandſon refuſed to accept of any other territory, and privately left Rome, with the intention of taking poſſeſſion of that city. Being fruſtrated in his attempt to ſurpriſe the place, he wrote to his brother cardinal Farneſe, declaring, that, if his grandfather would not reſtore the city, he would treat with the emperor's lieutenant Gonzaga. This letter, being read to the pope, had ſuch an effect upon him, that he immediately fainted, and, reviving with much difficulty, about four hours after was ſeized with a violent fever, of which he died on the third day, being the 10th of November [b]. He is commended for his prudence and moderation, but he was greatly addicted to judicial aſtrology, and had made but ſmall proficiency in the learning of thoſe times (O). The expence of his funeral ſolemnity, which continued nine days, was ſuppoſed to amount to 50,000 crowns.

AFTER the death of Paul III. the cardinals delayed entering the conclave till the 28th of November; during which time the imperial and French miniſters warmly ſollicited the favour of cardinal Farneſe, who was at the head of a party of the ſacred college. Upon ſhutting the conclave, cardinal Poole was propoſed by a great many voices, and, upon the firſt ſcrutiny wanted only two votes to be legally elected; but the old cardinals, being jealous of his promotion, did their utmoſt to thwart his election, and at the next ſcrutiny cardinal

Several new French cardinals arriving, their faction appeared the moſt numerous; but cardinal Farneſe and his party joining the imperialiſts, cardinal de Monte was elected on the 9th of February, though one of the cardinals ſome days before had objected to him on account of his wicked life [c]. Cardinal Farneſe, before he conſented to give him his vote, obliged him to ſwear, that he would grant the poſſeſſion of Parma to his brother Octavius. A. D. 1550. Julius III. is elected.

THE new pope, aſſuming the name of Julius III. (P), was crowned with the uſual ſolemnity on the 22d of the ſame month; and two days after he publiſhed a bull, declaring that the year of the jubilee had commenced at Chriſtmas. The ſame day, according to the uſual ceremony, he opened the holy gate of St. Peter's with a golden hammer, and gave acceſs b to an infinite number of pilgrims, who waited to have remiſſion of their ſins. Soon after he reſtored Aſcanio Colonna, who had been deprived of his poſſeſſions by Paul III. and, according to his agreement with cardinal Farneſe, conferred the government of Parma upon his brother Octavius, with a monthly revenue of 2000 crowns [d]. He likewiſe confirmed the election of patriarch of Greater Armenia, who had been perſuaded by the Dominican miſſionaries to ſubmit to the church of Rome, on promiſes of preferment which were never afterwards fulfilled. About the ſame time he made a promotion of twenty cardinals, and beſtowed his own hat on a boy of thirteen years of age, born of mean parentage at Placentia, whom he likewiſe adopted into his family; which gave occaſion to many ſevere paſquinades at Rome [e]. A jubilee celebrated at Rome.

c To manifeſt his deſire of ſuppreſſing hereſy, on the 28th of April he publiſhed two bulls, by one of which he prohibited all perſons, except the inquiſitors of the faith, from poſſeſſing or reading the books of the Lutherans, or other heretics; and by the other he allowed all thoſe who ſhould repent of their hereſies within three months, to be received into the church by the inquiſitors, upon performing private penance; but from this indulgence were excepted all thoſe who were under the general inquiſition of Spain and Portugal [f]. The emperor in the mean time urging him to re-eſtabliſh the council of Trent, he aſſembled a congregation of cardinals and other prelates, by whoſe advice he conſented to the emperor's requeſt, on theſe conditions; that the council ſhould be approved by the king of France, and the decrees already publiſhed be received by the proteſtants. Accordingly, having received the approbation of the d king of France, on the 14th of November he publiſhed a bull for reſtoring the council to Trent, ordering all prelates and perſons concerned to repair to that city on the 1ſt of May, when he intended to reſume the council, and to preſide at it either perſonally or by his legates. He ſent a copy of this bull before it was publiſhed to the emperor, who then held a diet at Augsburg, and upon conſulting with his miniſters, intreated Julius to ſoften ſome expreſſions, but without any effect; for, on the 27th of December, he expedited a brief, ordering his bull to be read and affixed to the doors of the churches of St. Peter and St. John, and printed copies of it to be ſent to all the biſhops of Chriſtendom [g]. The pope publiſhes two bulls for the ſuppreſſion of hereſy.

THE emperor objected to the bull, becauſe he was afraid it would irritate the proteſtants, ſome of whom in the diet had agreed to the continuation of the council without any conditions; but others had inſiſted that the proteſtant divines ſhould not only be heard in the e ſeſſions, but even have a power of deciding; that the pope ſhould not preſide, but ſubmit to the council; and that the decrees already publiſhed ſhould be of no force [h]. His apprehenſions proved to be juſt; for when the bull was read in the diet on the 5th of January, the proteſtants expreſſed great diſſatisfaction: Charles, however, appeaſed them in ſome meaſure, by declaring that he would take ſuch methods, that nothing ſhould paſs in the council prejudicial to the liberties of the German nation. The emperor then diſſolved the diet on the 23d of February, and ſoon after ſent three ambaſſadors to Trent, who were preſent on the firſt of May, when the pope's legates celebrated the eleventh ſeſſion, in which a decree was read for reſuming the council, and the next ſeſſion appointed to be held on the f firſt of September, becauſe very few prelates were then arrived, and on account of ſome diſturbances in Lombardy, which threatened to interrupt the tranquility of Italy [i]. Theſe were occaſioned by Octavius Farneſe, who, being afraid of the deſigns of Gonzaga, the emperor's lieutenant, and deprived of his monthly ſubſidy from the pope, had introduced a French garriſon into Parma. therefore, to clear himself from any suspicions of the emperor, he cited Octavius to appear at Rome within thirty days. As he neglected the citation, he applied to Gonzaga for assistance, and about the middle of May the pope's troops and imperialists invested Parma and Mirandola. The king of France ordered his ambassador at Rome to justify his proceeding to the pope, and to declare, that, unless he ceased hostilities, he would prohibit his bishops from going to Trent; but Julius, being assured of the emperor's assistance, ordered the king to withdraw his troops, and even threatened him with excommunication. Mean while the French troops being reinforced in Italy, made several incursions into the Bolognese, and attacked the Milanese on the side of Piedmont; hostilities likewise commencing betwixt France and the emperor in Lorrain and Flanders [k]. a

THOUGH the emperor, by besieging Parma, had given Henry II. a pretence for a rupture, and had thereby involved himself in a new war with France, yet he did not neglect the affairs of religion, and wrote to the protestant states, desiring them to send ambassadors to Trent; and as they insisted upon a safe-conduct from the council, he promised to apply to the fathers for that purpose. In the mean time the electors of Mentz and Triers, with several other German bishops, repaired to Trent, and were present at the twelfth session; when a decree was read, appointing the following session on the 11th of October, and declaring that a canon would then be published concerning the sacrament of the eucharist A letter and protestation from the king of France were then read, wherein he declared, that unless the pope would cease his hostilities against Parma, he would not acknowledge the council. The fathers declared that they would answer the king's deputy at the next sessions, but being then called he did not appear: they, however, drew up an answer to the protestation, and published a decree concerning the eucharist, adding eleven anathemas against those who should deny or alter the doctrine they had established. At the persuasion of the imperial ambassador, they delayed disputing concerning the use of the cup to laymen, till the arrival of the protestants; but they published another decree for reformation, particularly concerning the residence of bishops [l]. They likewise complied with the emperor's request, and granted a safe-conduct to the protestants; in consequence of which the elector of Brandenburg, and the duke of Wirtemberg, sent their ambassadors to Trent, who were soon followed by Sleidan the historian, as deputy from the city of Strasburg, who relating his own and his collegues negotiations, says, that they would not confer with the pope's legates, lest they should thereby seem to allow them a right of judging; but addressed themselves to the emperor's ambassadors, and to the cardinal of Trent and the electoral archbishops, desiring their confession of faith to be presented to the council. A few days before they proposed to present their confession, the fourteenth session was celebrated, on the 25th of November, when a decree was read concerning the sacrament of penance and extreme unction, and thirteen articles concerning reformation [m]. b c d

Several German bishops repair to Trent.

THE pope in the mean time, being tired of the expences of a war, sent a legate to the emperor, and another to the king of France, with proposals for a neutrality or truce for two years. Henry II. very readily embraced this offer, and in the beginning of the following year concluded a treaty with the pope, which gave great offence to the emperor, who was, however, afterwards obliged to consent to it. Charles resided then at Inspruck, within three days journey of Trent, and was chiefly attentive to the proceedings of the council. About the beginning of January the Saxon ambassadors arrived at Trent, and demanded that a safe-conduct should be given to the divines whom prince Maurice intended to send to the council, like that which was formerly granted by the council of Basil to the Bohemians; that the pope should not preside; and that the prelates who composed the council should be absolved from their oath of obedience to him. A few days after, the ambassadors of the duke of Wirtemberg presented their confession of faith in a general congregation, which was held at the legates' lodgings, and demanded that proper judges should be appointed to decide the disputes betwixt their divines and those of the catholics, and that all the past acts of the council should be revoked. The same demands were likewise made by the Saxon ambassadors, who were admitted in the evening; but they did not deliver their confession of faith, composed by Melancthon, as they had no instructions for that purpose. The fifteenth session was held the next day, which was the 25th of January, when a decree was read, declaring, that, at the demand of the protestants, all points which should have been decided that day were deferred till the 19th of March, and a new safe-conduct was granted to them, which the council affirmed was more ample than the former [n]. A few days after the protestants received copies of the safe-conduct; but perceiving that the articles which they insisted upon being inserted were wholly omitted, they complained of this proceeding to the e f a imperial ambaſſadors, without receiving any ſatisfactory anſwer (Q). News in the mean time arriving that prince Maurice had declared war againſt the emperor, the electors of Mentz and Cologne immediatley left Trent; and the Saxon ambaſſadors having declared that they were intirely ignorant of their maſter's deſigns, retired to Breſcia, from whence they returned home by different routes. A few days after their departure, ſix divines arrived at Trent from Wirtemberg and Strasburg; and the fathers of the council ſtill refuſing to allow their confeſſion to be publicly read, they cauſed it to be printed and diſperſed, which gave great offence to the catholics. The next ſeſſion, which was appointed to be held on the 19th of March, was deferred till the 1ſt of May; and, in the mean time, the proteſtant ambaſſadors declared to thoſe of the emperor, that although the council had not granted their

b firſt demand, their divines offered themſelves to diſpute on the points of religion, on condition that their right ſhould not thereby be prejudiced; but as the catholics had diſputed on the firſt fundamental articles, it was reaſonable that the proteſtants ſhould be allowed to do the ſame. The legates paying no regard to this declaration, the proteſtant divines a few days after wrote to the imperial ambaſſadors, deſiring that their adverſaries would publiſh their objections to their doctrine in writing, which they were ready to anſwer [o].

THE legates, inſtead of complying with this requeſt, began to be afraid that the emperor was acting in concert with the proteſtants, and intended, by means of the prelates in his intereſt, to depreſs and reform the court of Rome. They therefore readily embraced all pretences for delays; and news arriving that the elector Maurice had made himſelf maſter of

The legates immediately diſpatched an expreſs to the pope, who having ſent a bull for ſuſpending the council in caſe of neceſſity, they held the ſixteenth ſeſſion on the 28th of April, in which the council was formally ſuſpended for two years, notwithſtanding a proteſtation given in by twelve Spaniſh biſhops, who alledged, that the war in Germany was not a ſufficient reaſon for the ſuſpenſion of the council, which, by being continued, would rather be a means of procuring peace [p].

Many prelates leave Trent on account of the diſturbances in Germany.

The council is ſuſpended for two years.

BY this ſuſpenſion of the council the emperor loſt all hopes of inducing the proteſtants to

Among other matters it was agreed, that a diet ſhould aſſemble within ſix months, to conſult of the means of terminating all differences on account of religion; that, in the mean time, none ſhould be moleſted on account of their religious opinions; and that, although no means ſhould be found in the diet for accommodating the religious difference, the preſent peace and concord ſhould, nevertheleſs, continue for ever firm and unviolated [q]. Julius, in the mean time, appointed ſeveral cardinals to conſult of means to reform the abuſes of the church, and the corrupt and diſſolute manners of the clergy; but, after ſeveral meetings and adjournments, nothing was determined of any conſequence. As Don Pedro de Toledo, the viceroy of Naples, in the month of January began his march for Tuſcany with a formidable army, in order to reduce the rebels, Julius, remembering the fate of Clement VII. immediately levied 8000 men for the defence of the eccleſiaſtical territories, the command of whom he gave to Camillo Urſini. During theſe proceedings, Julius confirmed Simon Sulaka the patriarch of the Chriſtians on the eaſt ſide of the Euphrates; and having ordered him to be ordained a biſhop, he inveſted him with the patriarchal pall with his own hands, in the conſiſtory, conferred upon him ſeveral rich preſents, and ſent with him to his own country ſeveral religious men,

At the ſame time he ſent ſome troops to aſſiſt the imperialiſts and Florentines in the ſiege of Siena, and ſoon after he received an embaſſy from the emperor's ſon Philip, informing him of his marriage with the queen of England, and offering homage for the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, which, before the celebration of the nuptials, his father had reſigned to him. b

He in vain endeavours to reconcile the emperor and the king of France.

MEAN while, upon the complaints of cardinal Poole, the emperor had allowed him to proceed to Bruſſels, where he himſelf then reſided; but that he might delay his journey to England till the marriage ſhould be concluded, he pretended an inclination to a peace with France, and deſired the cardinal to act as mediator. Poole accordingly had a conference with Henry II. but quickly found that neither he nor the emperor had any real inclination to peace [s]. Soon after an embaſſy arriving from king Philip and queen Mary, inviting him to England, he took leave of the emperor, and ſet out for London, where, on the 23d of November, he was received with great demonſtrations of joy; and a few days after, being reinſtated in his former poſſeſſions and dignity, he ſolemnly abſolved the nation from the cenſures they had incurred on account of the ſchiſm and hereſy. Ambaſſadors were then c ordered to proceed to Rome, to declare the obedience of that nation to the apoſtolic ſee; the news of which proceedings being brought by an expreſs to the pope, he immediately ordered public ſupplications over all Italy, and publiſhed general indulgences as in the year of jubilee [u]. About the ſame time, being informed that the emperor had appointed a diet to be held at Augsburg in the beginning of February, he ſent the cardinal Moron to Germany
A. D. 1555. as his legate, to exhort the proteſtants to follow the example of England, and to acknowlege the authority of the ſee of Rome, charging him, however, to avoid all conferences on the diſputed points of religion [w]. Moron had hardly arrived at the diet, when being informed of the death of pope Julius, he immediately ſet out for Rome, together with the cardinal of but others affirm, that his death was occaſioned by a change of diet, which his phyſician adviſed him to on account of the gout; while many alledged, that he altered his diet at firſt under a pretence of ſickneſs, that he might avoid calling a conſiſtory, which he knew would oppoſe the demands of his brother Baldwin, who deſired earneſtly to be put in poſſeſſion of Camerino [x].

JULIUS III. was ſucceeded in the pontificate by Marcellus Cervinus, a native of Montfano, and cardinal of the holy croſs at Jeruſalem, who being elected on the 9th of April retained his own name, and was next day conſecrated biſhop, and then ſolemnly crowned. Upon his promotion, he prohibited all his relations from coming to Rome, and communicated to the cardinal of Mantua his deſign of aſſembling a general council for a thorough reformation of e the church, which, he ſaid, would rather eſtabliſh than depreſs the authority of the Roman ſee. However, he was prevented by death from putting his deſign in execution; for having greatly fatigued himſelf with the many ſuperfluous and troubleſome ceremonies, which he performed in the holy week before Eaſter, he died of an apoplexy, or, according to ſome authors, of poiſon, on the laſt day of April, on the 22d day after his election, and in the 54th year of his age [y].

A FEW days after the death of Marcellus, forty five cardinals, who were then at Rome, entered the conclave, where the cardinal of Augsburg, ſeconded by Moron, propoſed that, among the other articles which the ſacred college uſually ſwore to at an election, the two following ſhould be added, by which the new pope ſhould be obliged, within two years, to f aſſemble a general council, for completing the reformation already begun, and to induce the proteſtants to receive the decrees of the council of Trent; and that he ſhould likewiſe bind himſelf by oath, not to create above four cardinals in the firſt two years of his pontificate [z].

Paul IV. is elected;

This motion, however, was oppoſed, and on the 22d of May cardinal Caraffa was elected pope, notwithſtanding the great oppoſition of the imperial party. As he ſeemed to have a great averſion to the Spaniards, and had received ſome bad offices from the emperor, it was generally concluded that he would favour the king of France. As he was of a moroſe diſpoſition, and had been the author and contriver of the inquiſition, his election ſtruck a great terror into the Romans, who expected that he would proceed with great ſeverity in the reformation of abuſes. However, he began his pontificate with great magnificence, exceeded all his predeceſſors in pomp and ceremony at his coronation, and told the ſteward of his houſhold, that he would be ſerved as became a prince. Soon after he began to follow his natural temper, and publiſhed ſome very ſevere edicts for correcting the diſſolute manners of the city. He reformed the offices of the datary, the penitentiary, and the rota, and ordered the prieſts to be more moderate both in their dreſs and in their tables. He likewiſe conferred ſeveral new privileges on the Romans, who, as a teſtimony of their gratitude, erected b a marble ſtatue to him in the capitol, and choſe more than 100 of their nobles, who were appointed to ſerve without any pay, as a life-guard to the popes, and were by him created knights of the faith [a].

In the beginning of his pontificate, the Engliſh ambaſſadors, who had been ſent to Julius, arriving at Rome, he gave audience to them with great ſtate and pomp, in his firſt conſiſtory; and, after they had continued for ſome time proſtrate at his feet, begging that the nation might again be received into the boſom of the church, he raiſed them and embraced them, and, in reward for the piety of the king and queen, he gave the title of a kingdom to Ireland. Afterwards, at a private conference, he inſiſted that all the eccleſiaſtical poſſeſſions which had been ſeized by Henry VIII. ſhould be reſtored, and that the Peter-pence
c ſhould immediately be collected for the uſe of the Roman ſee [b]. Soon after, being informed of the decree which was publiſhed by the diet of Augsburg on the 25th of September, confirming the peace of Paſſau, which the elector Maurice and the proteſtant confederates, three years before, had obtained from the emperor, he was greatly offended with Ferdinand, king of the Romans, who preſided at the diet, and even declared, that he would make the emperor and his brother repent the injury they had done to the holy ſee; that he would excommunicate the proteſtants, and all thoſe who protected them; but if Charles and Ferdinand would retract what they had granted them, he offered to ſecond them with his authority, and to oblige all Chriſtian princes, under pain of cenſures, to aſſiſt them with their forces [c].

His reſentment againſt the emperor was owing to another cauſe than the peace granted
d to the proteſtants; for having formerly received a perſonal injury from the Neapolitan viceroy, who had refuſed to allow him to take poſſeſſion of the archbiſhopric of Naples, on pretence that he favoured the French party, he had then endeavoured, with great earneſtneſs, to excite Paul III. to declare war againſt the emperor. His hopes of revenge, however, being at that time fruſtrated, he now thought it a proper time to diſcover his enmity to the Spaniards; and having formed a deſign to deprive them of the kingdom of Naples, on the 16th of September he privately concluded a treaty with Henry II. for ſeizing that kingdom, by which means he hoped to aggrandize the princes of his family [d]. About the ſame time, by their inſtigation, he began to perſecute the family of Colonna, and others, who were known to have an attachment to the emperor. Under pretence of a plot, which he alleged had been
e formed by the imperialiſts againſt him, he increaſed his troops and guards by new levies, thruſt the cardinal Sforza, Camilla, Colonna, and the abbot of Briſegna into priſon, and confiſcating all the territories belonging to the Colonna family within the dominions of the church, beſtowed them on his nephew John, count of Montorio, whom he created duke of Paliano, and general of the forces of the church [e]. He likewiſe confiſcated the marquiſate of Montebello, which he conferred on Anthony Caraffa, another of his nephews; and being fully reſolved on a war, he fortified Paliano, which was conveniently ſituated on the frontiers of Naples.

In the mean time the imperialiſts, having marched to the aſſiſtance of the family of Colonna, under the command of the viceroy, and the duke of Alva, quickly made themſelves maſters of all the

(R) Paul IV. was born of a noble Neapolitan family in the year 1476, and had obtained a great reputation for integrity and purity of manners. He was ſkilled in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; and having been created archbiſhop of Chieti by Julius II. he inſtituted the order of regular clerks called Theatins, in 1524. He was elevated to the dignity of cardinal by Paul III. and Julius III. created him archbiſhop of Naples.

Campania of Rome, while the duke of Guiſe was preparing to march into Italy with an army of 12,000 French, to the aſſiſtance of Paul. This unexpected ſucceſs of the Neapolitans greatly diſtreſſed the pope, who, to ſupport the war, miſerably harraſſed his ſubjects. He exacted half a year's revenue from all offices, doubled the tythes upon all benefices, converted many of the churches into magazines and ſtorehouſes, ſeized all the horſes in Rome to ſerve in the war, and compelled all the monks, of what order ſoever, to labour at the works, and to carry earth to the fortifications. He likewiſe ordered all private debts to be paid into his treaſury, promiſing to ſatisfy the creditors afterwards, and raiſed all the cuſtoms and taxes to an exceſſive degree. However, the miſeries and groans of his ſubjects were not able to incline his fierce and implacable ſpirit to a peace; but the duke of Guiſe having, in the beginning of the year, entered Lombardy, he preſſed him earneſtly to advance with his army, and invade Naples, contrary to the opinion of the moſt prudent French generals, who thought it would be more advantageous to carry on the war in the Milaneſe, which was then in a very defenceleſs ſtate [f].

to ſend an army into Italy. A. D. 1557.

PAUL, in the mean time, having been informed that Charles V. had abdicated the empire in favour of his brother Ferdinand, he wrote to the eccleſiaſtical electors to prohibit them from receiving his reſignation; which, however, was approved of by the electors at a diet held at Frankfort, where Ferdinand conſented to receive the imperial enſigns, on condition that he ſhould be allowed to ſend an embaſſy to the pope, to aſk his confirmation. While Paul thus manifeſted his enmity againſt the emperor, the arms of his ſon Philip, to whom he had reſigned his hereditary dominions, were very ſucceſsful in Italy. The duke of Alva had obliged the French to raiſe the ſiege of ſome places on the frontiers of Naples; and towards the end of Auguſt approached with his army towards Rome, in hopes of ſurpriſing the city. At the ſame time the duke of Guiſe being recalled with his forces to oppoſe the Spaniards in Flanders, who in the beginning of the month had gained a ſignal victory over the French at St. Quintin, Paul, with great regret, was obliged to conſent to a peace, which was concluded on the 13th of September.

He is obliged to conclude a peace with the viceroy of Naples.

The war being finiſhed, Paul immediately ſent legates to the kings of France and Spain, offering himſelf as mediator of their differences, but without any ſucceſs. In the mean time, applying himſelf to the reformation of abuſes, he ordered the inquiſitors to compoſe an index of books, proper to be condemned and prohibited as impious and heretical (S). He likewiſe ordered the tribunal of the inquiſition to take cognizance of ſeveral crimes, which before had been under the juriſdiction of the other courts; and was ſo active and diligent in his enquiry after criminals, that he quickly filled all the priſons of the inquiſition. Suſpecting that cardinal Moron had ſome ſecret correſpondence with the proteſtants in Germany, he impriſoned him, together with the biſhop of Cava, in the caſtle of St. Angelo, where they underwent a ſevere inquiſition; and tho' they both proved their innocence, and were afterwards ſet at liberty, yet, on their account, he detained the biſhop of Modena a long while in priſon [g]. Abou tthe ſame time, to the general ſurprize of his court, he deprived cardinal Poole of his legation in England, and recalled him to Rome, thereby, as it was ſuppoſed, gratifying his own private reſentment againſt that prelate, whom he had formerly accuſed of hereſy in the conclave [h] (T). He likewiſe, ſoon after, publiſhed a ſevere bull againſt thoſe who ſhould receive benefices under the name of others, or ſhould offer annual penſions for them, or ſhould reſign their own for an annuity, or, laſtly, ſhould for a reward procure any benefices for another [i]. To put a ſtop to the cabals and intrigues of the cardinals of the imperial faction, he renewed all the former laws and canons againſt thoſe who ſhould hold conventicles or ſecret meetings, to ſollicit the votes of the ſacred college for the pontificate during the life of the pope, declaring them guilty of treaſon and ſimony, of whatever rank and degree, whether eccleſiaſtical or ſecular.

a hands the reſignation ought to have been made. He therefore inſiſted that Ferdinand ſhould ſend a proxy to Rome, to renounce all the proceedings of the diet at Frankfort, and to reſign the whole affair to his arbitration, declaring, that he would then confirm Ferdinand in the imperial dignity. The emperor hearing of the pope's determination, wrote to his ambaſſador to enter a proteſtation, and to leave Rome, if he was not admitted to an audience within three days after the receiving of this letter. Notwithſtanding this peremptory command, Paul ſtill remained inflexible. He only admitted the ambaſſador to a private interview, in the preſence of ſome cardinals, deſired him to enter his proteſtation, and return to Ferdinand; and declared, that he would forthwith ſend a legate to the emperor Charles, to treat of the affair of the reſignation. Charles died a few months after at a b monaſtery in Spain, whither he had retired from worldly grandeur. Paul, however, during his whole pontificate, would never conſent to acknowledge Ferdinand as emperor [k].

THOUGH the pope, by his arrogance and ſeverity, had rendered himſelf odious to the Romans, yet he gave general ſatisfaction in puniſhing the crimes of his nephews, who had greatly abuſed the truſts committed to their charge. On the 26th of January, in a full conſiſtory, he removed the cardinal Caraffa from all adminiſtration of affairs, deprived him of his legation of Bologna, and baniſhed him to Patricia: he diſmiſſed the duke of Paliano from being admiral of the gallies, and general of the army of the church; and ordered the marquis of Montebello to reſign the office of captain of his guards, and to retire to his own caſtle: he refuſed to hearken to any interceſſions made by the cardinals in their behalf; c and ſuppreſſing ſome new taxes, which he pretended had been raiſed without his knowledge, he removed all thoſe who had received any places from his nephews, and even put ſeveral of them in priſon [l] (U). Applying his mind then wholly to the office of the inquiſition, he ordered a box to be fixed in a public place of his palace, into which all perſons were at liberty to put accuſations and informations; and he commanded all cauſes belonging to the holy office to be tried before himſelf once a week. About the ſame time he publiſhed a bull, by which he renewed all the puniſhments and cenſures againſt heretics, which had ever been decreed by any popes, councils, and fathers, declaring all prelates, emperors, kings, and princes convicted of hereſy, to be thereby, without any farther declaration, deprived of their benefices, empires, kingdoms, and principalities [m]. He likewiſe ordered all biſhops to pro- d ceed to their own dioceſes, and all thoſe who had embraced a monaſtic life to return to their monaſteries, admitting of no excuſe in theſe laſt, but denouncing an anathema againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey; and executing his mandate in his own territories with ſuch rigour, that many of the vagrant monks were impriſoned, and ſeveral of them ſent to the gallies [n] (W).

AT this time he alſo erected thirteen cities in the Low Countries into biſhoprics, where there were only two before, namely Cambray and Utrecht, which, with the city of Mechlin, he raiſed to the dignity of metropolitan ſees, with juriſdiction over the new-erected biſhoprics; by which proceeding he greatly irritated the minds of the inhabitants, many of whom had embraced the doctrines of Luther, Calvin, and other reformers; and being ap- e prehenſive that theſe alterations were only a prelude to the introduction of the inquiſition, began to conſult about freeing themſelves from the oppreſſion of the Spaniards [o]. A few days before the bull for theſe alterations was publiſhed, he received the news of a peace, concluded on the 2d of April, between the kings of France and Spain, at which he expreſſed great joy.

Several new biſhoprics erected in Flanders.

HE was greatly diſſatisfied, however, with the elevation of queen Elizabeth to the throne of England, which about this time was ſignified to him by the Engliſh ambaſſadors. He alledged, that as England was a fief of the apoſtolic ſee, ſhe could not aſſume the adminiſtration of the kingdom without the leave of the pope, eſpecially conſidering the defect of her right by birth; nevertheleſs, if ſhe would ſubmit to his arbitration, he would act to- f wards her with paternal tenderneſs. This ridiculous and abſurd declaration was of great ſervice to the queen, in weaning her ſubjects from any attachment to the Roman ſee. The pope, however, is ſuppoſed to have been only the dupe of the French ambaſſador, and to have objected to her ſucceſſion from his inſinuations of her ſecret attachment to Lutheraniſm, Henry II. being afraid that ſhe would conclude a marriage with his rival in power the

He dies at Rome greatly hated by the Romans.

PAUL did not long ſurvive the news of the revolution of religion in England; but having been for ſome time afflicted with a dropſy, died on the 16th of Auguſt, in the 84th year of his age, and the fifth of his pontificate, after exhorting the cardinals, whom he called into his chamber, to unite in chuſing a worthy ſucceſſor, and recommending to them the continuance of the inquiſition [q]. Scarce any pope had ever acted with more arrogance and deſpotiſm. His intentions were good and ſincere, but there was ſo much ſavage ferocity in his behaviour, that he rendered himſelf univerſally hated; ſo that, even before his death, while he lay expiring, the Romans aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, curſed his name and b family, and, after having given liberty to the priſoners, ſet fire to the new building of the inquiſition, and were with great difficulty prevented from doing the ſame to the convent of the Dominicans at Minerva. He was no ſooner dead than they ran to the Capitol, broke off the head and right hand of his ſtatue, which they toſſed about the ſtreets for three days, and at length threw into the Tyber; and an edict being publiſhed, in the name of the Roman people, for aboliſhing the arms of the Caraffa family, it was executed with ſuch diſpatch, that the ſame day there was no memorial of that name left in the city [r].

Upon the death of Paul IV. the Roman ſee was vacant more than four months, occaſioned by the diſſentions among the cardinals, who, to the number of forty-four, entered the conclave on the 5th of September, where, after long conteſts and repeated ſcrutinies, c they at length, on Chriſtmas evening, unanimouſly choſe John Angelo Medicini, cardinal of Sancta Priſca, who aſſuming the name of Pius IV. was crowned on the 6th of January (X).

Pius IV. elected. A. D. 1560.

Pius began his pontificate with pardoning the riotous proceedings of the Romans upon the death of his predeceſſor, upon condition that they repaired all the damages done to the holy office of the inquiſition. He received without any ſcruple the ambaſſadors of the emperor Ferdinand, whoſe election he confirmed; and examining the ſeveral innovations of his predeceſſor, he revoked the trials of common cauſes to the uſual forms of law. A few months after his promotion, he ordered the nephews of the late pope, with ſeveral others of their kindred and ſervants to be apprehended and impriſoned in the caſtle of St. Angelo, where, after long confinement, they were condemned and executed, on account of their d enormous crimes, though the legal form of proceeding was not ſtrictly obſerved at their trial. Cardinal Alphonſo, the grand nephew of the late pope, was only fined; but ſeveral other cardinals were likewiſe thrown into priſon, and deprived of rich biſhoprics.

While he acted with this ſeverity towards the nephews of Paul and their dependents, he called his own nephews to his court, on whom he conferred ſeveral dignities and rich benefices. The moſt diſtinguiſhed of theſe was Charles Borromeo, then in the 22d year of his age, whom he created a cardinal, and, on account of his eminent virtues and abilities, appointed ſupreme adminiſtrator of all eccleſiaſtical affairs. Having likewiſe ſet cardinal Moron at liberty, he communicated his moſt ſecret councils with him and his nephew Borromeo [s]. Mean while he was ſollicited by the duke of Savoy to allow a conference to be e held in his dominions, to ſettle the diſputes concerning religion, as many of the inhabitants of the vallies in the Alps had renounced the faith and obedience of the Roman church, and ſtill perſiſted in their opinions, notwithſtanding the puniſhments of the inquiſition. Pius refuſed his demand; and perſuading the duke that heretics were more eaſily refuted by the ſword than by conferences, a war was begun in the vallies, which continued for a long time.

He excites the duke of Savoy to make war on the proteſtants.

Great commotions in France on account of religion.

The intention of the pope was chiefly engroſſed at this time by the diſturbances in France, where the proteſtants, together with ſeveral popiſh malecontents, had formed a deſign of depriving the duke of Guiſe, and his brother the cardinal, of the adminiſtration of the kingdom, and obliging the young king Francis II. to allow the free exerciſe of their re- f ligion. Tho' the plot was diſcovered before it could be put in execution, and was thereby fruſtrated, yet the power of the proteſtants or Hugonots appeared ſo formidable, that an edict was publiſhed, prohibiting all puniſhments on account of religion, provided that the doctrine and ceremonies of the Romiſh church ſhould be obſerved for the future. By another edict, that was ſoon after publiſhed, the trial of hereſy was taken from the ſecular

Beſides, a general convention of eſtates, in the end of Auguſt, was held at Fontainbleau, in which ſome biſhops of Dauphiny, after exclaiming againſt the vices and ignorance of the popiſh clergy, and extolling the modeſty, learning, and piety of the Calviniſt miniſters, had propoſed to call a national council, as the moſt proper means to put an end to the diſturbances of the kingdom. The pope was greatly alarmed with the news of the proceedings of this convention, and was even apprehenſive that France intended to follow the example of England, and to form a church independent of the ſee of Rome, as the French prelates expreſſed a great deſire that the pragmatic ſanction ſhould be again
b renewed. He therefore ſent the biſhop of Viterbo immediately to France, to repreſent to the king, that a national council would be a great diminution of his royal authority, and would have the appearance of a ſchiſm from the univerſal church. He likewiſe wrote to the king of Spain, deſiring him to diſſuade the French king from aſſembling the Gallican clergy: but Francis ſtill inſiſting on the expediency of a national council, and deſiring the pope to ſend a legate into France, to aſſemble the biſhops of that kingdom, Pius, to cut off all pretences for aſſembling the French clergy by themſelves, reſolved to call a general council; and after long conſultations, at length determined to renew that of Trent, which had only been ſuſpended.

The pope determines to renew the council of Trent.

The emperor and the king of France both objected to this propoſal, alleging, that the c very name of Trent was odious both to the proteſtants and Hugonots; and that they expected a new council, where all articles of faith might be canvaſſed with freedom. Notwithſtanding their objections, Pius, thinking it moſt for the honour of the Roman ſee to renew the old council, after long diſputes with the imperial and French ambaſſadors, on the 28th of November publiſhed a bull, taking off the ſuſpenſion of the council of Trent, which he appointed to be again opened on the following Eaſter. Immediately after he diſpatched nuncios to all the Chriſtian princes, deſiring them not to be offended with the word continuation, which he had put into his bull, as it would be no impediment to the reviſal of any former proceedings, and would not prevent the council from altering what had been decreed during the pontificate of Paul and Julius III. Pius began to be very d anxious for aſſembling of the general council, as Francis II. had died in the ſecond year of his reign, a few days before the publiſhing of his bull, and the ſtates of that kingdom, who about the middle of December had aſſembled at Orleans, had by a decree ordered all thoſe who were impriſoned on account of religion, to be ſet at liberty, and that none ſhould be reproached or puniſhed for their opinions, or religious profeſſion; from whence he concluded, that France as well as Germany, intended to revolt from the obedience of the holy ſee [t].

About this time two of his nuncios arriving with the ambaſſadors of the emperor at Naumberg, where the proteſtants were aſſembled, invited them to ſend their deputies to the council of Trent. The proteſtant princes declared to the imperial ambaſſadors, that they
e did not reject a council, provided their divines were allowed to ſit and vote, and the ultimate deciſion ſhould be left to the word of God, and not to the pope; but they replied to the nuncios, that as they did not acknowlege any authority or juriſdiction of the pope, they did not deſire to know his intention in calling a council, and returned the letters unopened, which the pope had addreſſed to each of them ſingly [u]. One of the nuncios retiring from this diet, proceeded to Lubec in the north of Germany, from whence he ſent to the king of Denmark, deſiring leave to enter his kingdom: but Frederic, who two years before had ſucceeded to the throne, replied, that as neither he nor his father had ever any concern with the pope, he knew no buſineſs his nuncios could have with him. The nuncio to the queen of Scotland was obliged to enter that kingdom in diſguiſe, and obtained a promiſe from the f queen, that ſhe would adhere to the decrees of the council [w]. But queen Elizabeth of England, notwithſtanding the intreaties of the emperor and the king of Spain, abſolutely refuſed to allow the nuncio to enter her kingdom [x]. In Poland the nuncio was received in an honourable manner; but the duke of Muſcovy replied to his ſollicitations, that as he was an ally of the proteſtants, he would not conſent to the council [y]. The nuncios likewiſe did not meet with great encouragement from the emperor nor the king of France, who both objected to the word continuation, and declared, that unleſs there was an alteration made in the bull, they could not approve of the council, which, inſtead of doing any good, would only occaſion new ſchiſms [z]. Charles IX. of France, who was then a minor, and in ſome meaſure under the direction of the admiral de Coligni, declared, that if the pope did not grant his demand, he ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to a national council, as the moſt proper means to quiet the diſturbances of his kingdom. a

Pius offendes the king of Spain, by granting an audience to the ambaſſador of the king of Navarre.

THE king of Spain alſo formed objections to the council, from his reſentment againſt the pope, who had granted a public audience to the ambaſſador of the king of Navarre. This Philip II. interpreted as a condemnation of his right to that kingdom, which had been unjuſtly ſeized by his grandfather Ferdinand of Arragon. Pius, to appeaſe the king, ſent a legate into Spain to excuſe his proceeding; and as the time for the opening of the council approached, he ſent two legates to Trent, who arriving at that city on the 9th of April, three days after Eaſter, found only nine biſhops, who had come thither a few days before. The pope likewiſe, to encourage the biſhops and prelates to repair to the council, publiſhed a bull, granting ſeveral privileges to thoſe who undertook that journey. b

He ſends his legates to Trent.

MEAN while the authority of the Roman ſee appeared to be daily ſinking in France, where, by a royal edict, the Hugonots, who were in the priſons, were ordered to be ſet at liberty, and thoſe who were baniſhed in the reign of Francis I. were permitted to return. In an aſſembly of the ſtates, which was held in the month of Auguſt at St. Germains, admiral de Coligni, who was the chief of the Hugonots, having by his intereſt procured a confirmation of the adminiſtration to the queen mother, ſhe promiſed to allow the free exerciſe of his religion. A conference was likewiſe granted to the Hugonot divines, which the pope uſed great pains to prevent; but not ſucceeding, he ſent the cardinal Ferrara thither as his legate, to prevent any thing being determined concerning the controverted points. The conference opened at Poiſſer on the 2d of September, in which Auguſtine Marloratus, Theodore Beza, Peter Martyr, and ten other Hugonot divines, defended their doctrines in the preſence of the king, the queen mother, the king of Navarre, a great many peers, ſix cardinals, and about ten biſhops; but after long diſputes the conference broke up on the 25th of November, without any thing being determined [a]. However the Hugonots, having obtained this public diſputation, grew more confident; and the queen regent, at the perſuaſion of ſome of their chiefs, and with the conſent of ſome of the catholic clergy, aſked of the pope, in the name of the French prelates, to allow the communion under both kinds in France, and divine ſervice to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue, which demands the pope abſolutely refuſed to grant.

The council is again opened at Trent. A. D. 1562.

As the reformation was ſpreading into all parts of Europe, Pius determined to delay the opening of the council no longer; and having ſent other three leagues to Trent, deſired the firſt ſeſſion to be opened in the month of December. It was however deferred on account of the emperor's ambaſſador till the 18th of January, ſome preliminaries having been ſettled three days before in a general congregation. Upon reading the decree for the renewal of the council, a debate enſued; for it being therein propoſed that no queſtion ſhould be debated in the council, but what was firſt moved by the legates (proponentibus legatis,) four Spaniſh prelates refuſed their aſſent to that article, and urged, that it was an innovation, had never been uſed at former councils, and ſeemed to deprive all others of the liberty of propoſing any queſtion. Their oppoſition, however, was over-ruled, and the next ſeſſion appointed to be held on the 26th of February. The king of Spain, upon the repreſentation of his prelate, objected to the above article in the decree by his ambaſſador at Rome; but he received nothing but evaſive anſwers from the pope, who in his turn complained, that the Spaniſh biſhops plainly diſcovered their alienation from the holy ſee, as they had granted their king a free gift of 400,000 crowns annually for ten years, by which great injury was done to the Spaniſh church. d e

MEAN while the queen regent of France, at the perſuaſion of the prince of Conde, the admiral de Coligni, and the chancellor, publiſhed an edict, allowing the Hugonots rhe free exerciſe of their religion, without the walls of the cities, on condition that they taught nothing contrary to the old and new Teſtament, and to the council of Nice, and abſtained from railing againſt the maſs and other rites of the Roman church. The pope was greatly offended with this edict; nevertheleſs the queen, being afraid of an inſurrection, ſoon after publiſhed another, confirming the former, and even allowing them to hold their aſſemblies in all the cities of the kingdom, except Paris. This ſecond edict, however, had not the deſired effect; for the Hugonots reſolving to ſecure to themſelves the liberty of conſcience by arms, ſeized the cities of Orleans, Rouen, Lyons, Poictiers, Anjou, Berry, and Tours, which occaſioned a civil war, that continued for ſome time with great animoſity. f

BEFORE the commencement of hoſtilities in France, the council celebrated the ſecond ſeſſion, which was held on the 26th of February, in which a decree was read concerning an index expurgatorius of books; the biſhops of five churches, the emperor's ambaſſador for Hungary, the patriarch of Venice, four archbiſhops, nine biſhops, one Benedictine a abbot, two generals of the orders of Franciſcans and Auguſtines, having been appointed at a general congregation to compoſe the index, which was ordered not to be publiſhed till the concluſion of the council, for fear of exaſperating the proteſtants. The 14th of March being appointed for the next ſeſſion, the fathers, in the mean time, aſſembled in general congregations; in one of which they granted a very ample ſafe-conduct to all thoſe, of whatever nation, who differed from the ſynod in points of faith. They then diſputed about thoſe points which were afterwards to be decided in the ſeſſions, particularly about the reſidence of prelates and prieſts in their dioceſes and pariſhes. The greateſt part of the divines and fathers aſſerted with great warmth, that reſidence was de jure divino, or appointed by divine revelation; but the party for the pope maintained, that ſuch a doctrine would be

b the ruin of the hierarchy, as every biſhop would then conclude that he himſelf was ſupreme in his own dioceſe; nay, every prieſt would allege, that he had the ſole juriſdiction in his own pariſh. This diſpute continued for ſeveral days; but tho' the majority of the fathers propoſed to form a decree for confirming the divine right of reſidence, yet the legates found means to drop the affair, and leave it undetermined [b]. The Spaniſh ambaſſador likewiſe propoſed, that the preſent council ſhould be declared a continuation of the former, held in the ſame city; but his motion being oppoſed by the imperial ambaſſadors, and the legates being alſo divided, nothing was decided on that head: and as the French ambaſſadors were upon their journey to Trent, the third ſeſſion was formally celebrated without any buſineſs being propoſed, and next ſeſſion was appointed to be held on the 4th of June.

c In the mean time the French ambaſſadors arriving, were admitted to an audience in a general congregation on the 26th of May, when one of them made an elegant oration, wherein he exhorted the fathers to uſe freedom of debate, and to take ſuch meaſures as would free the flock of Chriſt from uſurpation and oppreſſion, as there was then no hazard of having the ſafe-conduct violated, or of diſputing with flames in that city. They then deſired the legates to declare the council a new one, as the Hugonots would not otherwiſe acknowledge it; but they replying, that they were only commiſſioned by the pope to preſide at the ſeſſions, the ambaſſadors conſulted with thoſe of the emperor, and agreed not to inſiſt upon their former demand, provided no mention ſhould be made of the continuation of the council in the public acts. They afterwards deſired that the diſcuſſing of d the articles of faith might be delayed, till the arrival of the deputies from the proteſtants and Calviniſts; and added, the Engliſh ambaſſador in France had declared, that queen Elizabeth intended to ſend deputies to the council. In conſequence of their repreſentations all buſineſs was likewiſe deferred at the following ſeſſion, only the prolocutor of the council made an harangue in anſwer to that of the French ambaſſador, wherein he endeavoured to prove that the council was free, notwithſtanding the pope's legates preſided, and it had been called by his authority. The next ſeſſion was then appointed on the 16th of July, the pope in the mean time expreſſing great diſſatisfaction at the proceedings of the fathers. He blamed his legate, the cardinal of Mantua, becauſe he had oppoſed the motion of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who wanted the preſent council to be declared a continuation of the e former; and he accuſed the French amaſſadors as favourers of the Hugonots and proteſtants, alleging, that one of them had ſaid that he would bring as many biſhops to the council from France and Germany, as would be able to deſtroy the idol of Rome.

Great part of the council appeared no leſs diſſatisfied with Pius, and intended to moderate and limit his authority. The imperial ambaſſadors preſented the grievances of the Germanic body in a memorial, and demanded, that the pope ſhould ſubmit to a reformation both in his perſon and court; that the number of cardinals ſhould be reduced to twelve, as at the firſt inſtitution, or at leaſt to twenty-four; that all exemptions, contrary to law, ſhould be revoked; that diſpenſations ſhould not be granted, unleſs for urgent reaſons; that plurality of benefices ſhould be aboliſhed, and eccleſiaſtical offices ſhould not
f be ſet to ſale; that all ſuperfluous canons ſhould be repealed, and the reſt not accounted of the ſame obligation with divine laws; that divine ſervice ſhould be ſo celebrated, that it might be underſtood by the people; that the diſtinction of meats, and the rigour of faſts, ſhould he moderated; that eccleſiaſtics ſhould be allowed to marry, and the communion be granted to the laity under both kinds [c]. The legates, to whom the memorial was preſented, anſwered, that, before the next ſeſſion, they could only have time to determine the diſpute concerning the communion, and then propoſed ſome articles on that head to be diſcuſſed. A great many of the fathers were of opinion that the cup ought to be granted to thoſe of the laity who demanded it, very many catholics, as well as the proteſtants, expreſſing a great deſire to communicate under both kinds. Gonzaga, cardinal of Mantua, ſeemed inclined to this opinion; however, the papal party prevailed, and in the ſeſſion they eſtabliſhed four articles with regard to the communion; but on account of the abſence of the German and French biſhops, they delayed determing whether the cup ought to be granted to the laity, and under what conditions it ſhould be allowed. They then read nine articles concerning reformation, by the laſt of which they entirely aboliſhed the name and office of queſtors (Y). a

THE legates, to prevent any farther diſputes about the cup in the euchariſt, remitted that article to the pope, out of regard (as they pretended) to the emperor, who would more eaſily obtain his demands from his holineſs, than from the fathers at Trent; whereas in reality theſe laſt, who conſiſted almoſt wholly of Portugueſe, Spaniards, and Italians, were only the tools of the former [d]. Having likewiſe appointed the next ſeſſion to be held on the 17th of September, they propoſed the articles concerning the inſtitution and efficacy of the maſs, of the ceremonies to be obſerved in that office, and of mixing water with wine, b to be diſcuſſed in the general congregations. The imperial and French ambaſſadors, with many others, inſiſted, that the ſeſſion ſhould be delayed till the arrival of the French and Poliſh biſhops, and till the concluſion of the German diet, which was to be held at Frankfort in the month of November; but as the pope had deſired the legates to haſten the concluſion of the council, it was carried againſt them; and the articles above-mentioned were debated in the congregations, in which a queſtion was ſtarted, Whether Jeſus Chriſt, when he firſt inſtituted the ſacrament of the euchariſt, did then offer and ſacrifice himſelf? If he did not at that time offer himſelf a ſacrifice, then the maſs, which is founded on the inſtitution, Do this in remembrance of me, is no ſacrifice; and if he did ſacrifice himſelf, it muſt have been propitiatory, as it is ſaid he offered himſelf but once, and then the ſacrifice on c the croſs had been unprofitable and unneceſſary, as the ſins of mankind had been expiated by the ſacrifice of the euchariſt.

THIS queſtion occaſioned ſo much doubt and debate, that many propoſed to leave the article concerning the maſs undetermined by any particular canon: however, the majority were of a different opinion, and in the following ſeſſion nine articles were read containing the doctrine of the maſs; the ſum of which were, that it had been inſtituted by Chriſt in the laſt ſupper; that it was propitiatory for the living and the dead; that it was offered only to God, though it might ſometimes be celebrated in honour of the ſaints; that the canon of the maſs, and the rites and ceremonies appointed by the church for its celebration, were all free from error; that the maſſes in which the prieſt alone communicated, were common to d all the hearers; that in the chalice, water ought to be mixed with the wine; that the maſs ought not to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue, but that its myſteries ought frequently to be explained to the people: to all which articles anathemas were added againſt the adverſaries of that doctrine: however, twenty-two or twenty-three prelates refuſed their aſſent to this canon. In the ſame ſeſſion a decree was alſo read, concerning reformation, under eleven articles; by which, among other things, full power was given to biſhops to inſpect the nature of diſpenſations, whether they were fairly or ſurreptitiouſly obtained. And by another decree, the article about the cup in the euchariſt was remitted to the deciſion of the pope; at which the emperor was greatly offended, beng ſenſible that the greateſt part of the Germans would refuſe to accept of any conceſſion from the pope. Several other de- e terminations of this ſeſſion were likewiſe univerſally blamed, as giving too ample power and juriſdiction to the biſhops.

THE fathers in the mean time continued their general congregations, and debated with great acrimony concerning the ſacraments of ordination and marriage. Very many, eſpecially of the Spaniards, aſſerted the divine right of epiſcopacy, and that the biſhops held their power and authority immediately from Jeſus Chriſt, and not from the pope. This declaration alarmed the legates, who at firſt allowed the debate to proceed freely, while the fathers were diſputing concerning the ſuperiority of the order of biſhops to that of prieſts; but now they prohibited them from treating farther on that ſubject. However, they ſoon after appointed four divines to anſwer the arguments of the Spaniſh biſhops; the f chief of theſe defenders being Lainez, general of the Jeſuits, who declaimed for two hours in a general congregation, and aſſerted, that epiſcopacy was no otherwiſe of divine right, than as the whole order of the hierarchy was inherent in the pope. Both parties defending their opinions with great heat and paſſion, the legates, in order to cool their ardour, deferred the general congregations, and even the approaching ſeſſions, till the arrival of the cardinal of Lorrain, with the French prelates, who had already entered Italy. The cardinal a soon after entered Trent, where he was received with great honour, and on the 23d of November admitted to an audience in a general congregation, in which he delivered his credentials. Before his arrival, while the congregations were interrupted, the Spaniſh prelates aſſociated themſelves together, and demanded, in a poſitive manner, that epiſcopacy ſhould be declared of divine right. The legates, as the only means to excuſe themſelves, procured twenty prelates of their own party to come to their lodgings, and to demand that no determination might be made of that controverſy; ſo that, to ſatisfy both parties, the queſtion was ſtill left in ſuſpence. At the ſame time they uſed many arts to defeat the intentions of the cardinal of Lorrain and the French prelates, who had publiſhed on their journey to Trent, that they intended to deſtroy the greatneſs and pride of the pope, and b to free the people from the oppreſſions and tyrannies of the court of Rome.

Upon their arrival the number of prelates amounted to 218; the majority of whom being ſuſpected to be enemies to the papal authority, Pius immediately diſpatched as many cardinals and biſhops from Italy as he could to the council, to reinforce his party The apprehenſions of the legates, with regard to the French prelates, ſoon appeared to be juſt, for they eſpouſed, with great warmth, the doctrine of the divine right of epiſcopacy. The cardinal of Lorrain, after exclaiming againſt the corruptions of the clergy, and deſcribing the miſeries of France, ſaid, We, the eccleſiaſtics, are the cauſe of all theſe ſtorms; we that have departed and fled from the face of God, caſt us into the ſea, and the tempeſt will ceaſe. Another declared, that if the cauſe of the civil diſturbances in France were required, he might c anſwer as Jehu did to Joram, when he aſked, Is it peace, Jehu? How can it be peace, ſo long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are ſo many? As ſeveral others aſſerted that the authority of the pope differed not from that of any other biſhop, but that the church the ſpouſe of Chriſt, was enſlaved and proſtituted to the arbitrary pleaſure of a ſingle perſon, the papal party endeavoured to prove, that the government of the church was monarchical, and that the authority of the keys was only committed to Peter and his ſucceſſors [e].

During theſe tranſactions in the council, the pope publiſhed ſeveral bulls, ordaining reformations in ſome of his offices, and ſubjecting ſacred places and confraternities to the authority of the ordinaries and pariſh prieſts, and ordering that all indulgences ſhould for d the future be given gratis [f]. He likewiſe received a letter from the emperor, who, after the diet at Frankfort, where his eldeſt ſon Maximilian was elected king of the Romans, had retired to Inſpruck, to attend the deliberations of the council. Ferdinand declared, that he intended to go perſonally to Trent, to promote the reformation of the clergy and people, which was very neceſſary; and he exhorted the pope likewiſe to repair thither, and to favour the liberty of the prelates, who were principally offended with three things, namely, that all affairs were firſt deliberated at Rome; that the legates alone had the li- A. berty of propoſing what was to be debated in the general congregations; and that much time was ſpent in intrigues, for promoting the grandeur of the court of Rome. Pius wrote to the emperor, juſtifying himſelf from any ſiniſter views with regard to the council, and The pope propoſes to transfer the council to Bologna.
e ſoon after ſent the cardinal Moron to him as his legate, to diſſuade him from proceeding to Trent, and to propoſe the tranſlation of the council to Bologna, where, at the ſame time, he would confer upon him the imperial crown. Ferdinand, however, would not hearken to this propoſal, but demanded the redreſs of the complaints he had mentioned in his letter, and beſides required, that the council ſhould treat firſt of thoſe matters preſented by his deputies, and thoſe of France.

Mean while the tumults and confuſions at Trent ſtill increaſed. The ſeſſion, which ſhould have been held in November, was prorogued to the 3d of February; and, in the beginning of the year, the French ambaſſadors had preſented a memorial in the general congregation, propoſing a reformation in thirty-four articles, which greatly alarmed the le-f gates and the papal party, as they tended to retrench the revenue, and alter the rites of the Roman church (Z). The king of France about the ſame period, to gain a favourable reception to the articles propoſed by his ambaſſadors, repealed the decree of the convention of Orleans, which had prohibited the payment of annates to the court of Rome [1]. The pope, however, expreſſed great diſſatisfaction upon reading the French memorial, and ordered his nuncios in France to ſollicit the king to alter ſeveral of the articles, which he ſaid were greatly prejudicial to the apoſtolic ſee, and tended to pull his authority to pieces. As their remonſtrances were ineffectual, Pius ordered his legates at Trent not to allow the memorial to be treated of in the congregations, where violent altercation and diſorder ſtill prevailed. a

NOTWITHSTANDING the oppoſition of a great many fathers, the ſeſſion was again prorogued to the 22d of April; and, in the mean time, the diſputes concerning the ſacraments of ordination and marriage ſtill continued, while the cardinal of Lorrain went to Inſpruck to have a conference with the emperor, whom he found greatly ſollicitous about the affairs of the council; which, on account of many prorogations, it was believed the pope had an intention of diſſolving. At the ſame time Pius recalled his nephew Altaempſius, one of the legates, that he might aſſiſt him in raiſing ſome troops, as he was informed that the dukes of Saxony and Wirtemberg, and the landgrave of Heſſe, were making new levies, and that b the Germans expreſſed a great deſire of again attacking Rome. Hearing likewiſe of the death of the cardinal of Mantua at Trent, he ſent the cardinals Moron and Navagerius thither, to ſupply his place and that of his nephew.

He is apprehenſive of an irruption of the Germans into Italy.

SOON after being informed that the king of France had conſented to a peace with the Calviniſts, by which he had granted them the free exerciſe of their religion, blaming the cardinal Coligny, brother to the admiral, who had renounced his eccleſiaſtical titles, and aſſumed that of count of Beauvais, he publiſhed a ſpecial mandate on the 8th of April, ordering the cardinals inquiſitors general to cite all prelates, of what dignity ſoever, who were ſuſpected of hereſy, to appear at Rome; and, in caſe of their not appearing perſonally, to proceed againſt them according to the ſentence which he ſhould pronounce in a ſecret conſiſtory. c In conſequence of this mandate, the inquiſitors general ſummoned cardinal Coligny, and nine or ten French biſhops, to appear within a certain limited time at Rome; but the French prelates deſpiſing the ſummons, and ſuffering the time to elapſe, on the 22d of October three of them were depoſed, and the others ſuſpended, till they ſhould clear themſelves from the ſuſpicion of hereſy [m] (A).

BEFORE the publication of this ſentence at Rome, the ſeſſion being again ſuſpended at Trent, the cardinal of Lorrain, in a general congregation, on the 10th of May preſented a letter from his niece Mary queen of Scotland, by which ſhe declared, that ſhe would ſubmit to the council, and promiſed that, if ſhe ſhould ever ſucceed to the crown of England, ſhe would ſubject both kingdoms to the authority of the Roman ſee. Four days after he made d a long diſcourſe concerning biſhops, and the means of preventing abuſes in their election, inveighing ſeverely againſt pluralities, though he himſelf then poſſeſſed church revenues to the amount of 1,000,000 of livres a year. As in the concluſion he exclaimed againſt the ſee of Rome, which he termed the ſource and original of all the corruptions in the church, the cardinal Moron made a reply, treating him with great ſeverity; on which account the animoſities inſtead of abating, were inflamed more than before. In the following congregation, which was held on the 21ſt of May, great diſputes aroſe about precedency betwixt the count de Luna, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, and thoſe of France. Theſe laſt at length conſented, that he might ſet in a place apart by himſelf; but the diſpute was again renewed at the celebration of maſs on the feaſt of St. Peter; when the French ambaſſadors having e been informed that the pope had ordered the incenſe and the peace to be given to them and the count de Luna at the ſame time, they interrupted the ſervice by their remonſtrances, ſo that the maſs was that day celebrated without giving either the incenſe or the peace. As the legates juſtified themſelves by the orders of the pope, the cardinal of Lorrain next day ſent his ſecretary to Rome to complain of the injury; and one of the French ambaſſadors declared, that, unleſs their juſt precedency was allowed, they would proteſt againſt Pius, who, they could prove, had obtained the pontificate by ſimony, and would appeal to a future pope and a future council, and in the mean time would call a national council, in France. As both the French and Poles threatened to withdraw their obedience from the apoſtolic ſee, ſeveral of the prelates prevailed with the count de Luna to inſiſt no farther on precedency, till he f ſhould receive new inſtructions from Spain.

THIS diſpute betwixt the ambaſſadors, being in ſome meaſure calmed, the legates began to think of means to moderate the debates betwixt the divines concerning the articles of religion and reformation. The French, by orders from their court, began to abate in their zeal againſt the corruptions of Rome, the queen being deſirous to prevail with the pope to confirm the royal edict for the perpetual alienation of ſome revenues of the Gallican church, a to the amount of 300,000 livres, under pretence of diſcharging a debt contracted in defence of the catholic religion. The cardinal of Lorrain likewiſe wanted to ingratiate himſelf with the papal party, as he was recalled to France, and knew that he was deteſted by the Calviniſts in that kingdom. About the ſame time the emperor, finding that his reſidence at Inſpruck rather retarded than forwarded the proceedings of the council, left that city, after having ordered his ambaſſadors to prevent, as much as poſſible, all diſputes about the authority of the pope, and that nothing might be decreed which would render an accommodation with the proteſtants more difficult. He likewiſe wrote to Pius, and to the legates of Trent, deſiring them to ſtop all proceedings againſt the queen of England, as it would only be a means of uniting the proteſtants more firmly in their own defence. The debates

b ſtill continuing in the congregations, the cardinal of Lorrain moderated, to the utmoſt of his power, the animoſities of both parties, and propoſed that they ſhould only treat of the power of the order of biſhops, and that, in the article of reſidence, all expreſſions might be kept out that would give offence, either to thoſe who reckoned it of human inſtitution or of divine. This propoſal was reliſhed by the legates, who, conſidering that a great part of the fathers were tired with the continual debates, and would agree to canons that were not abſolutely deciſive, they reſolved to draw them up in ſuch terms as would admit of a dubious interpretation.

All matters being at laſt ſettled, the ſeventh ſeſſion under Pius, and the twenty-third ſince the firſt commencement of the council under Paul III. was celebrated on the 15th
c of July; in which a Spaniſh biſhop declared in his ſermon, that though the faith of the catholics was the beſt, yet their morals were much inferior to thoſe of the heretics. After the celebration of maſs, and the uſual ceremonies, a decree was read concerning the ſacrament of ordination, conſiſting of four heads, by which they declared, that Chriſt had given the apoſtles, and their ſucceſſors in the prieſthood a power of conſecrating and offering the viſible ſacrifice, and of remitting of ſins; that the order of the prieſthood is divided into ſeven degrees; that as ſcripture and apoſtolic tradition affirm, that ordination confers grace, it is therefore a ſacrament; that as by this ſacrament an indelible character is conferred, their opinion ought to be condemned who aſſert that prieſts have only a temporary power, and, if they neglect their office, differ not from laymen; that all Chriſtians are not prieſts, but thoſe only who
d are ordained by the pope, or by authority derived from him. To theſe articles eight anathemas were added, condemning all thoſe who maintained any other doctrine; and then eighteen articles were read concerning reformation; the firſt of which ordained all prelates and curates to reſide with their flocks, prohibiting, under ſevere penalties, an abſence of above three months at a time; however a proviſo was added, unleſs the benefit and ſervice of the church and ſtate ſhould require it. The other articles regarded the collation and regulation of orders, which ought not to be conferred on debauched perſons, or ſuch as were unworthy of them; and directed the form of the government of ſeminaries where prieſts ſhould be educated, with ſeveral other matters of no great importance.

The decrees of this ſeſſion, which had been debated for near ten months, diſappointed
e the expectations of all Europe. The contradictions that appeared in the canons, and the weak preambles and abſurd concluſions, were every-where the ſubject of ridicule, eſpecially to the proteſtants, who, in their ſermons, took all opportunities of expoſing the proceedings of the council. The legates likewiſe, being ſenſible that the concluſion of the council was greatly deſired by the catholics, reſolved to haſten the deciſion of all the remaining points. They therefore altered the method of diſputing in the congregations, and propoſed the doctrines of indulgences, invocation of ſaints, images, and purgatory, to be examined at once. Having likewiſe obtained the conſent of the imperial, French, and Spaniſh ambaſſadors, to treat of the reformation of princes, they propoſed the article concerning marriage; and in the mean time drew up the heads of the reformation of princes, which they communicated to f their ambaſſadors, who ſent them to their reſpective courts. This plan of a ſecular reformation was comprehended in thirteen articles in favour of the eccleſiaſtical liberty, which, as they were very extravagant, and tended greatly to the diminution of the prerogative of princes, the emperor declared that he would never ſuffer to be debated. The French ambaſſadors alſo affirmed, that they would proteſt againſt any deciſions of the fathers on theſe points, and would immediately withdraw from Trent with all the French prelates. The fathers of the council, upon hearing of theſe remonſtrances entered into an aſſociation to compel the legates to propoſe the articles concerning reformation of princes; on account of which diſturbances the pope ordered the ſeſſion to be prorogued till the 11th of November, and in the mean time ſent for the cardinal of Lorrain to Rome, to conſult with him about diſſolving the g council. During the abſence of the cardinal, one of the biſhops, in a general congregation, held on the 22d of September, having deſired the articles concerning the reformation to be propoſed, one of the French ambaſſadors immediately roſe up, and, after declaiming a long while againſt the corruptions of the Roman court, proteſted againſt the proceedings of the fathers, and a few days after retired to Venice.

The decrees of the council are ridiculed by the proteſtants.

THE prelates at Trent, however, continued their congregations, and drew up ſeveral articles of reformation; and the pope being greatly offended with the behaviour of the French ambaſſadors, who he believed were privately prompted by the queen of Navarre and her party, he cited her to appear within ſixty days at Rome, to clear herſelf from the ſuſpicion of hereſy, and other crimes, of which ſhe was accuſed. The cardinal of Lorrain, who had entered into a great intimacy with the pope, remonſtrated but faintly againſt this ſummons; but the French ambaſſador at Rome exerting himſelf in behalf of the queen, a ſtop was put to all judicial proceedings againſt her, only the pope refuſed to abſolve her from the ſentence of excommunication, which gave her no manner of uneaſineſs. Mean while the cardinal of Lorrain having returned to Trent, the eighth ſeſſion was celebrated on the 11th of November, at which one of the legates refuſed to be preſent, as he could not give his conſent to the nullity of clandeſtine marriages, and affirmed that the church had no authority to diſſolve them. The decree declaring marriage a divine inſtitution, indiſſoluble, and one of the ſacraments of the goſpel, was unanimouſly confirmed; but the cardinals Moron and Simoneta, and fifty-ſix fathers, diſſented from that article, by which the church was declared to have a power of diſſolving clandeſtine marriages. Twenty-one heads of a general reformation were then read, tending chiefly to eſtabliſh the pope's authority over the clergy; plurality of benefices was condemned, grants of reſervation were aboliſhed, and the right to benefices acquired by ſimony was declared null and void.

ALL nations now, except the Spaniards, earneſtly deſired a concluſion of the council. They, however, at length conſented, on condition that the pope ſhould regulate the matters which ſhould be left undecided by the council, and that, in the decree concerning indulgences, they ſhould not be ordered to be given gratis, which would injure the cruſade in Spain. As news arrived at Trent that the pope was dangerouſly ill, the points concerning purgatory, the invocation and relics of ſaints, images, and indulgences, were hurried over ſuperficially, and publiſhed in the ninth ſeſſion on the 3d and 4th of December; in which likewiſe twenty-two heads of reformation were read concerning regulars and nuns; after which twenty-one articles were publiſhed concerning a general reformation. The fathers alſo concluded the decree for the reformation of princes, under a general exhortation to them to protect the eccleſiaſtical liberty, and declared that the pope had full authority to diſpenſe with any of the canons made by the council. On the ſecond day of the ſeſſion a decree was read concerning indulgences and faſts; but as the index of books, the catechiſm, the breviary, and the miſſal, were not yet finiſhed, it was determined to ſubmit what was already written to the judgment and authority of the pope. All the decrees of the ſeſſions under Paul and Julius being then read, the council was ſolemnly diſſolved, the fathers deſiring the legates to aſk the confirmation of the pope to their proceedings; three prelates, however, declaring that there was no need for that confirmation. The day after the fathers ſubſcribed the decrees; namely, four legates, two other cardinals, three patriarchs, twenty-five archbiſhops, one hundred and ſixty-eight biſhops, ſeven abbots, thirty-nine proxies, and ſeven generals of orders, in all two hundred and fifty-five, very few of whom were from Hungary and Poland, none from Sweden, Denmark, Scotland, England, or the Low Countries; not one from Germany in the laſt ſeſſion, and not above forty from Spain and France; but there were more than one hundred and fifty from Italy, on which account the council was called the aſſembly of the pope and his Italians.

A. D. 1564.

A FEW months before the concluſion of the council, the pope received an embaſſy from Maximilian, king of the Romans, informing him of his election, and offering, not obedience, but devotion and reverence, to the pope and the apoſtolic ſee. Pius refuſed for a long time to give the ambaſſador an audience; but, after ſeveral meſſages betwixt Rome and Germany, finding Maximilian inflexible, he admitted his ambaſſador to a public conſiſtory; in which, though he ſtill adhered to his inſtructions, the cardinals nevertheleſs gave the uſual anſwer, that his holineſs received the obedience of the king, and confirmed his election [n]. Soon after he had given audience to this ambaſſador, he was informed of the diſſolution of the council, at which he expreſſed great joy, promoting nineteen of thoſe who had ſerved him at Trent to the dignity of cardinals; and though he received ſeveral petitions from the miniſters of his court, complaining that their offices were aboliſhed by the decrees of the council, and aſking an equivalent for the money with which they had purchaſed them, he nevertheleſs, without regarding theſe petitions, publiſhed a bull on the 24th of January, confirming all the decrees of the council, and ordering them to be obſerved by all the faithful. By ſeveral other bulls, he ordered the biſhops to reſide in their dioceſes, under pain of forfeiting their revenues to the apoſtolic chamber; he prohibited any from reading the books contained in the Index Expurgatoria; and enjoined all thoſe, who poſſeſſed any ec-

Objections are made to the proceedings of the council of Trent.

THO' the council of Trent was received without much difficulty at Rome and in Italy, yet many objections were raiſed againſt its decrees in Germany, France, Spain, and Poland. Several treatiſes were publiſhed againſt it by the proteſtants; and about the middle of February the emperor wrote to the pope, deſiring, in his own name, and in the name of his ſon-in-law the duke of Bavaria, that the communion might be granted to the catholics in their dominions under both kinds, and that the clergy might be allowed to marry [p] (B). Philip II. king of Spain publiſhed the decrees of the council in his dominions, without regarding the authority of the pope; but in France its decrees concerning reformation were generally con-
b demned, as derogatory to the liberties of the Gallican church; on which account the pope, being greatly apprehenſive leſt the young king Charles intended to renounce the communion of the Roman church, prevailed with the emperor, the king of the Romans, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, to ſollicit him conjunctly to acknowlege the council, to revoke the privileges and pardon granted to the Hugonots, and to abſtain from any alienation of the eccleſiaſtical revenues. In the mean time he decided the diſpute betwixt the French and Spaniards concerning precedency in favour of the French; and being informed that the great numbers of Greek refugees in Naples and Sicily, who for many years had enjoyed the free exerciſe of their own religion, began to deviate from their ancient faith, and to infect thoſe of the Latin church with heretical opinions, he revoked all their privileges, and ſub-
c jected them to the ordinances of the Roman church [q]. About the ſame time he was alarmed with the diſcovery of a conſpiracy againſt himſelf; ſeveral enthuſiaſts, under pretence of a revelation from heaven, having formed a deſign to murder him, in order to facilitate a general reformation, which they ſaid would be accompliſhed by his ſucceſſor, who was to convert the whole world to Chriſtianity. The conſpirators, being apprehended, were all put A. D. 1565.
to death by torture [r]. Soon after the diſcovery of this plot, Pius received a letter from the emperor Maximilian, who in the month of July had ſucceeded his father Ferdinand, intreating him to allow the marriage of prieſts: though the emperor likewiſe ſent a memorial, juſtifying the neceſſity of his requeſt, he could nevertheleſs obtain nothing from the pope, who thought he condeſcended ſufficiently in permitting the laity to communicate under both d kinds. While the cardinals were conſidering the memorial of the emperor, Pius, being informed that the Turks had invaded the iſland of Malta with a fleet and army conſiſting of 80,000 men, publiſhed a jubilee for imploring the mercy of God, ordered money, gunpowder, and troops, to be ſent to the aſſiſtance of the beſieged; who likewiſe receiving ſome ſuccours from Sicily and Spain, obliged the infidels to raiſe the ſiege, which had laſted four months. Pius did not long ſurvive the news of the defeat of the Turks; but on the 10th of December, died of a ſurfeit, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and the ſixth of his pontificate, having adorned the city of Rome with ſeveral magnificent buildings, and repaired ſome ancient monuments and aqueducts; to ſupply the expences of which works he oppreſſed his ſubjects with ſevere taxes [s].

Pius V. is elected pope. A. D. 1566.

e UPON the death of Pius, the cardinal of Alexandria was unanimouſly elected pope on the 8th of January, by the intereſt of the two leading cardinals Farneſe and Boromeo, which laſt adviſed him to aſſume the name of Pius V (C). As he had been a great favourite with Paul IV. and had acted with ſaverity as inquiſitor, his election was not very agreeable to the Romans; however, as his ſeverity was not mixed with pride, ambition, and worldly conſiderations, their apprehenſions of his tyranny ſoon abated. Upon his promotion he ordered his relations to retire from Rome; but, at the intreaties of his friends, he created Michael Bonello, one of his nephews, a cardinal. Being earneſt to promote a reformation, he publiſhed ſeveral regulations concerning the clergy and the officers of his court, he aboliſhed ſome public diverſions, and baniſhed the greateſt part of the whores from Rome, prohibiting the reſt from appearing f abroad except in a certain corner of the city. In remembrance of the favours conferred on

He publiſhes ſeveral decrees for promoting a reformation.

(B) The catholics in Germany and Poland at this time expreſſed ſo great a deſire of communicating under both kinds, that they publiſhed a great many ſatirical verſes againſt their prieſts, whom they called the thieves of the cup; and they wrote thoſe words of our Saviour, Drink ye all of it, in gold letters, upon their books, doors, and cups (2).

(C) Pius V. who, before his promotion, was called Anthony, or Michael, Ghiſler, was born of mean parents at Boſchi, a town near Alexandria della Puglia. He was received into the order of Dominicans or Jacobins at fourteen years of age; and having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his regular life and eloquent preaching, he was recommended by cardinal Caraffa to Julius III who appointed him commiſſary of the inquiſition. Upon the promotion of Caraffa to the papal chair, he was created at firſt biſhop of Nepi and Sutri, and afterwards cardinal and ſupreme inquiſitor; which laſt office no other cardinal ever enjoyed, the popes reſerving it ever afterwards to themſelves (3).

HEARING that the emperor had convoked a diet at Augsburg, he ordered cardinal Commendon, who was returning from his legation in Poland, to act as his legate at that aſſembly; and as Maximilian had appeared to favour the Lutherans, by being preſent at their ſermons, he charged Commendon to threaten him with depoſition if he allowed any point of religion to be treated of in the diet. The legate, however, having more prudence than the pope, concealed theſe inſtructions, which indeed he had no occaſion to produce; for the grand ſignor making great preparations to invade Hungary, and beſiege Vienna, the attention of the diet was chiefly engaged in providing for the defence of the empire againſt the infidels. Commendon was ſo ſucceſsful as to prevail with the catholics to accept of the decrees of the council of Trent, and at the concluſion of the diet preſented the emperor with 50,000 crowns as a ſubſidy from the pope againſt the Turks [u]. Pius about the ſame time hearing of the violent proceedings of the Calviniſts in Scotland, ſome of whom had murdered David Rizio in the queen's preſence, he wrote to the popiſh princes to ſend her aſſiſtance, ordered a nuncio to repair to Scotland to reſide in that kingdom, and beſides granted her a ſubſidy of 20,000 crowns [w]. He likewiſe granted his benediction to certain ſmall images, which were then begun to be worn by the catholics in the Low Countries, to diſtinguiſh them from the proteſtants, beſtowing indulgences upon thoſe who wore them and recited certain prayers [x] (D). b c

He gives a ſubſidy to the queen of Scotland.

A. D. 1568. As the king of Spain the following year ſent the duke of Alva into Flanders with an army of 10,000 men, who impriſoned ſeveral chiefs of the late tumults, and the year after put the counts of Egmont and Horn, with many other nobles, to death at Bruſſels, executed and baniſhed great numbers of the people, and obliged the prince of Orange to withdraw with his army into Germany, the pope ordered ſupplications to be performed at Rome, on account of his ſucceſs againſt the heretics, and ſoon after ſent him a conſecrated cap and ſword; which preſent was received by the duke with the greateſt ceremony and reſpect [y]. The pope likewiſe ſent an army of 4500 foot and 900 horſe into France, to aſſiſt king Charles againſt the Hugonots, giving him leave at the ſame time to alienate the church lands to the amount of 50,000, or, according to ſome, 150,000 crowns of yearly value. In the mean time, being informed that the emperor intended to grant the free exerciſe of the proteſtant religion to the nobles and people in Auſtria, Pius again ſent cardinal Commendon as his legate to him, to prevent any ſuch conceſſion, and to threaten the emperor with depoſition, if he ſhould do ſo great an injury to the catholic religion. Before the arrival of Commendon, the permiſſion had been granted by the emperor, who juſtified his conduct to the legate; but ſoon after, upon the remonſtrances of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, he promiſed to revoke his grant, being deſirous to live in good terms with Spain, the ſucceſſion of which kingdom he hoped would fall to him or his children, as his couſin Philip had no iſſue [z]. d e

He ſends troops to France againſt the Hogonots, and

ABOUT the ſame time the pope had ſome diſputes with the king of Spain and the republic of Venice, in conſequence of a bull which he had publiſhed at Eaſter, prohibiting all eccleſiaſtics to pay any taxes to temporal princes, threatening thoſe ſovereigns with excommunication who ſhould compel the clergy to pay any ſubſidies. The Venetians made great complaints againſt this bull, and Philip prohibited it from being publiſhed in his dominions. After ſeveral months diſputes, pretending to have received ſatisfaction from the pope, he gave general orders that the rights of the church ſhould be preſerved in his dominions; but his officers, however, neglecting to put his orders in execution, Pius, with great difficulty, was reſtrained from excommunicating them.

A. D. 1569. As he was then propoſing to form a league againſt the Turks, he was perſuaded not to exaſperate the king of Spain, whoſe aſſiſtance he likewiſe deſired againſt Elizabeth queen of England, who at this time had a rupture with Philip. Pius ſeized that opportunity of endeavouring to dethrone Elizabeth, and to reſtore the catholic religion in England. For that purpoſe he ſent over ſeveral emiſſaries to that kingdom, who formed a pious conſpiracy f a againſt the queen, according to Gabutius [a], and excited the papiſts to raiſe a rebellion; which, however, was quickly quelled. In the mean time the French ambaſſador informed him of a conſiderable victory gained over the Hugonots, and preſented him with twelve of their ſtandards which had been taken in the action, which the pope received with great ceremony, and placed over the gate of St. Peter's [b]. He was no leſs ſevere againſt the Jews than the proteſtants, and ordered them to depart within three months from all the territories of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, exeepting Rome and Ancona. He likewiſe publiſhed a ſevere bull againſt thoſe who ſhould offend or injure the office of the inquiſition, or any perſons belonging to that court [c]. At the ſame time a difference happening betwixt him and the duke of Ferrara about the freedom of navigation upon the Po, and the duties on ſalt, he favoured his rival the duke of Florence, who at his deſire had ſent 1000 foot and 200 horſe into b France, and at his requeſt he created him and his ſucceſſors Great Dukes of Tuſcany, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the imperial and Spaniſh ambaſſadors, who proteſted that ſuch a title was derogatory to the rights of their maſters in that province [d]. The following year the pope, finding that his plots againſt the queen of England had been unſucceſsful, he reſolved to throw off the maſk, and in the end of February publiſhed a bull againſt her, in which he declared her excommunicated and depoſed from her throne, threatening likewiſe all thoſe who obeyed her laws and orders with excommunication. He had the mortification, however, to find his anathema deſpiſed, not only by Elizabeth, but even by the catholic princes, who ſtill acknowledged her as queen, and allowed their ſubjects to continue their commerce in her kingdom (E).

c As the Turks at this time had fitted out a formidable fleet to ſeize the iſland of Cyprus, then in poſſeſſion of the Venetians, this armament engaged his attention, and prevented him from purſuing his deſigns againſt Elizabeth. He promiſed the Venetians all the aſſiſtance in his power, and by his legates and nuncios not only preſſed the emperor, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, Poland, and France, but alſo the ſophi of Perſia, to engage in a league againſt the Turks. The kings of France, Poland, and Portugal, excuſed themſelves from engaging in the war, as did alſo the ſophi of Perſia and the emperor, which laſt pleaded in his excuſe, that he had lately concluded a truce with the grand ſignor. The king of Spain did not ſeem averſe to the league, and at the intreaty of the nuncio, ſent 50 gallies to join the Venetian fleet, while the treaty was negociating. Pius, at the d ſame time fitted out twelve gallies at Ancona, the command of which he gave to Antonio Colonna, who, about the month of Auguſt, joined Zanius and Doria, the Venetian and Spaniſh admirals, at Crete. The Turks, however, before the junction of the allied fleet, had landed their forces on Cyprus, and beſieged the capital city of the iſland, Nicoſia, which they took by ſtorm after a ſiege of forty-five days. Upon the news of the taking of Nicoſia, Doria returned to Spain, Zanius to Corcyra, and Colonna, bringing back only three gallies to Ancona, went from thence on foot to Rome, where he was received with great honours by the pope, who during this unſucceſsful expedition, had ſent a commander with ſome forces to Avignon, to defend that city againſt the French Hugonots [e].

The ſucceſs of the Turks in Cyprus rendered the pope more urgent to conclude the e league; accordingly, at his preſſing intreaties, the king of Spain at length ſent deputies to Rome; where, on the 16th of May, an alliance was concluded betwixt Philip, the pope, and the Venetians, by which they engaged to fit out yearly againſt the Turks a fleet of 200 gallies and 100 hundred ſhips of burden, on board of which ſhould be an army of 50,000 foot and 4500 horſe, to aſſemble every year in March or April at Otranto: the pope ſhould bear one-ſixth of the whole expence, and ſhould furniſh twelve gallies, 3000 foot, and 270 horſe. The chief command was conferred on Don John of Auſtria, the king of Spain's natural brother, and Mark Antonio Colonna was appointed his lieutenant; and an honourable place was reſerved in the treaty for the emperor, and the kings of France and Portugal, who were all three again ſollicited by the pope, but nevertheleſs ſtill declined en- f gaging in the alliance [f]. To enable the king of Spain and the Venetians to bear their part of the expences, Pius confirmed the grant of his predeceſſor to Philip, for raiſing ſuch a tax upon the eccleſiaſtical revenues as ſhould ſupport 100 gallies for the defence of the

DURING theſe tranſactions, the Venetian republic had made private overtures of peace to the grand vizir at Conſtantinople, againſt whoſe advice the war had been commenced. However, their preliminaries were rejected, and the Turks, having prepared a new armament againſt Cyprus, in the month of April landed a great many troops and military ſtores at Famagoſta, the only city of any conſequence in the iſland, which had been inveſted the year before. After a moſt vigorous defence, the city was at length obliged to ſurrender, the allied fleet, upon account of the delay of the Spaniards, not being able to give it any aſſiſtance. Don John at laſt arriving with the Spaniſh fleet at Meſſina on the 21ſt of Auguſt, it was reſolved to engage the infidels; and the whole fleet having received plenary indulgences from the pope, and each ſhip being provided with prieſts, who animated the men to engage, they ſailed in queſt of the enemy with 209 gallies, twelve of which belonged to the pope, eighty-one to the king of Spain, one hundred and eight to the Venetians, two to the duke of Savoy, three to the Gonoeſe, and three to the knights of Malta. There were beſides ſix large galleaſſes, twenty-four ſhips of burthen, and about ſeventy ſmaller veſſels, which armament altogether was conſiderably ſuperior to that of the Turks. On the 5th of October the two fleets came to a general engagement in the gulph of Lepanto; when, after a fight of four hours, the Turks were totally defeated, 150 of their gallies being taken, and many others being burnt and ſunk; beſides 25,000, or, according to ſome, 30,000 of their men, with ſeveral of their generals, were killed, 3,500 were taken priſoners, and 15,000 Chriſtians, who were ſlaves on board the Turkiſh fleet, recovered their liberty, the allies having loſt only 7,600 men, the greateſt part of whom were Venetians. b c

The Turks conquer Cyprus.

Their fleet is intirely defeated by that of the Chriſtians.

UPON the news of this memorable victory, the pope immediately ordered public thankſgivings to be celebrated, and appoieted the day of action to be commemorated annually by a divine ſervice in honour of the virgin Mary, and maſs to be ſaid on the octave of that feaſt for the ſouls of thoſe Chriſtians who were killed in the engagement [g]. Antonio Colonna, upon his return, entered Rome in triumph, where he was received with great pomp and ceremony by the pope, who again ſollicited the emperor, and the kings of France and Portugal, to enter into the alliance, and wrote to the kings of Ethiopia and Perſia, exhorting them to attack the Turks. His intreaties, however, had no effect on the Chriſtian princes, neither did the king of Perſia think it ſafe to venture a rupture with the Turks; alleging, that it was of no conſequence to have taken a few ſkiffs, while the woods were left, from whence the enemy might make others. The pope, not diſcouraged by the backwardneſs of others, made great preparations againſt the infidels, and, in the beginning of the following year, ſettled ſome diſputes with his allies, and made ſome alterations in the league; but in the month of March, being ſeized with a ſuppreſſion of urine, he languiſhed for ſome weeks, and died on the firſt of May, in the 68th year of his age. He was greatly lamented by the Romans; but his death gave great joy to the Turks, who, upon receiving the news, had public rejoicings for three days [h]. He founded ſeveral public ſchools and colleges, built ſome churches and religious houſes, was careful to promote only learned and virtuous men to dignities, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bounty to the poor, and by the great ſtrictneſs and purity of his life; on which account he was afterwards canonized by Urban VIII [i]. d e

PIUS, before his death having recommended to the cardinals to chuſe a ſucceſſor as ſoon as poſſible, they entered the conclave on the 11th of May, to the number of fifty-two, and next day unanimouſly choſe Hugh Buoncompagno, cardinal of St. Sixtus, who aſſumed the name of Gregory XIII. and was crowned a few days after on the feaſt of Whitſuntide (F). Being deſirous to proſecute the war againſt the Turks, Gregory immediately after his election, had ſeveral conferences with the Spaniſh and Venetian ambaſſadors about continuing the league, and ſent ſeveral nuncios to the different Chriſtian princes to exhort them to enter into a general alliance againſt the infidels. He likewiſe ſent a nuncio to John of Auſtria at Meſſina, urging him to proceed with the united fleet to the iſland of Corcyra; but the Spaniſh admiral, in conſequence of orders from Philip, refuſing to quit Sicily, the papal and Venetian admirals ſailed to Corcyra about the middle of July to oppoſe the Turks, who again appeared f

Having ſpent ſeveral years in the ſtudy of the civil law, he received the degree of doctor at twenty-eight years of age, after which he taught that ſcience in his native city eight years; and then, repairing to Rome, he quickly obtained ſome preferments in that capital. The king of Spain pretended to be apprehenſive of an invaſion from France; but his apprehenſions being ſoon after removed, he ſent orders to Don John to act in concert with the allies; but, before his arrival, much time was ſpent, and, after he joined their fleet, no plan of conduct was unanimouſly agreed to; ſo that the whole ſeaſon paſſed off without any remarkable action, and the fleets ſeparated in the beginning of October, having omitted to take the advantage of ſeveral favourable opportunities of diſtreſſing the enemy.

During theſe tranſactions at ſea, the pope, having been informed of the maſſacre of the proteſtants at Paris, gave public thanks at Rome for the preſervation of the king from their
b conſpiracy, as Charles IX. in excuſe for his barbarity, alleged, that the admiral Coligni, with ſeveral other Hugonots, had formed a deſign of murdering him, and all the catholic princes of the royal family. Tho' the truth of this excuſe was univerſally queſtioned, yet the pope publiſhed a jubilee over all Chriſtendom, in conſideration of the great blow given to the heretics, and likewiſe on account of the ſucceſs of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands, and the ſignal victory gained the year before over the Turks; and he walked in proceſſion on foot to the church of St. Lewis at Rome, where divine ſervice was performed, with great pomp by the cardinal of Lorrain. He likewiſe made great preparations againſt the infidels for the enſuing ſeaſon; but, in the beginning of the following year, he was greatly alarmed with the news that the Venetians, by the mediation of the French ambaſſador at Con- c ſtantinople, had concluded a ſeparate peace with the Turks. He refuſed audience to the Venetian envoy, who came to Rome, to excuſe the conduct of the republic; however, ſoon afterwards, being convinced by one of the ſenators who arrived at Rome, that the Venetians had been compelled by neceſſity to ſue for peace, he declared himſelf ſatisfied with their proceeding, which was approved of by the king of Spain without any difficulty.

In the mean time Henry de Valois, brother to the king of France, having been elected king of Poland, he ſent a nuncio to Paris, to congratulate him upon his election, and to preſent him with a golden roſe. He ſent alſo another nuncio to Poland; who, upon the king's arrival there the following year, prevented him from confirming to the proteſtants what had been promiſed to them in his name. The proteſtants in that kingdom, however, d were ſoon after freed from their apprehenſions from Henry; who, ſucceeding to the crown of France by the death of his brother, left Poland in a few months. Gregory in the mean time publiſhed a bull on Aſcenſion-day, and another on the fourth Sunday of Advent, appointing a jubilee to be celebrated the following year at Rome; which feſtival accordingly commenced on Chriſtmas-eve, when the pope, with his golden mallet, opened the holy gate of the Vatican church, where there were ſaid to be no leſs than 300,000 pilgrims waiting for the ceremony [k]. During the whole holy year there were always upwards of 100,000 foreigners at Rome; which, by the care of the pope, abounded with all ſorts of proviſions. Gregory, as an indulgence to the Engliſh catholics, on the 30th of March, publiſhed a bull, allowing them all the benefits of the jubilee in their own kingdom; in the mean while he
e viſited the churches in Rome ſeveral times with great devotion, and, according to cuſtom, aſcended the holy ladder on his knees.

During the celebration of this feſtival at Rome, the pope intereſted himſelf for the ſafety of Genoa, which ſtate was threatened with ruin, both from a foreign enemy and from its own inteſtine diviſions. As the ancient nobility in that republic had, for ſeveral years, oppoſed the election of the new nobles and the commons to the offices of the ſtate, theſe two laſt parties, after long diſputes, had recourſe to arms, to deliver themſelves from oppreſſion, and to aſſert their privileges; which contention encouraged Don John of Auſtria to form a deſign of invading the republic. Gregory ordered Don John to lay aſide his enterprize; and prevailing on the Genoeſe to accept of his mediation, together with that of the emperor, and f the king of Spain, after ſeveral months negociations the differences were compoſed in an amicable manner, and all the three parties were declared to have an equal right to enjoy any office in the adminiſtration of the republic [l].

He compoſes the diſſentions in Genoa. A. D. 1576.

While the arbitrators were negociating this accommodation, which was concluded in the month of March, a great plague deſolated the northern parts of Italy; particularly the cities of Trent, Verona, Venice, and Milan; in which laſt city cardinal Boromeo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his humanity and charity, as he continually ſpent his time in viſiting the infected, and diſpoſed of all the furniture of his palace, even to his own bed, to ſupport the wants of the poor [m]. His example was imitated by the biſhop of Verona; and, as an alleviation of the affliction, the pope ſent his indulgences to the infected cities, granting the received the communion and extreme unction. Soon after, at the requeſt of the French king, and to defray the expences of the wars againſt the Hugonots, he granted a bull for the alienation of the church lands in France, to the amount of 50,000 crowns of yearly revenue; and as the emperor Maximilian, who had been elected king of Poland by a party in that kingdom, died in the month of October, he received the obedience, and confirmed the election of Stephen Batori, the other competitor for that crown. a

THE following year he erected a college at Rome for the education of the children of Greeks in the ſciences, and in divinity; and likewiſe founded another for the new converts from Judaiſm. being intreated by the ſtates of Flanders to act as mediator betwixt them and the king of Spain, he immediately ſent a nuncio to be preſent at the congreſs, which was held the following year at Cologn. At the ſame time he likewiſe ordered his nuncio in Portugal to accompany king Sebaſtian in his expedition to Africa, where that unfortunate prince, with the nuncio, and a great part of his army were cut off by the Moors. The year following Gregory confirmed the new order of the knights of the Holy Ghoſt, eſtabliſhed by the king of France; but refuſed to allow any of the church lands to be alienated for their ſupport. He ordered a treatiſe of Scholarius againſt the errors of the Greeks, to be printed, and ſent into Greece; he reſtored the order of the monks of St. Baſil; ſent ſeveral Franciſcan miſſionaries to the Eaſt Indies; and granted aſſiſtance to the king of Ceylon, who had been expelled his c kingdom for having embraced the Chriſtian religion [n]. MEAN while cardinal Henry, who had ſucceeded his nephew Sebaſtian on the throne of Portugal, dying, and the royal line becoming extinct in that kingdom, many competitors appeared, who claimed the ſucceſſion, among whom was Philip king of Spain, who, in order to make good his pretenſions, fitted out a formidable fleet, and ſent the duke of Alva into Portugal, with an army of 30,000 men. Tho' Philip's claim was acknowleged to be juſt, yet the greateſt part of the Portugueſe from their hatred of the Caſtilians, refuſed to ſubmit to him; and, having ſent to Rome to implore the protection of the pope, Gre- e gory immediately ſent cardinal Riario, as his nuncio, to Portugal, to act as mediator between the two parties, and to perſuade Philip to lay down his arms. The king of Spain, however, rejected the mediation of the nuncio; and having defeated his rival Don Antonio, who had been crowned by the oppoſite faction, took poſſeſſion of Liſbon, where he was acknowledged as king of Portugal, and received the homage of the nobles. During theſe tranſactions in Portugal, the pope had a diſpute with the republic of Venice, which refuſed to admit thoſe who had been nominated by his holineſs to viſit the churches in their territories. After ſeveral months diſputes, the difference was at laſt accommodated, the pope conſenting to nominate only one Venetian prelate for the viſitation, and prohibiting him to examine the nunneries, and thoſe benefices which were under the protection of laymen [o]. f

He mediates a peace betwixt Muſcovy and Poland. A. D. 1581.

THE following year, having received an embaſſy from the great duke of Muſcovy, deſiring his mediation betwixt him and the king of Poland, he ſent Antonio Poſſevini, a Jeſuit, as his nuncio, to Ruſſia, who concluded a peace betwixt the two princes in the month of December; after which he ſollicited the Ruſſian duke to acknowlege the authority of the Roman ſee, and in three public diſputes impugned the rites and ceremonies of the Greek church. Though his arguments in behalf of the church of Rome had no influence on the Ruſſians, yet the duke, at his requeſt, ſent a ſecond ambaſſador to Rome to return thanks to the pope, who in the mean time had received a complaint and appeal from the grand maſter of Malta, who had been depoſed and impriſoned by the knights of that order. Gregory greatly reſented this inſolence of the knights, and immediately ſent a legate to Malta,

Though he was again reſtored to his dignity, and his rival obliged to aſk his pardon, yet both he and his rival died a few weeks after; by which means an end was put at that time to the factions among the knights [p].

GREGORY about the ſame time having received a treatiſe from one Antonio Lilly, for the reformation of the calendar, which was then very erroneous, ſent copies of the book to be examined by the celebrated univerſities of Europe; and having received their approbation of the plan, he ſent for the moſt eminent mathematicians from all parts to Rome, by whoſe advice he compoſed a new cycle of epochs for the perpetual regulation of Eaſter. By this re-
b formation of the calendar, he threw out ten days from the common reckoning of time, and brought down the vernal equinox to the ſame day of the month on which it was at the time of the council of Nice, and appointed the uſual biſſextiles to be obſerved, excepting only in the firſt year of a century; of which years he ordered every fourth only to be accounted biſſextile. This regulation, which was confirmed in the month of February by a bull, was allowed almoſt univerſally to be very proper; however, it was not univerſally received in Europe. The Greeks, and the proteſtants in Germany, Britain, Sweden, and Denmark, rejected it, that they might not ſeem in any thing to acknowlege the authority of the pope; however, it was admitted without oppoſition in Italy, Spain, France, and Poland; but tho' ſome proteſtants in Germany wrote in its defence, yet the princes and deputies of that proc feſſion, in the diet of Augsburg, oppoſed its reception, ſo that the emperor was obliged to defer the further conſideration of that affair, and to order the imperial chamber to obſerve the old calendar [q].

THE pope was not ſurpriſed at the oppoſition of the proteſtants to the new regulation of the year; but he was greatly alarmed to hear that the electoral archbiſhop of Cologn had embraced the proteſtant religion, and married a wife. As the chapter had wrote to Rome againſt him, complaining that he had not only renounced the catholic religion, but propoſed likewiſe to retain his dignity as elector, and endeavoured to introduce the proteſtant religion into his dominions, the pope wrote to him, exhorting him to renounce his error before it was too late. But the archbiſhop paying no regard to this exhortation, and endea-
d vouring to retain the poſſeſſion of his electorate by arms, Gregory, on the 1ſt of April, publiſhed a ſentence of excommunication and depoſition againſt him; and ordering the chapter of Cologn to proceed to the election of a ſucceſſor, the canons accordingly, on the 23d of May, choſe Erneſt, duke of Bavaria, at that time biſhop of Friſingen, Hidelſheim, and Liege.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Germany, one Parr, an Engliſh catholic, then in France, having informed the pope, that he intended to go over to England to do ſome ſignal ſervice to the Roman church, Gregory granted him his benediction, and wrote to him by the cardinal of Como, exhorting him to perſevere in his deſign. As Parr the following year was detected in a conſpiracy againſt the queen's life, by the papers that were then diſcovered, the pope was accuſed of having encouraged him in his deſign of aſſaſſination, though all the writings
e from Rome were only expreſſed in general terms [r]. Italy was at this time diſtreſſed with a ſevere famine, which, having continued a long time, prevailed to ſuch a degree at Rome, that, at laſt, a man could hardly ſupport himſelf with bread for a crown a day. The grievouſneſs of this calamity was owing chiefly to the avarice and rapacity of the pope's relations, who, inſtead of diſtributing the corn in the magazines to the people, ſold it in the country at an extravagant price. They likewiſe bought up all that was in private hands; and prohibiting any others to ſell corn beſides themſelves, they harraſſed the poor people by the moſt violent extortion.

He is ſuſpected of having encouraged the aſſaſſination of queen Elizabeth. A. D. 1584.

THIS general diſtreſs greatly increaſed the number of the banditti, who were before very numerous all over the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and ſome of them even had the confidence to enter
f Rome, preſuming upon the lenity, or rather the weakneſs of the pope. As they had rendered themſelves very formidable, Gregory at laſt reſolved to exert himſelf againſt them, and gave orders to the provoſt marſhal of Rome, to make diligent ſearch after thoſe who were lurking in the city. This officer being informed that one of the chiefs of the robbers had taken ſanctuary in the palace of Orſini, went with the archers, and brought him from thence; but, in his return, meeting with Orſini, Savello, and Ruſticucci, three nobles, who had been riding in the country, he was deſired by them, in an imperious manner, to diſmiſs his priſoner, and reproved for violating the ſanctuary of the palace. As he refuſed to comply with their demands, one of the nobles ſtruck him with his whip; which blow he reſented, by ordering the archers to fire at the nobles, one of whom was inſtantly killed, and the other two mortally wounded. This ſcuffle occaſioned a general tumult through the city, all the nobles eſpouſing the cauſe of Orſini; and many of the people, who were their dependents, aſſembling in a riotous manner, and murdering all the Sbirri, or archers, whom they could find. Gregory, not being able to ſuppreſs their violence, diſſembled his reſentment for ſome days; but, having apprehended ſome of the chiefs of the ſedition, he ordered them to be executed; and to calm and appeaſe the people, he cauſed the provoſt marſhal to be put to death [s]. a

To take off the attention of the city from the late diſorder, he ſoon after made a promotion of nineteen cardinals, the greateſt part of whom were diſtinguiſhed for their virtues and abilities. About the ſame time he founded a college at Rome for the Maronites of Mount Libanus (G); and, being deſirous to form a new alliance againſt the Turks, he ſent a legate to the king of Perſia, and another to the king of Ethiopia, to exhort them to declare war againſt the grand ſignor [t]. He likewiſe publiſhed a bull, ordaining a ſermon to be preached weekly to the Jews, in all places where they had a ſynagogue; and ordered at leaſt the third part of them, above twelve years of age, to attend, if no lawful impediment prevented them [u]. Soon after he was earneſtly ſollicited by the duke of Guiſe, and thoſe catholics in France who had formed the holy league, to excommunicate the king of Navarre and the prince of Conde; but he refuſed to grant their requeſt, being perſuaded, that the league was chiefly formed, not to defend the catholic religion, but to advance the duke of Guiſe to the ſucceſſion of the throne. b

MEAN while he received an embaſſy from three kings in Japan, who ſome years before had been converted to the Chriſtian religion by Francis Xavier and other Jeſuits. The two ambaſſadors, with their retinue, and other two nobles that accompanied them, after a voyage of two years, arrived in Spain; where they were received with great reſpect by Philip, who conducted them to Leghorn, from whence they went to Florence, where they were entertained with great magnificence by the grand duke. Upon their arrival at Rome, Gregory deſired all the cardinals and foreign ambaſſadors to wait upon him in form, and granted them an audience, and received their obedience, in a public conſiſtory, when he could not refrain from expreſſing his joy by his tears [w]. After the audience he admitted them to the honour of lifting up the hem of his garment, appointed the Jeſuits convent for their reſidence, ordered them to be clothed after the Italian manner, and granted them a large allowance for their expences (H). A few days after, being ſeized with a quinzy, he died on the 10th of April, on the ſecond day of his illneſs, and the 84th year of his age. He had enjoyed a very ſtrong conſtitution, which he had improved by temperance and exerciſe; his countenance was chearful and pleaſing, and he was greatly beloved by the Romans on account of the lenity of his government, not conſidering that the weakneſs of his adminiſtration gave encouragement to all manner of vices and irregularities. The greateſt crimes were committed during his pontificate with impunity, and a general corruption of manners overſpread the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate; however, upon his death, the diſorders increaſed during the vacancy of the ſee, at which time the Romans generally commit great tumults and riots, as the laws are then ſilent through all the papal territories, and the new pope always begins his government with a general pardon to all criminals. At this vacancy all manner of reſtraint was thrown off: the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate was one ſcene of debauchery and barbarity; and, at Rome, aſſaſſinations, murders, and rapes, were committed by all degrees of people, clergy as well as laity. The palaces of five cardinals were robbed; and that of Farneſe, where there were above thirty ſervants and guards, was plundered, not ſecretly, or in a private manner, but publicly, and in the middle of the day. c

The friar, after he had found his road again, deſired him ſeveral times to return; but the boy refuſing to leave him, he at length aſked him if he would take upon him the habit of his order, which he deſcribed as very auſtere; to which the boy replied, "That he would wil"lingly ſuffer the pains of purgatory, if he would make him a ſcholar." He was accordingly received, with the conſent of his parents, into the convent of Franciſcans at Aſcoli, where he quickly made a ſurpriſing progreſs in learning. In his thirteenth year he aſſumed the c habit of that order, but he retained his own name Felix or Felice. He ſoon after diſtinguiſhed himſelf at ſeveral public diſputations, and acquired a conſiderable reputation as an elegant preacher; but at the ſame time he raiſed himſelf a great many enemies by his fiery impetuous diſpoſition, as he reſented the leaſt injury with great animoſity and vehemence, which he frequently provoked by his own inſolence and diſdainful behaviour. He early diſcovered a great ambition; and though he was envied and hated by his brother monks, yet, by his abilities, he acquired the favour and eſteem of cardinal Carpi, whoſe protection was of great ſervice to him againſt his numerous enemies. By the intereſt of this cardinal he obtained ſeveral ſmall promotions; and having likewiſe ingratiated himſelf with father Ghiſlieri, afterwards Pius V. and with the Colonna family at Rome, he obtained the office of ind quiſitor-general at Venice, where, by his inſolent and over-bearing behaviour, he ſo greatly offended the ſenate, that, upon the death of Paul IV. he was obliged to conſult his ſafety by flight. However, upon the election of Pius II. he returned to that city, and again ſacrificed his own repoſe to trouble and diſturb that of others: but at laſt, being apprehenſive of the reſentment of the ſenate, he provided a gondola, by which he made his eſcape in the middle of the night, after he had ordered an inſolent monitory to be hung upon the door of St Mark's church. Upon his return to Rome he was made conſultor of the inquiſition, and ſoon after went with the legate a latere, Buron Campagnon, as his chaplain to Spain. While he was in that kingdom, his friend Ghiſilieri being choſen pope, he created him general of his order, afterwards biſhop of St. Agatha, and at laſt a cardinal; and, to enable him to ſup-

Upon his promotion to the ſacred college, which happened in the 49th year of his age, he quite altered his former manner of life; and to conceal his aſpiring views, he affected a total diſregard of all worldly purſuits, and became humble, meek, patient, and affable; which maſk of hypocriſy he wore with great perſeverance for fifteen years. He led a very retired and private life, exerciſed himſelf in works of piety, ſpent much of his time in the confeſſional chairs, ſeldom appeared at the conſiſtories, and, during the three laſt years of the pontificate of Gregory, affected to be very infirm and ſickly; ſo that he was often ſaluted in a manner that would not have been very agreeable to any body elſe, "God help you,

f "poor old man; you have almoſt run your race".

His behaviour upon his election to the pontificate.

The cardinals, out of contempt, uſed to call him The Aſs of la Marca; ſo that their aſtoniſhment was inexpreſſible when he threw off the diſguiſe. While they were crowding towards him in the conclave, to congratulate him, he ſat coughing and weeping, as if ſome great misfortune had befallen him; but he no ſooner perceived, upon the ſcrutiny, that there was a ſufficient number of votes to ſecure his election, than he threw his ſtaff, with which he uſed to ſupport himſelf, into the middle of the chapel, ſtretched himſelf up, and appeared taller, by almoſt a foot, than he had done for ſeveral years before. This behaviour alarming the cardinal Dean, he called out, "Stay a little, ſoftly, there is a miſtake in
"the ſcrutiny: but Montalto, with a ſtern look, boldly anſwered, "There is no miſtake;"

g and immediately begun himſelf the Te Deum laudamus, in ſuch a ſtrong and audible voice, that the whole conclave was at firſt ſtruck dumb; but at length accompanied him in a tame and ſpiritleſs manner. After the hymn, the maſter of the ceremonies aſked him, according to the form, "Whether he was pleaſed to accept of the papacy?" To which he a replied, ſomewhat ſharply, "It is trifling and impertinent to aſk whether I will accept of "what I have already accepted. However, to ſatisfy any ſcruple that may ariſe, I tell you "that I accept it with great pleaſure, and would accept another, if I could get it; for I find "myſelf ſtrong enough, by the divine aſſiſtance, to manage two papacies." While the cardinals were putting on his pontifical robes, he ſtretched out his arms with great vigour and activity; upon which one of them ſaid to him, in a familiar way, "I perceive, holy father,

"the pontificate is a ſovereign medicine, ſince it can reſtore youth and health to old ſick
"cardinals:" to which he replied, in a grave and majeſtic manner, "So I find it." After cardinal Farneſe had performed the ceremony of the adoration, he ſaid to him, "Your ho-
"lineſs ſeems a quite different ſort of a man from what you was a few hours ago." "Yes, b
"(ſaid he) I was then looking for the keys of paradiſe, which obliged me to ſtoop a little;
"but now I have found them, it is time to look upwards, as I am arrived at the ſummit of "all human glory, and can climb no higher in this world." In his paſſage from the conclave to St. Peter's, the people, who at firſt would not believe that he was the ſame perſon with the old decrepit cardinal Montalto, cried out, Long live the pope; and added, according to cuſtom, Plenty, holy father, plenty and juſtice! To which he replied, "Pray to God for plenty, and I "will give you juſtice."

His rigid adminiſtration of juſtice.

HAVING now attained to the height of his ambition, he laid aſide that appearance of humility he had ſo long worn, and behaved with great ſtate and reſerve. He received the foreign ambaſſadors in a complaiſant manner, and was particularly kind to thoſe from Japan, c to whom he gave ſeveral rich preſents; and having created them knights of St. Peter and St. Paul, diſmiſſed them a few months afterwards with his benediction. Upon the news of his election, many criminals and banditti voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves, not making the leaſt doubt of a pardon from the general character of Montalto's lenity. But never were any more fatally diſappointed; for having haughtily rejected the interceſſion of the ambaſſadors, cardinals, and nobles, in their behalf, he gave orders to the governor of Rome to confine them more ſtrictly, and to execute four of them on the day of his coronation. He likewiſe publiſhed regulations to be obſerved on that day: and having ordered the governor to provide twelve executioners of different nations, he commanded them ſome days before to parade through the ſtreets, with an ax in one hand and a halter in the other; which appearance d ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Romans, that during the proceſſion of the coronation there was not the leaſt diſturbance or riot; whereas formerly, during that ceremony, rapes, murders, and a thouſand enormities, were uſually committed.

He promotes his relations;

SOON after the coronation he ſent for his only ſiſter Camilla, with her daughter and two grandſons, and a niece, the daughter of his deceaſed brother, who, upon their approach to Rome, were met by three cardinals, who dreſſed them in magnificent habits, and conducted them to the Vatican. But Sixtus diſdaining, in ſuch a trifling manner, to be obliged to the cardinals, pretended not to know his ſiſter, till ſhe had reſumed her former dreſs; then he received her kindly, and declared, that nobody ſhould make a princeſs of her but himſelf. He aſſigned her a conſiderable revenue, and gave her one of his palaces for her reſidence; at e the ſame time adviſing her to content herſelf with that ſober modeſty which became the meanneſs of her birth, and the gravity of thoſe who were related to the papal chair: he likewiſe conferred the dignity of a cardinal on the eldeſt of her grandſons, Alexander Peretti, who was then about eighteen years of age, and afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning and abilities. The king of Spain and the grand duke of Tuſcany offered to confer titles of honour on his ſiſter, which he refuſed; however, he expreſſed his ſatisfaction with the behaviour of the Venetians, who ordered public rejoicings upon his exaltation, and admitted the family of Peretti to the honour of nobility in their ſtate, being afraid of his reſentment for their treatment of him when he was inquiſitor at Venice.

compels the poor to work, and

BEING ſhocked with the great numbers of poor at Rome, who were periſhing for want, he f gave an authority to four perſons, of great prudence and experience, to ſummon before them all thoſe who had no viſible way of getting a livelihood, and to compel them to work, or to baniſh them from the city. He likewiſe prohibited foreigners from ſettling at Rome, unleſs they brought a certificate that they were able, by ſome trade or profeſſion, to maintain a family; and none were allowed to marry without a previous examination of their circumſtances.

He gave great encouragement to trade and manufactures; and, to check the inſolence of the nobility, he commanded all the merchants and tradeſmen to bring him in a liſt of their debts, with the names of the people that owed them, which he paid off, and became general creditor himſelf. This order occaſioned ſuch a general alarm, that many paid their debts the ſame day it was publiſhed, and begged of their merchants to give them ſuch g receipts as though they had been paid long before. At the ſame time he deprived the cardinals and nobles of thoſe privileges and immunities, by which they ſheltered debtors and criminals from the law, and continually urged the governor of Rome to make examples of a juſtice, chiding him for his remiſſneſs, and declaring, that he would rather have the gibbets and gallies full than priſons.

He extirpates the banditti, and

In order intirely to extirpate the banditti, who ſtill continued in great bodies in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, their numbers having been increaſed by many, who, from the rigorous proceedings of Sixtus, deſpaired of pardon, and fled from juſtice, he publiſhed an edict againſt them, offering all thoſe a free pardon who ſhould ſurrender within three months, and excluding them from mercy after that term, promiſing a pardon, and a reward of 500 crowns, to any of them who ſhould betray his fellow; and prohibiting all perſons whatever, not excepting nobles and eccleſiaſtics, from correſponding with them, or concealing them, under the penalty of death upon the wheel or gallows. Having appointed three ſevere judges, b with a body of 500 ſoldiers to put this order in execution, in leſs than ſix months all the banditti were either taken or diſappeared.

obliges the confeſſors to inform him of the crimes of their penitents.

He likewiſe ordered the ſyndics, or mayors, of every town and lordſhip, as well thoſe that were actually in office, as thoſe who had enjoyed that dignity for the laſt ten years, to ſend him a liſt of all the vagrants, common debauchees, looſe and diſorderly people, in their diſtricts, threatening them with the ſtrapado if they omitted or concealed any one; which puniſhment the ſyndic of Albano actually underwent, for omitting the name of his nephew. And in order to ſuppreſs all manner of vice, he not only puniſhed ſeveral people, upon the information which he had received from themſelves at their confeſſions, when he was cardinal, but likewiſe obliged other confeſſors to acquaint him with any thing extraordinary that was com-
c municated to them; and, to inſpect the conduct of the magiſtrates, he diſperſed a great many ſpies through the city and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to whom he allowed conſiderable penſions, which were punctually paid.

He employed alſo a great many others at all foreign courts, by which means he had intelligence of the ſecret deſigns of other ſtates, particularly of the king of Spain having formed a deſign to ſeize Naples, one of the dependencies of that crown, which was ſuſpected by his behaviour to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, a few weeks after his promotion; for when the horſe, with 7000 crowns, was preſented to him on the feaſt of St. Peter, as a tribute for Naples, he ridiculed his predeceſſors, who had exchanged a kingdom for a beaſt, and added, that he would ſoon put an end to that ſimple cuſtom; which words being tranſmitted to d Philip, he gave orders to the duke of Oſſuna, viceroy of Naples, to ſtrengthen the garriſons upon the frontiers, and to do his utmoſt to penetrate into the deſigns of the pope. About the ſame time Sixtus had a rupture with the king of France, who had ſent orders to the new nuncio, who was then on his journey to France, to ſtop at Lyons, as he had wrote to Rome, deſiring that the old nuncio might not be recalled. This proceeding of the king greatly inflamed the pope, who immediately ordered the French ambaſſador to leave Rome within three days. However, ſoon after, by the interceſſion of ſeveral cardinals, the difference was compromiſed, the king agreeing to accept of the new nuncio, and his ambaſſador returning to his reſidence at the court of Rome.

Whether this rupture had alienated him from the king of France, is uncertain; but e about two months after, he declared his approbation of the catholic league made by the Guiſe faction, who, under pretence of defending the old religion, had formed an aſſociation againſt the king and Henry of Navarre, the preſumptive heir of the crown. He wrote with his own hand to the duke of Guiſe, and, comparing him to Judas Maccabeus, promiſed him all the aſſiſtance in his power: and, in the end of September, he publiſhed a bull of excommunication againſt Henry king of Navarre, and the prince of Conde, and all their adherents, pronouncing them heretics, and, as ſuch, declaring their eſtates and poſſeſſions forfeited, and both them and their dependents incapable of ſucceeding to any ſovereignty, eſpecially to the crown of France. The pope, upon the publication of this bull, wrote to the emperor Adolphus, deſiring him to prevent any aſſiſtance going from Germany to the French Hugonots, and f to prohibit all foreign levies, under the pain of the ban of the empire.

He excommunicates the king of Navarre, who appeals to a general council.

The king of Navarre in the mean time, being rouſed by the pope's proceedings from a life of pleaſure, anſwered the manifeſto of the league, and by means of his friends at Rome ſtuck up his proteſt, with that of the prince of Conde, in every ſtreet, upon all the cardinals doors, and even upon the gates of the Vatican, accuſing Sixtus of being a falſe and malicious liar, and appealing from him to a free council, where they would prove that he himſelf was a heretic; and that, if he did not appear, they would account him antichriſt, and declare perpetual war againſt him. Sixtus was greatly enraged at this appeal, and at ſeveral paſquinades that were then publiſhed; but could not, by all his ſpies, diſcover thoſe who had fixed them up. After his fury was ſomewhat ſubſided, he ſpoke of the king of Na-
g varre in terms of reſpect, and admired his courage and greatneſs of mind, who, at that diſtance, had taken ſo proper and bold a method to ſhew his reſentment. From that time he refuſed to contribute any money to the war that was carrying on againſt him; and he was afterwards frequently heard to ſay, that there were but two princes in the world, meaning Henry of Navarre and Elizabeth of England, whoſe friendſhip and correſpondence he would court and deſire, if they were not both infected with the guilt of hereſy [x]. According to Gregorio Leti, he about this time, gave ſome ſecret encouragement to queen Elizabeth to take the ſtates of Holland under her protection, from his deſire of repreſſing the overgrown power of the Spaniards. a

HAVING now rendered himſelf reſpected abroad, and terrible to his own ſubjects, who trembled at the mention of his name, he began to open his bowels, and yield to the dictates of gratitude and generoſity. Before his promotion to the pontificate, he had noted down in a diary the moſt remarkable tranſactions of his life, and the names of his benefactors and and enemies; and as he now had an opportunity of ſhewing his gratitude to thoſe who formerly obliged him, he with great humour and kindneſs rewarded his former benefactors, many of whom had entirely forgot the ſervices they had done him (I). Towards the end of the year likewiſe, he made a promotion of eight cardinals, all men of extraordinary merit, and moſt of them perſons of high birth: but though the Jeſuits uſed great art to inſinuate themſelves into his favour, he always refuſed patronizing them as his predeceſſor had done, but uſed them upon many occaſions as his ſpies. b

He adorns Rome with many new ſtructures. A. D. 1586.

ROME, and the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate, being now rendered ſecure and peaceable by the extirpation of the banditti, and ſtrict adminiſtration of juſtice, Sixtus applied his mind to the embelliſhing of the city with magnificent buildings, by which means he gave employment to great numbers of the poor. By the aſſiſtance of the celebrated architect Dominic Fontana, born at Como, he erected a famous obeliſk, that had been brought from Thebais in Egypt to Rome, and dedicated to the emperor Auguſtus, and Tiberius his adopted ſon. This obeliſk was overturned by Totila, king of the Goths, and had long lain neglected behind the veſtry of St. Peter's church. It conſiſts of one piece of marble of ſeventy-two feet in length, and the difficulty of removing it had been hitherto accounted ſo great, that ſeveral popes, who had deſigned to have erected it, deſiſted, after ſome weak efforts, from that undertaking: but Sixtus reſolved to ſurmount every obſtacle; and at length accompliſhed the arduous enterprize by the ingenuity of Fontana, who invented an amazing machine for that purpoſe, and employed a great number of people more than twelve months. Beſides the elevating of this obeliſk, which was dedicated to the holy croſs, Sixtus, during his whole pontificate, employed ſeveral thouſands of people in great and magnificent works. He erected ſeveral other obelisks; built a chapel, which he dedicated to the holy manger, and adorned with the fineſt marble; brought water to his palace on Monte Cavallo, by an aqueduct twenty-two miles in length; founded a large hoſpital, capable of containing 2000 people; repaired, or rather rebuilt, the bridge of Sixtus IV. over the Tyber, and erected a fine palace, for the uſe of the popes, near the Lateran church. He alſo built ſeveral new ſtreets, one of which was two miles long, and called after his own name, Strada Felice: he enlarged the Vatican palace; from whence he made a grand ſtair-caſe to St. Peter's church, the dome or cupola of which he completed: he founded a college in the convent of the holy apoſtles, and another at Bologna: he likewiſe intended to have built a city at the village of le Grotte, c d e

(I) Of the many ſtories that are related of this pope, with regard to the behaviour to his former benefactor, we ſhall add the following. When in his youth he reſided at Macerata, he went one day to a ſhoemaker's ſhop to buy a pair of ſhoes. After ſome diſpute about the price, the ſhoemaker told him, he would take no leſs than ſeven julios, or three ſhillings and ſix-pence. Montalto offered him ſix julios, which was all the money he had, and ſaid, "Perhaps I ſhall be able to give you the ſeventh "ſome time or other." "Some time or other (replied "the ſhoemaker); but when will that be? when you "come to be pope?" "Yes, (ſaid Montalto), that I will "with all my heart, and pay you intereſt for your mo-"ney too." "Well then (anſwered the ſhoemaker) ſince "I ſee you are not without hopes of being pope, you "ſhall even have them upon thoſe terms." Montalto having asked him his name, and noted the tranſaction in his diary, after his promotion ſent to Macerata, to know if the ſhoemaker was ſtill alive; and being informed that he was, ordered the governor of that place to ſend him up directly to Rome, guarded by one of his officers. The poor ſhoemaker was ſurpriſed and affrighted with the news that the pope deſired to ſee him; and having entirely forgot the tranſaction with the young friar, which had happened forty years before, he recalled to his mind all the ſins that he had committed in his life, conſidering for which of them he could be cited to appear before his holineſs. Upon his arrival at Rome, Sixtus asked him, if he had ever ſeen him at Macerata. The ſhoemaker trembling, told him, No. Sixtus again asked him, if he ever remembered to have ſold a pair of ſhoes to a young friar, and to have given him credit for a julio; but he proteſting that he knew nothing at all of the matter, Sixtus related to him the agreement they had formerly made, and ordered his ſteward to pay him the julio, with the intereſt for forty years, which amounted to two julios more. The ſhoemaker went away very much diſſatisfied, loudly complaining to every one he met, that the pope had put him to the expence of forty crowns, to come from Macerata to Rome to receive three julios. Sixtus being informed of his behaviour by his ſpies, ordered him to return, and demanded of him if he had a ſon. The ſhoemaker anſwering yes, and that he was an honeſt good prieſt of the order of Servi, the pope ſent for him to Rome, and before the departure of his father, conferred upon him a biſhopric in the kingdom of Naples (1).

a where he was born; but the ſituation of the place being incommodious, he was not able to accompliſh this deſign; however, he granted ſeveral privileges to the Borgo di Montalto in the neighbourhood of le Grotte, and afterwards erected that new city into a biſhop's ſee. Beſides, he regulated his militia, enrolling all his ſubjects that were able to bear arms, and appointing officers in every city to diſcipline and exerciſe them. In order to favour his deſigns againſt the kingdom of Naples, he fortified ſeveral towns on his frontier towards that kingdom, and laid a tax upon all the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to defray the expence of building a fleet.

He reſtores the authority of the apoſtolic ſee in Switzerland.

DURING theſe tranſactions, Sixtus, at the requeſt of the popiſh cantons of Switzerland, ſent a nuncio into that country, who reſtored the authority of the holy ſee, which was alb moſt extinguiſhed among them. He likewiſe publiſhed a bull, condemning the practice of judicial aſtrology; and ſome months afterwards, by another, he aſcertained the qualifications neceſſary for thoſe that ſhould be received into the ſacred college, and limited the number of cardinals to ſeventy. However, the regulations of this bull were too ſtrict to be obſerved, and were almoſt all annulled by his ſucceſſors. At the repeated ſollicitations of the French king, he granted him a bull for the alienation of the church revenues in France, to the amount of 50,000 crowns a year [y]. As he was very intent upon aggrandizing the holy ſee, and thought it below the dignity of apoſtolic nuncios to live in hired houſes, he intended about this time to purchaſe a palace for their reſidence, ſuitable to their rank, at each different court of Europe. The ſenate of Venice, upon hearing of his intention, imme-
c diately made a preſent of a palace to his nuncio in their city; which act of generoſity was ſo agreeable to the pope, that he returned thanks in perſon to their ambaſſador at Rome, and preſented the ſenate with a noble palace in the city, for the perpetual reſidence of their ambaſſador. However, he refuſed the ſame offer from other ſtates, as he foreſaw that it would be attended with very great inconveniences: and being informed of the death of the king of Poland, he ſent a nuncio into that kingdom, to take care that no prejudice ſhould be done to the catholic religion at the future election.

The Romans erect a ſtatue to him. A. D. 1587.

MEAN while the Romans, out of gratitude to the pope, who had reſtored tranquility and plenty to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, ordered a ſtatue to be erected to him in the capitol. Howd ever, his patriot ſchemes did not prevent ſeveral paſquins and ſatires from appearing againſt him, the authors of which he ſometimes puniſhed in a ſevere manner, and at other times deſpiſed. This year he ordered a general chapter of the Franciſcan order to be held at Rome, the whole expence of which he defrayed himſelf. He condeſcended to honour one of their meetings with his preſence, and after the chapter broke up, he deſired them all to attend at the Vatican, as he intended to grant every one of them ſome favour. This declaration occaſioned great diſcontent and murmurings among the other orders; but, in the end, turned out to the mortification and confuſion of the Franciſcans. After Sixtus had heard all their requeſts, ſome of which were ridiculous and extravagant, he diſmiſſed them all with an abſolute refuſal, alleging, that their deſires had all been ſelfiſh, and inconſiſtent with their vows. However, he granted the petition of a poor lay-brother, which was of a public nae ture; and, at his requeſt, ordered an elegant fountain to be erected in the convent of the holy apoſtles, which was in great want of water.

He erects ſeveral congregations of cardinals:

FOR facilitating the adminiſtration of affairs, Sixtus, about this time, eſtabliſhed fifteen congregations of cardinals, ſome of which had been inſtituted by other popes, but were now altered and new modelled by him (K). In the mean time, being informed that Erneſt, the new elector of Cologn, on account of the oppoſition of the proteſtants, was thinking of reſigning his archbiſhopric, and retiring to Bavaria, he ſent the biſhop of Verceil to diſſuade him from that deſign, and wrote to thoſe princes, who had formerly engaged as his auxiliaries, ſtill to continue their aſſiſtance. He likewiſe wrote to the duke of Parma to aſſiſt the elector, and ſent the abbot Grimani, his chamberlain, with the preſent of a conſecrated hat and ſword for the duke, who received them in the midſt of his camp with great ceremony, after he had taken the cities of Grave, Venlo, and Nuits [z] (L). About the ſame time alſo he ſent a conſecrated ſword to the duke of Guiſe, the head of the league in France; and as the grand duke of Tuſcany died at Florence without heirs, he allowed cardinal de Medicis, who ſucceeded him, to reſign his hat, obliging him for that indulgence, to make rich preſents to the church of St. John de Lateran [a]. His nuncio in Poland informing him, that the archduke Maximilian had been elected king by a party in that kingdom, he immediately ſent him 22,000 ducats, to aſſiſt him againſt his competitor the prince of Sweden, who was choſen by another faction. At the earneſt ſollicitation of the Spaniards, he excommunicated queen Elizabeth of England, who, in the begnning of the year, had put to death the queen of Scotland; which inhuman proceeding was looked upon with horror and deteſtation, both by proteſtants and papiſts. The queen in return excommunicated the pope, and all his adherents, and made great preparations to oppoſe the intended invaſion of the Spaniards [b].

He excommunicates Elizabeth queen of England, and A. D. 1588.

As Sixtus was very earneſt to ſee the formidable power of the Spaniards weakened by a war with England, he wrote to Philip with his own hands, exciting him to that enterprize, promiſing to bear part of the expence, and to advance a million of crowns as ſoon as he ſhould be certainly informed that his forces had landed in England. At the recommendation of Philip, to whom he gave the inveſtiture of England, he made William Allen a cardinal; and to encourage the Spaniards, he ſent, for the uſe of the Armada, ſeveral large cheſts full of agnis Dei, medals, crucifixes, relics, pardons, and indulgences, with which the men, eſpecially the officers, were ſo loaded and incumbered, that they looked more like pilgrims than ſoldiers. The Spaniards preſſed him earneſtly to grant 500,000 crowns before the ſailing of the fleet, but he abſolutely refuſed their requeſt; and, upon being informed of the loſs of the Armada, to prevent the king from making any demands upon him, he wrote a conſolatory letter to him, in which he found great fault with the conduct of all his officers, attributing the unſucceſsful iſſue of the expedition entirely to them. Philip, upon receiving his letter, diſcovered no emotion, and two days after returned an anſwer to the nuncio, declaring, that the misfortune of his fleet ought to be eſteemed a loſs common to them both, and that for the future he would leave him to fight the battles of the church himſelf.

gives the inveſtiture of the kingdom to Philip of Spain.

During theſe tranſactions Sixtus had iſſued a bull for the abolition of quarters or the privileges claimed by ambaſſadors, cardinals, nobles, or prelates, of protecting banditti and malefactors in their houſes, declaring thoſe who ſhould any way obſtruct the courſe of juſtice, ipſo facto, excommunicated, and not to be abſolved by any but the pope himſelf, except in the article of death. He likewiſe received an ambaſſador from the king of Perſia with great pomp and magnificence; and to give him a high idea of the grandeur of the Roman court, he ordered all the cardinals and prelates at Rome to be preſent at his firſt audience. The ambaſſador came to deſire the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian princes againſt the Turks; but as Philip of Spain was then exhauſting the ſtrength and riches of his own kingdom in his war with England and the ſtates of Holland, and in ſupporting the catholic league in France, and Sixtus was chiefly intent upon accumulating treaſure for his deſign againſt Naples, the Chriſtian powers diſcovered no inclination to embark in a cruſade, and the ambaſſador was diſmiſſed with many compliments and a few preſents, after he had continued about a month at Rome.

He receives an embaſſy from Perſia:

The ambaſſador of the duke of Savoy, who came to demand the pope's aſſiſtance againſt the city of Geneva, was equally unſucceſsful; for Sixtus conſidering that the undertaking would be attended with many difficulties, as the Swiſs were intereſted in the preſervation of that city, refuſed any aſſiſtance to the duke, and declared that the treaſure of the church ought only to be employed in defending itſelf, or enlarging its own territories. At the earneſt ſollicitation of the king of Spain, the pope, about this time, conſented to canonize Diego, or Didacus, of Alcala, to obliterate, in ſome meaſure, by the ſplendor of that ceremony, the diſgrace of his unſucceſsful expedition againſt England. He likewiſe inſtituted the feſtivals of the preſentation of the Virgin, and that of St. Francis, the founder of the Franciſcan order, and canonized St. Anthony of Padua, and St. Januarius of Naples [c]. Being attentive alſo to every opportunity of extending the influence and power of the holy ſee, he ſent cardinal Aldobrandino, as his legate à latere, to Poland, upon hearing of the impriſonment of the archduke Maximilian, who had been defeated by his competitor Sigiſmond, prince of Sweden. Aldobrandino arrived in Poland about the end of June; and after a long and difficult negociation, at length, in the beginning of the following year, concluded a peace betwixt the Poles and the a house of Austria, by which Maximilian renounced all right to that crown, and acknowleged Sigismond as king [d].

During his absence Sixtus completed the famous Vatican library, and filled it with a great number of manuscripts in the Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Latin, and most other languages, which he had collected, with immense labour and expence, from all parts of the world. He likewise wrote to the duke of Guise, commending his zeal for the catholic religion, and informing him, that he intended to send the bishop of Brescia, whom he had created a cardinal, as his legate à latere to France, to assist him with his authority and advice. Although the pope, from the beginning of his pontificate, had given great countenance to the catholic league in France, and had given the duke of Guise several marks of his favour and esteem, he ex-
b pressed, however, very little concern upon the news of his murder, which was brought to Rome on the 5th of January, by an express from Morosini, his legate at the French court. He A. D. 1589.
rather seemed to approve of it; and in a conversation with cardinal Joyeuse, a Frenchman, after some reflections upon the duke's unbounded ambition, and insolent behaviour, towards the king, he said, "We should have done the same, if we had been in Henry's place."

He expresses great resentment at the murder of cardinal Guise;

But a few days after, being informed that the cardinal of Guise, the duke's brother, had likewise been put to death without a trial, and that the cardinal of Bourbon, and the archbishop of Lyons were imprisoned, he sent for the French ambassador, and one Girolamo Gondi, whom the king had sent to Rome to excuse his proceeding; and, after bestowing many harsh names upon them, he upbraided the king of France in the severest terms. Next day he called c a consistory, in which he exclaimed with great violence against the king, his rage or his grief obliging him to make several pauses in his speech [e]. He likewise reprimanded several cardinals who had ventured to excuse the murder, and appointed a congregation of several members of the sacred college to deliberate upon the state of France. Tho' he expressed great resentment against the king, he nevertheless gave but a very cold reception to the deputies of the Parisians, who a few weeks after arrived at Rome, requested an absolution from their oath of allegiance, and that he would grant a plenary indulgence to all those who should take arms against their prince, as seventy of the reverend members of the Sorbonne had declared that he had forfeited the throne. Each party, for several months, used their utmost endeavours to procure the friendship of the pope; but Henry absolutely refusing to set the d cardinal of Bourbon and the archbishop of Lyons at liberty, Sixtus on the 24th of May published a monitory against him, threatening him with excommunication if he did not set the cardinal and archbishop at liberty before the 3d of June, and give information thereof within thirty days after to the apostolic see: besides, he cited the king, and all those concerned in the murder of the two Guises, to appear personally, or by proxy, within sixty days at Rome. Upon the publication of this decree or monitory, the cardinal Joyeuse retired to Venice, and the French ambassadors left Rome, and embarked at Leghorn for Marseilles. As intercessions had no effect upon the pope, the republic of Venice and the dukes of Tuscany and Mantua pressed the king of France to seize the county of Avignon, and to threaten to march an army to Rome; but he was prevented from following their advice by death, being assassinated on but praises the murder of the king.

SIXTUS, upon being informed of the murder, made a premeditated speech in the consistory in praise of the assassin, whom he extolled above Eleazer and Judith; and as he affirmed that the king had died in mortal sin, by refusing obedience to his monitory, he ordered that no prayers should be made for his soul. However, he paid but little regard to the deputies of the league; and, notwithstanding their sollicitations, he refused to publish a crusade against the king of Navarre, who had been declared king of France by the other party. At first indeed, being deceived by their representations, he ordered cardinal Cajetan, whom he had appointed as his legate in France, to favour the election of cardinal Bourbon; but before his departure, having received a letter from the duke of Luxemburgh, acquaint-f ing him that the king of Navarre had been declared king of France by the greatest part of the nobility, and that he had appointed him as his ambassador at Rome, he wrote to those nobles who were in the king of Navarre's camp, exhorting them to continue steadily in the catholic faith, and declaring that he was indifferent who was their king, provided he was but a catholic. He likewise wrote to the duke of Luxemburgh, desiring him to come to Rome; and gave new instructions to cardinal Cajetan, ordering him to favour the election of a catholic king, without specifying any person; which proceeding greatly facilitated the establishment of the king of Navarre, or Henry IV. upon the throne of France.

He publishes an edition of the Bible in the vulgar tongue, which gives offence to the Roman catholics.

Tho' the king of Spain was greatly disobliged by this behaviour of the pope, yet another g affair happened about this time, at which he expressed much more dissatisfaction. Sixtus, during these transactions with France, had published an Italian version of the Bible from the vulgar Latin, which gave a general offence to all the Roman catholics. The most zealous of the cardinals wrote to Philip, intreating him to prevail with the pope to ſuppreſs a the edition; and ſeveral of them, with the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ventured to expoſtulate with Sixtus againſt the book; but he treated them with contempt, and only ſaid, "We do it for "the benefit of you that don't underſtand Latin." (M). The king of Spain, who was a great bigot, not being able to prevail with the pope to ſuppreſs the edition, and beſides being offended with him for neglecting to ſupport the catholic intereſt in England, and countenancing the king of Navarre and his party, reſolved to call a general council in his dominions, and to cite the pope to appear before it, if he ſhould oppoſe his deſign. He accordingly ordered Olivarez, his ambaſſador at Rome, to notify his reſolution to the pope in a public manner; but Sixtus being informed by his ſpies, that Olivarez intended to preſent a paper to him for that purpoſe, at a ſolemn cavalcade that he had appointed upon his b going to reſide at his new palace at St. John de Lateran, he ordered the governor of Rome immediately to precede his perſon at the proceſſion with the hangman and two hundred guards, and to ſeize any one that ſhould offer to preſent a paper to him, and to put him to death upon the ſpot. Olivarez hearing of this general order, was afraid to appear at the proceſſion; which difficulty, in the beginning of the oppoſition, influenced the king to drop his deſign of aſſembling a council, and to think of more moderate meaſures.

He confers honour and wealth on his relations.

SIXTUS, in the mean time, was not forgetful to aggrandize his own family by riches, honours, and noble alliances. He gave his nephew, cardinal Montalto, the value of 250,000 crowns in houſes, rich furniture, plate and jewels, beſides an income of 100,000 crowns a year in eſtate and eccleſiaſtical benefices. He gave the eldeſt of his nieces, Donna Orſina, c then ſeventeen years of age, to Mark Antony Colonna, prince of Sonnino, with a fortune of 126,000 crowns; and to enable him to pay his debts, he lent him 400,000 crowns out of the apoſtolic chamber for ten years, without intereſt. And the youngeſt of his nieces, Donna Flavia, he gave with the ſame fortune to Virginius Urſino, who had a yearly eſtate of 100,000 crowns, and whoſe family was ſuperior to any in Italy, except that of Colonna. Theſe marriages were celebrated with great pomp and magnificence, and the two young brides were both of a diſpoſition that would have done honour to the moſt exalted birth. For his other nephew, Michael Peretti, he purchaſed the principality of Venetro, the marquiſate of Lamentado, and the county and earldom of Celano. He gave him beſides an eſtate of 60,000 crowns a year, and two ſuperb palaces, one in the country, and another at Rome, and d contracted an alliance betwixt him and a princeſs of the Colonna family.

A. D. 1590.

In reſentment for the behaviour of Philip of Spain, he gave a very favourable reception to the duke of Luxemburgh, the ambaſſador of Henry IV. of France, who arrived at Rome in the beginning of January. At the ſame time he ſent his maſter of the ceremonies to count Olivarez, acquainting him that he did not intend to acknowlege him for the future as ambaſſador, and that he had ſent an expreſs to the king his maſter, to inform him of his intention. Philip, who was at this time greatly embarraſſed with the affairs of France and the Low Countries, diſſembled this affront, and recalling Olivarez, ſent the duke of Seſſa in his room; however, he ordered the Spaniſh clergy to preach up the great neceſſity of aſſiſting the league againſt king Henry, and even encouraged them to cenſure the pope's luke- e warmneſs in that cauſe. Olivarez, till the arrival of Seſſa, was allowed to act as ambaſſador, and, in his maſter's name, was very urgent with the pope to diſmiſs the duke of Luxemburgh, and to denounce a ſentence of excommunication againſt Henry IV. and all his followers. He likewiſe attended Seſſa when he required the pope, in his maſter's name, to declare himſelf protector of the league, and to enter into an alliance with Philip, for placing a catholic king upon the throne of France. Sixtus was greatly offended with the king of Spain, for offering to direct him whom to abſolve and whom to condemn; and that he might ſhun the propoſed alliance, he declared, that he intended to write to the nobles and cities in France to elect a catholic king, otherwiſe he himſelf would chuſe one [f]. (M) Some authors have affirmed, that Sixtus never publiſhed an edition of the Bible in Italian; but Gregorio Leti aſſures us, that there were in his time ſeveral copies of ſuch an edition to be ſeen in the library of the grand duke of Tuſcany, in that of St. Lawrence, and the Ambroſian at Milan, beſides two copies in the public library at Geneva, and ſeveral others; and that he himſelf had read in a manuſcript hiſtory of thoſe times, that the cardinal of Toledo, when he found that the pope abſolutely refuſed to ſuppreſs the edition, ſaid, "How has "God abandoned his church! may he be pleaſed ſoon "to deliver us from this wicked pope!" a ters, had encouraged his chaplains to preach againſt the king, and refuſed to conſult with thoſe cardinals who adhered to the king's party, he revoked the letters of exchange, which he had given him for 300,000 crowns upon the bankers of Lyons, and recalled the moſt turbulent of his chaplains to Rome.

ALTHOUGH his attention at this time was greatly engaged with the affairs of France, he was no leſs vigilant in the government of his own dominions; and as all Italy, and particularly the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, was afflicted this year with a ſevere famine, he excuſed the people their taxes, and lent them money, which however he did very ſparingly (N). By the advice of cardinal Aldobrandino he publiſhed a ſumptuary law, for repreſſing the great luxury and extravagance that prevailed at Rome, which law was immediately conformed to, and b was ſo ſtrictly obſerved during the few remaining months of his pontificate, that no one incurred the penalty for diſobedience. He limited the number of cardinals to ſeventy, and confirmed the decrees of Julius II. prohibiting to give the hat to two brothers, which prohibition he even extended to a more remote degree of conſanguinity. As he had undertaken to drain the fens and marſhes about Terracina, he went about this time to that city, under pretence of ſeeing the progreſs of the works, but with the intention, as it was ſuſpected, of invading the kingdom of Naples, as he had ordered a conſiderable body of troops to march to that frontier, to prevent, as he ſaid, the incurſions of the banditti. The Spaniards, alarmed at the motions of the pope, ſent 4000 troops towards the frontiers, under pretence of driving the banditti out of their dominions, but in reality to oppoſe the papal c forces; by which diſpoſition the pope was deterred from commencing hoſtilities, and returned ſuddenly to Rome, where he died on the 27th of Auguſt, in the 69th year of his age, and the 6th of his pontificate. As he was troubled ſome months before he died with an intenſe pain in the head, his death was attributed by many people to poiſon, which was ſuppoſed to have been given him by the Spaniards.

He threatens to invade Naples.

He dies at Rome.

HE advanced the power and grandeur of the holy ſee, during the few years that he reigned, more than all his predeceſſors put together, for almoſt 100 years before: and notwithſtanding the great works that he carried on and finiſhed, at his death he left 5,000,000 of crowns in his treaſury, which by a bull he prohibited from being uſed, except upon the moſt preſſing neceſſity. It is ſuppoſed, however, that he intended this treaſure as a fund
d for his expedition againſt Naples, which he delayed only in expectation of the death of Philip II. vainly hoping that he himſelf would have lived ten years longer. The money that he had amaſſed was chiefly raiſed upon his own ſubjects, who, during his pontificate, were heavily taxed; but as he had introduced a ſpirit of induſtry among them, they were not ſo oppreſſed with the taxes, as they had been by their former poverty and indigence. Beſides, he increaſed his fund by retrenching yearly penſions, to the amount of 600,000 crowns by ſelling the chief places and offices of his court, by the commutations for the puniſhment of crimes, and by the ſtricteſt perſonal frugality and œconomy. He was indefatigable in buſineſs, and took the management of the minuteſt affairs wholly into his own hands: he ſlept little, and had no ſtated time of going to bed. Tho' he was remarkably abſtemious while
e he was cardinal, yet, after his promotion, he made hearty meals, his ſpirits being exhauſted by his inceſſant labour, which he would not even intermit in his laſt illneſs, but followed ſtrictly the maxim of Veſpaſian, which he often repeated, That a prince ought to die ſtanding, that is, labouring to the very laſt moment of his life for the good of his country.

EIGHTEEN days after the death of Sixtus, cardinal Caſtagna was unanimouſly elected pope, and aſſumed the name of Urban VII. He enjoyed the pontificate only thirteen days, and died before his coronation, on the 27th of September. He had then entered the 70th year of his age, and was born at Rome, his father being a noble Genoeſe, and his mother a Roman, of the family of the Ricci. His piety and learning had rendered him illuſtrious; and as he had great experience, and had gone through all the degrees of the court, the pon-f tificate was aſſigned to him by the univerſal voice, even before the death of Sixtus [g].

So great a reformation had he wrought in the manners of the Romans, that the governor of the city told him one day, that the place of judge was now become a perfect ſine-cure; to which he anſwered, "If he thought the "people would relapſe into their former licentiouſneſs "after he was dead, he would hang them all whilſt he "was alive." UPON

UPON the death of Urban VII. the Roman ſee was vacant two months and nine days, occaſioned by the great factions in the conclave, where there were no leſs than fifty-four cardinals, ſixteen of whom were candidates for the pontificate. After ſeveral ſcrutinies, cardinal Montalto was prevailed upon to go over with his party to the Spaniſh faction, and by that means a legal majority was procured for Nicolas Sfondrati, cardinal of Cremona, who was elected on the 5th of December, and took the name of Gregory XIV. His father, after the death of his wife, had been created a cardinal, and he himſelf, after he had been for ſome time ſenator at Milan, embraced an eccleſiaſtic life, and was created biſhop of Cremona by Pius IV. under which title he remained three years at the council of Trent. Gregory XIII. created him a cardinal, in gratitude to whom he aſſumed the ſame name upon his promotion to the pontificate. He was crowned with the uſual ſolemnities, and began his pontificate with reſtoring thoſe Romans to their places and offices whom Sixtus V. had deprived. He likewiſe made a preſent of 1000 crowns to each of the cardinals, provided againſt the ſcarcity and dearneſs of corn and other proviſions, and in the firſt conſiſtory, which he held on the 19th of December, created one of his nephews a cardinal.

IN the beginning of the following year he publiſhed a jubilee, granting indulgences to all thoſe who ſhould offer up their prayers to God in his behalf; and, at the inſtigation of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, he declared for the catholic league in France, writing on the 20th of January to the biſhop of Placenza, whom cardinal Cajetan had left at Paris, and promiſing to furniſh the catholics with 15000 crowns a month out of the apoſtolic treaſury, as long as he ſhould ſee it neceſſary for their defence. The biſhop of Placenza cauſed this letter to be printed and diſperſed in France, with another from himſelf in praiſe of the pope's generoſity. The Spaniſh faction, however, were not yet ſatisfied; but being ſeconded by the cardinal of Lorrain and the duke of Maine's ſecretary, they preſſed the pope to ſend an army into France, and to grant a power to the duke of Maine to alienate the eccleſiaſtical benefices in that kingdom. Gregory by no means would conſent to this laſt requeſt; but being unexperienced in the management of great affairs, he agreed to their firſt demand, and ſent an army over the Alps, under the command of his nephew Hercules Sfondrati, whom he had created duke of Mont Marcian.

He declares for the league, A. D. 1591. c

IN the mean time he again wrote two letters to France, by which he declared Henry IV. excommunicated, and deprived of all his poſſeſſions, and threatened the nobles with eccleſiaſtical cenſures, if they did not deſert his cauſe, and alſo all the clergy with excommunication and depoſition, if they did not, within thirty days, declare againſt him. Theſe letters were approved by the parliament of Paris; but the other parliaments of the kingdom, particularly that of Chalons, which was a part of that of Paris, appealed from them to a future council, declared them derogatory to the rights of the kingdom, and to the liberties of the Gallican church, and ordered them to be burnt in the market-place by the common hangman. King Henry likewiſe publiſhed an edict, or declaration, againſt them; and the prelates of his party aſſembling at Chartres, publiſhed a letter, addreſſed to all the catholics, declaring them of no obligation, and that they intended ſoon to ſend an embaſſy to the pope, to inform him fully of the juſtice of their cauſe. They were prevented, however, from ſending this embaſſy by the death of the pope, who, having been afflicted during his whole pontificate with the ſtone, died on the 15th of October, in the 57th year of his age. During his tranſactions with the chiefs of the league, he had created ſeven cardinals, had indulged the cardinal friars with the privilege of wearing red hats, and had given the inveſtiture of the duchy of Ferrara to duke Alphonſus, who, as he had no iſſue, came to Rome to ſollicit the renewal of his fief in favour of ſome of his relations, but without any effect [h].

Innocent IX. is elected.

ON the 28th of October, thirteen days after the death of Gregory, John Anthony Faſchinetti, cardinal of Santi Quatro, was elected pope, with the unanimous conſent of the whole conclave, and aſſumed the name of Innocent IX. His parents were natives of Gravegni, a city of Navarre, but he was born at Bologna, where he was alſo educated. Coming afterwards to Rome, he paſſed through ſeveral degrees of preferment, and was at length created cardinal by Gregory XIII. at the ſame time with his two predeceſſors. Immediately after his election he renewed the antient cuſtom, and wrote to all patriarchs, archbiſhops, and primates, informing them of his promotion. He then applied himſelf to relieve the neceſſities of his ſubjects, by publiſhing a regulation of the prices of proviſions, and ordering the barons of Rome to bring their corn into the city. In the mean time he was ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he died on the 29th of December, in the 73d year of his age, having enjoyed the pontificate only two months. f

THERE never were greater diſputes at the election of a pope than at this preſent vacancy.

a long diſputes and intrigues, which are particularly related by Thuanus [i], Moncalto at length propoſed cardinal Aldobrandino, who he knew was not diſagreeable to the king of Spain. A majority immediately declared for him; and, on the 28th of January, he was elected pope, and aſſumed the name of Clement VIII. (O). Upon the news of his promotion, he appeared filled with great fear and confuſion, and let fall abundance of tears. He continued ſilent when the maſter of the ceremonies aſked him if he would accept of the pontifical dignity; and before he would ſit upon the throne, he fell down upon his knees, and prayed at the altar. Immediately after his coronation he publiſhed a bull, declaring his intention of viſiting all the churches, monaſteries, convents, and religious houſes, in Rome, exhorting all to an external and internal reformation before the viſitation, which was to commence on the 14th of

b June. As the banditti were again beginning to commit outrages in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, he ordered ſome troops to march againſt them; and ſoon after he publiſhed a bull againſt duelling, denouncing an anathema againſt all thoſe who ſhould give, receive, or carry, a challenge, and a ſentence of inderdiction againſt the places where duels ſhould be fought [k].

In the mean time, at the inſtigation of the Spaniſh faction, he eſpouſed the intereſts of the league in France, and on the 15th of April wrote to Sega, his legate at Paris, who had been created a cardinal by his predeceſſor, charging him to procure the election of a catholic king. His letter was publiſhed in the month of October at Paris, and regiſtered by the parliament of that city: however, the parliament at Chalons publiſhed an edict againſt it, and exhorted all the prelates, princes, peers, and others, to perſevere in their allegiance to c the king. The biſhops likewiſe of the king's party entered into ſeveral deliberations, derogatory to the authority of the pope, and ſent the cardinal de Gondy and the marquis of Piſani, as their deputies to Clement, to give him true information of the affairs of France. Piſani ſtopt at the lake de la Garde, in the Venetian territories, and the cardinal proceeded on his journey; but, in his paſſage through Tuſcany, he received a charge from the pope, forbidding him to enter the eccleſiaſtical territories, as he had not acted like a good Chriſtian, by openly favouring the king of Navarre, who was a relapſed heretic. Gondy, however, having excuſed his proceedings, was ſoon after permitted to continue his journey, on condition that he ſhould not, openly or ſecretly, favour heretics [l].

They, however, paid no regard to his letter; but publiſhed a declaration at Chartres, propoſing a conference with the chiefs of the league; which was accordingly agreed to, and held in the beginning of May, at a village within two leagues of Paris. Henry IV. to defeat the deſigns of his enemies, about this time was perſuaded to embrace the Roman catholic religion; and having ſolemnly renounced Calviniſm, and made a public profeſſion of the faith of the holy ſee, received abſolution and a benediction from the archbiſhop of Berry. By this converſion of the king, Philip of Spain, and the chiefs of the league, were greatly confounded; however, they ſtill hoped to prevent the ſucceſſion of Henry. A ſubject of Spain

e publiſhed a ſhort treatiſe at Rome, wherein he endeavoured to prove, that the apoſtolic ſee had no authority to diſpenſe with a relapſed heretic, with regard to the ſucceſſion of a kingdom; which treatiſe was anſwered by Arnold, afterwards cardinal Oſſat, who was then in Italy. The pope likewiſe ſent Anthony Poſſevini, a Jeſuit, who had formerly been legate in Ruſſia, to the Alps, to meet the duke of Nevers, the king's ambaſſador, and to inform him that he would not receive him in that character, as he had not yet acknowleged the king. Notwithſtanding this declaration, the duke ſtill continued his journey; however, he received a ſecond meſſage from the pope, ordering him to enter Rome as a private perſon, with a ſmall retinue, and limiting the time of his reſidence to ten days. Clement granted him two audiences in the end of November; but abſolutely refuſed to abſolve the king, or to grant him his bene-

f diction, declaring, that he would not believe his converſation real, unleſs he was aſſured of it by an angel from heaven. But that he might ſtill keep both parties in ſuſpence, by the advice of his legate in France, and the duke of Mayenne, he did not urge the departure of Nevers, though he ſwore in the conſiſtory, that he would never grant abſolution to Henry [m]. (O) Hippolito Aldobrandino was born at Fano, a city of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, on the coaſt of the Adriatic. He was deſcended of a very antient family, originally called Aldebrando, or Hildebrando, which had reſided at Florence near 1000 years, and had enjoyed the office of Gonfalonier of that city twenty-three different times. He received the firſt rudiments of his education at Rome, and ſtudied afterwards at Ferrara and Bologna, where he received his doctor's degree. He was diſtinguiſhed by his natural eloquence and the probity of his diſpoſition; and his brother John having been created a cardinal by Pius V. he ſucceeded him as auditor of the Rota. Sixtus V. created him a cardinal, and ſent him as his legate a latere to Poland, where, by his ſucceſsful negociation, he acquired a great reputation.

territories, except the cities of Rome, Ancona, and Avignon; and by another he prohibited any one from poſſeſſing or reading the Talmud, and ſeveral other Jewiſh books [n]. a

A. D. 1594. and diſmiſſed his ambaſſador.

In the beginning of the following year he admitted the duke of Nevers to another conference; but though he again demanded abſolution for the king, and whether it was lawful for catholics to be preſent with him at the celebration of maſs, or how they were to proceed in France with regard to the nomination to vacant biſhoprics, he could receive no ſatisfactory anſwer from him; on which account he ſoon after left Rome, and returned to France, cauſing a journal of his embaſſy to be printed at Venice; to which he added a ſpirited remonſtrance, complaining of the partiality of the pope, and the injuſtice of his legate; and proving, by many arguments and authorities, that the king had been legally abſolved.

Although Clement behaved with great rigour towards the French ambaſſador, he about the ſame time received two monks, who came as ambaſſadors from the patriarch of Alexandria, with great kindneſs and civility. In the beginning of his pontificate he had ſent a nuncio into Egypt, by whoſe perſuaſion the patriarch was prevailed upon to write to the pope, and to acknowlege him as the ſupreme head of all Chriſtians. The two monks who brought this letter, were treated with great magnificence, and, during their reſidence at Rome, were maintained at the pope's expence. In the beginning of the following year they made a public profeſſion of the faith of the church of Rome, rejecting the Neſtorian, Eutychian, and Dioſcoran hereſies, and ſent a copy of their confeſſion to Egypt; where it was confirmed and publiſhed by the patriarch. b

A. D. 1595. Many cities that held for the league are reconciled to Henry IV.

In the mean time, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the cardinal legate, Henry IV. was acknowleged as king by ſome of the chiefs of the league; and, being admitted into Paris, received the ſubmiſſion of ſeveral cities, formerly attached to the Guiſian faction: namely, Lyons, Orleans, Berry, Rouen, Rheims, and others. However, as there was an attempt made upon his life, towards the end of December, by a diſciple of the Jeſuits, who had been taught by them, that it was a meritorious action to kill the king; and as many other religious orders ſtill looked upon him as a perſon excommunicated, and therefore refuſed to pray for him, the king, at the requeſt of the clergy and divines, ſent Davy du Perron, biſhop of Evreux, as his ambaſſador to the pope, again to ſollicit apoſtolical abſolution [o]. The pope, now perſuaded of the juſtice of the king's cauſe by the proſperity of his affairs, gave him aſſurances of a reconciliation; and Perron arriving at Rome about the middle of July, he immediately ordered ſupplications to be made through all the churches, and the prayer of forty hours to be recited for imploring divine aſſiſtance in ſuch a weighty affair. He himſelf likewiſe, two ſucceſſive mornings, went bare-footed from his palace to the church of St. Mary Major, where he celebrated maſs; weeping, upon his return, at each ſtation, without looking up, or giving any benediction as uſual to the people [p]. During theſe ſupplications and proceſſions, every fifth day he conſulted one of the cardinals about the conditions of the abſolution. Thoſe of the Spaniſh faction, in hopes of rendering the embaſſy unſucceſsful, propoſed extremely hard conditions, which were rejected by Perron and Oſſat; who, after long diſputes, at length agreed with the pope upon ſixteen conditions; the chief of which were, that the king ſhould promiſe obedience to the apoſtolic ſee; ſhould reſtore the catholic religion in the principality of Bearn; ſhould build a monaſtery or nunnery in each province of his kingdom, and ſhould cauſe the decrees of the council of Trent to be publiſhed and obſerved throughout all his dominions. The ambaſſadors ſwearing to the performance of the articles agreed to, Clement, with great ſolemnity, granted abſolution to the king on the 17th of September [q]. c d e

He receives an embaſſy from the Ruſſians.

A few weeks after, he received an embaſſy from the metropolitan of Kiovia and all Ruſſia, and from other biſhops in Lithuania and Poland, who followed the rites of the Greek church, profeſſing their deſire of an union with the church of Rome. The archbiſhop of Livonia likewiſe, about the ſame time, arrived at the city with his nephew, and abjured the doctrines of Luther; but the joy on account of theſe new converts was ſoon greatly abated; for accounts arrived in Europe, that the Alexandrian embaſſy had been a forgery, and it was publicly reported, that the Ruſſians had diſclaimed the ſubmiſſion of their metropolitan, and refuſed to acknowlege any ſubjection to the Roman ſee [r]. During theſe tranſactions, Clement, at the earneſt ſollicitation of the emperor, had ſent his relation Francis Aldobrandino, with 2000 horſe and 8000 foot, into Hungary; who, having joined the imperial army, commanded by the count of Mansfield and the archduke Matthias, defeated the Turks before Gran or Strigonia, and obliged the city to ſurrender on the 2d of September. He likewiſe ſent a nuncio to the emperor, to negociate an alliance betwixt him and the Poles againſt the Turks, and ordered him to promiſe, in his name, 40,000 crowns a month to Bathori, prince of Tranſilvania, who had come to Prague, to have a conference with Rodol- f g a phus, and to ſollicit ſuccours againſt the infidels. Clement at the ſame time prohibited Bathori from attacking the Poles, who had ſeized upon Moldavia, and offered himſelf as a mediator betwixt them, requiring them both to ſubmit to his arbitration. He could not, however, prevail with the king of Poland to accept of him as mediator in the diſpute with Bathori, nor could cardinal Cajetan, who a few months after was ſent as his legate to Poland, perſuade the diet to agree to an alliance againſt the Turks [s].

In the mean time the pope ſent Alexander de Medicis, cardinal of Florence, as his legate to France, to receive the ratification of the articles agreed to by the French ambaſſadors at Rome, and to certify the apoſtolical abſolution granted to the king. He was received with great reſpect, upon the confines of the kingdom, and conducted by the governors of the provinces
b through which he paſſed, to Chaſtres, within eight leagues of Paris; where the king, attended by ſeveral nobles, paid him a congratulatory viſit. A few days after he was received into Paris with great magnificence; and, in conſequence of the king's edict, his inſtructions, or his faculties, as they are uſually called, ware regiſtred by the parliament, without any particular limitation. On the 12th of Auguſt he was admitted to a public audience, when the king confirmed the conditions of his abſolution agreed to by his ambaſſadors at the court of Rome. A few months after Henry appointed Francis Luxembourg, duke of Piney, as his ambaſſador to the pope; who did not arrive at Rome till the following year in the middle of April. His reception was very different from what he received in his firſt embaſſy; for A. D. 1597.
c the pope now ſtrove, by his kindneſs, to obliterate the remembrance of his former moroſe behaviour. A triumphal arch was erected at the gate through which the ambaſſador paſſed, and the next day after his entrance into the city, he was admitted to an audience in the Vatican. After he had ſolemnly yielded obedience, in the king's name, to his holineſs, he was invited by him to an entertainment; at which both the pope and he dined in the ſame room, but at different tables [t]. Mean while, by means of his legate in France, and nuncio in Spain, he earneſtly ſollicited both Philip and Henry to agree to a peace. As Henry was now firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne of France, and Philip began to feel the infirmities of old age, and to be ſenſible of the diſmal effects of his extravagant ambition, the mediation of his holineſs thereby became acceptable to both; and by means of a Franciſcan, employed by cardinal de Medicis, Henry's ſecretary, agreed to a conference with a deputy from the d governor of Flanders, when they appointed the negotiation for a peace to be held at Vervins.

The pope claims the duchy of Ferrara, upon the death of duke Alphonſo II. and

While theſe preliminaries were ſettling in France, Italy was threatened with new commotions by the death of Alphonſo duke of Ferrara. As the duke had no iſſue, he left all his eſtates, by his will, to a baſtard-relation named Cæſar d'Eſte; who, upon his death, immediately took poſſeſſion of his dominions, and wrote to the Chriſtian princes, informing them of his ſucceſſion. He likewiſe ſent an ambaſſador to Rome, with a letter to the pope; who alleged, that as Alphonſo had died without iſſue, his fief had devolved to the holy ſee. He therefore, upon reading the titles aſſumed by Cæſar, threw away the letter, diſmiſſed his ambaſſador, and immediately aſſembled a conſiderable body of forces, which he ſent, under e the command of his nephew cardinal Aldobrandino, into the territory of Bologna; publiſhed a monitory againſt Cæſar, denouncing an anathema againſt him, if he did not immediately renounce his claim to Ferrara; and cited him to appear at Rome within fifteen days, under pain of being declared a rebel. Cæſar, at firſt, paid no regard to the pope's menaces, but, raiſing an army, gained a ſmall advantage over the papal troops; however, as the Chriſtian princes refuſed to engage in this quarrel, and Henry IV. of France openly declared for the A. of January on theſe conditions: that Cæſar, and all thoſe who had eſpouſed his cauſe, ſhould be abſolved from excommunication; that he ſhould renounce all right to Ferrara, and all territories belonging to the church; that he ſhould have leave to carry off one half of the f artillery, and to keep the allodial poſſeſſions of the family; that he ſhould enjoy the ſame rank at Rome as the late duke Alphonſo, and ſhould retain the titles of duke of Modena and Reggio; which cities, with that of Carpi, being under the imperial juriſdiction, the emperors Maximilian and Rodolphus had permitted Alphonſo to leave them, by his will, to Cæſar. The news of this accommodation was received at Rome with great joy, eſpecially by Clement, who It is united to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.
confirmed the conditions agreed to, and, on the 11th of February, publiſhed a bull, uniting the city and duchy of Ferrara to the apoſtolic ſee, and dedicated them for ever to the virgin Mary and the apoſtles Peter and Paul. In order to ſettle the affairs of that new acquiſition, he ſoon after left Rome; and, proceeding through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate with great pomp and ceremony, arrived at Ferrara on the 8th of May, attended by twenty-ſeven cardinals;
g where he continued till the end of November [u].

A peace concluded by his mediation betwixt France and Spain.

A FEW days before he arrived at this city, a peace was concluded between France and Spain at Vervins, by the mediation of his legate in France, and his nuncio, Francis Gonzaga, biſhop of Modena, after a negociation of four months; ſome diſputes, however, between king Henry and the duke of Savoy being ſtill left undecided, and referred to the arbitration of the pope. About the ſame time, a match having been concluded between Iſabella, ſiſter of the king of Spain, and her couſin, cardinal Albert, the emperor's brother, and governor of Flanders, he ſolemnly reſigned his hat and ſacerdotal habit in the church of St. Mary of Halle near Bruſſels; and, proceeding to Germany, went from thence with Margaret of Auſtria, daughter of the archduke Charles, deceaſed, to Ferrara. An alliance had likewiſe been concluded between Margaret of Auſtria and her couſin Philip III. of Spain, who had ſucceeded to that crown by the death of his father, while ſhe was on her journey to Ferrara. The pope received Albert and Margaret with great honour and reſpect; and, having granted both parties a diſpenſation, with regard to the degrees of conſanguinity, he himſelf celebrated both marriages on the 15th of November, in the cathedral church, the archduke ſtanding ſponſor for the king of Spain, and the Spaniſh ambaſſador for the infanta Iſabella [w]. A few days after, the pope, having conferred a great many privileges on the city of Ferrara, left that place, and proceeded to Rome; where he arrived on the 20th of December. The joy expreſſed by the Romans for his return was quickly allayed by a dreadful inundation of the Tyber, occaſioned by the frequent rains, and a ſtrong ſouth wind, which ſtopt the current of the river. The waters ſwelled three palms higher than they were ever remembered to have done before; ſo that, on Chriſtmas-day, the whole city was covered, excepting only the ſeven mountains, and a few other riſing grounds. Upwards of 1000 people periſhed, and the city received more damage than if it had been plundered by an enemy [x]. The charity of the pope, and of ſeveral cardinals, were very conſpicuous during this public calamity, by alleviating the diſtreſſes of the poor, and furniſhing them with proviſions. After the inundation had ceaſed, he, to the utmoſt of his power, ſupplied the loſſes which particular perſons had ſuffered; and, attributing the calamity more to the ſins of the people than to natural cauſes, he publiſhed a bull, exhorting all to repentance, and to works of charity, appointing likewiſe ſupplications, and granting general indulgences.

SOON after he was greatly afflicted with the news of the publication of the edict of Nantz, by which liberty of conſcience was granted to the Hugonots of France; however, by the repreſentations of cardinal Oſſat, he was in ſome meaſure reconciled to the king's proceeding; and a few months after, at his requeſt, he appointed delegates to examine into the validity of his marriage with Margaret of Valois. He likewiſe conſented to act as arbitrator in the differences betwixt him and the duke of Savoy, concerning the marquiſate of Saluces; but the duke refuſing to depoſit the diſputed territories in the pope's hands, and alleging, that he had engaged, by private agreement, to decide in favour of the king, Clement with indignation rejected the arbitration, as his integrity and juſtice had been called in queſtion by ſuch a ſuſpicion. In the mean time, the corpſe of St. Cæcilia being lately found, he, with great ſolemnity, transferred it to the church of that name [y]; and, as the following year was the commencement of a new century, according to the common computation, he publiſhed a bull for the celebration of a jubilee at Rome; where he ordered great preparations to be made for the reception and entertainment of the pilgrims. He wrote alſo to all Chriſtian princes, exhorting them to give no interruption to thoſe who ſhould undertake a journey to Rome, to receive the benefit of the indulgences, which he ſuſpended for one year in all other places; and on the laſt day of December, in the evening, he, with the uſual ceremony, opened the holy gate of St. Peter's, while three of the cardinals at the ſame time opened the gates of St. Paul's, in the road to Oſtia, St. John's in the Lateran, and St. Mary Major's.

THE number of thoſe, who, during the holy year, reſorted to Rome on account of religion or curioſity, was immenſely great. Beſides, many nobles and princes came to Rome, among whom was the duke of Bavaria, and Andrew cardinal of Auſtria, both incognito, in the habit of pilgrims; likewiſe the dukes of Bar and Parma, the French king's ambaſſador, and the viceroy of Naples; who yielded obedience to the pope, in the name of the new king of Spain. Among the ſtrangers were alſo ſaid to be many proteſtants and Turks, ſeveral of whom embraced the faith of the church of Rome [z]. The duke of Bar came to Rome to endeavour to obtain a diſpenſation for his marriage with the king of France's ſiſter, Catharine, whom he had married the year before, though ſhe was his own couſin, and a Hugonot. The pope abſolutely refuſed his requeſt, unleſs Catharine would abjure the hereſy of Calvin, and profeſs the Roman faith; which conditions ſhe rejected with great conſtancy. As the duke, however, promiſed to diſmiſs her publicly, he was abſolved from all his paſt ſins, admitted to the ſacred communion, and allowed the benefit of the indulgences of the jubilee [a] (P).

(P) The diſpenſation was granted three years afterwaeds, the dutcheſs having pretended a deſire of converſion; but ſhe died before it took effect in February, 1604. Thuanus, in the 124th book of his hiſtory, gives a CLEMENT ſhewed himſelf more complaiſant to the king of France, with regard to his marriage; and, at the requeſt of his ambaſſador, he readily confirmed the ſentence of the delegates, who had declared his marriage null, becauſe his queen Margaret was within the third degree of conſanguinity; and although he had obtained a diſpenſation from Gregory XIII. yet that had no effect, as it had been granted without the deſire and knowlege of Margaret, and the king had not then truly abjured his hereſy. For theſe and ſome other frivolous reaſons, the delegates had declared the marriage null from the beginning. The pope, remembring the fatal conſequences of the behaviour of his predeceſſor Clement VII. to Henry VIII. of England, confirmed their ſentence without any difficulty; and, as the king had declared his intention of marrying Mary de Medicis, daughter of the late grand b duke of Tuſcany, he preſented the bride with 100,000 crowns, beſides many rich jewels, and ſent his nephew, cardinal Aldobrandino, as his legate to Florence; who, on the 5th of October, ſolemnized the nuptials with great pomp, Henry IV. having ſent Bellegarde, his maſter of the horſe, to be his proxy [b]. From Florence the legate proceeded to Savoy; and, having had many difficulties, he at length prevailed upon both parties to agree to a peace; the marquiſate of Saluces being exchanged for La Breſſe, Henry quitting all claim to the former, and the latter being declared to belong to the kingdom of France.

CLEMENT in the mean time founded a monaſtery for thoſe poor girls, who, without any home, wandered in the ſtreets of Rome, having four years before founded one for the poor boys; who were afterwards called Literati, from one Literatus, who was the firſt pro- c moter of that charity [c]. Having been patron and protector of the Scotch nation at the court of Rome before his promotion to the pontificate, he now founded and endowed a college for the inſtruction of the young men from that kingdom; and, at the requeſt of the Portugueſe, he publiſhed a bull, allowing the generals of all the mendicant orders to ſend what number of monks they pleaſed from Portugal into the Eaſt Indies, prohibiting, at the ſame time, any monks to paſs from the Philippine iſlands, or the Weſt Indies, to any of the Portugueſe ſettlements in Aſia, as the nations of Spain and Portugal, tho' then under the ſame king, ſtill purſued ſeparate intereſts, and were mutually jealous of their national privileges. He was likewiſe very earneſt with the king of France to publiſh the decrees of the council of Trent in his kingdom, according to one of the conditions of his abſolution; but tho' d Henry declared his willingneſs to comply with the pope's deſire, and even ſigned and ſealed the edict for the promulgation of the council, the oppoſition of the parliament of Paris prevented the edict from being publiſhed. Clement at the ſame time ſollicited, without any effect, the re-admiſſion of the Jeſuits, who had been baniſhed from France ſeveral years before; and, having concluded the jubilee at Rome, he allowed a feſtival of the ſame kind to be celebrated for a certain time, in the following year, in ſome kingdoms and provinces (Q).

He founds a Scotch college at Rome.

A FEW months after, two ambaſſadors arrived at Rome from the king of Perſia, to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian powers againſt the Turks, and to inform the pope, that he had lately recovered a large province from them, and had drawn the governors of Georgia, e Mingrelia, and Circaſſia, into his intereſts. The two ambaſſadors, one of whom was an Engliſhman, had a fierce diſpute about precedence, upon their public entry into Rome; after ſome blows, the Engliſhman obtained poſſeſſion of the honourable place, and was admitted to a ſeparate audience from his collegue; but their embaſſy was without any effect; and each of them, having received ſeveral thouſand crowns from the pope, left Rome, the Perſian ſailing to Spain, and the Engliſhman, having deceived his creditors, pretending to return directly to Perſia [d]. Soon after their departure from Rome, Clement publiſhed a bull, to quiet the great diſſenſions among the catholics in England. The Jeſuits for ſeveral years had been gives a different account, and ſays, that the duke immediately obtained a diſpenſation from the pope, without any difficulty. We have preferred the authority of cardinal Oſſat then at Rome (1).

(Q) Spondanus, the abridger and continuator of the eccleſiaſtical annals of Baronius, informs us, that he was preſent at this ceremony, having accompanied the cardinal de Sourdis to Rome; where a few years after he was ordained prieſt. Five years before he had abjured Calviniſm, in which he had been educated; and, having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great abilities and zealous attachment to the popiſh cauſe, in the year 1626 he was nominated by Lewis XIII. of France to the biſhopric of Pamiers; which dignity, however, he refuſed to accept of, till he received a mandate from pope Urban VIII. His annals are wrote in a clear animated ſtile, and he ſeems to have been extremely well qualified for an hiſtorian, if he had been diveſted of his flagrant partiality for the church of Rome, and unjuſt prejudices againſt all thoſe of a different communion, whom he rails at without any temper or decency. He concluded his annals at this period, but added a ſhort continuation to the year 1640, under the title of Proluſio ad Sæculum XVII.

The poor prieſts, who complained that they were more oppreſſed by the Jeſuits than by queen Elizabeth, at length got an opportunity of laying their grievances before his holineſs; who, finding that the intrigues of the Jeſuits were prejudicial to the popiſh cauſe, retrenched their authority by his bull, and by that means put an end to the diſſenſions [c]. About the ſame time he ſent 12,000 men to the aſſiſtance of the emperor againſt the Turks. Theſe troops were commanded by his nephew, Francis Aldobrandino; and, having embarked at Ancona, croſſed the Adriatic, and arrived about the middle of September before Caniſa, which they inveſted, in conjunction with the other imperial troops; but the garriſon, which was very numerous, having de- b fended the place with great vigour, they were obliged to abandon the ſiege towards the end of November, and to leave behind them the greateſt part of their artillery [f].

A diſputation betwixt the Jeſuits and Dominicans at Rome. A. D. 1603. THE following year Clement allowed the Dominicans and the Jeſuits to diſpute in his preſence concerning grace and free-will, and publiſhed a declaration, prohibiting ſacramental confeſſions to be made by letters or proxies to abſent confeſſors [g]. The year after he ſollicited the king of France for the re-eſtabliſhment of the Jeſuits in that kingdom; altho', according to Mezeray, he diſcovered no great earneſtneſs in that affair, having received great complaints againſt that order, not only from England, but alſo from Venice, and the Swiſs cantons. He likewiſe ordered his nuncio to complain to the king againſt the Hugonots, who, in a ſynod which they held in the month of October, at Gap in Dauphiny, had, among their c other canons, decreed, that the pope was the real antichriſt. Henry himſelf was offended at the decree, as it accuſed him of worſhipping the Beaſt; and all the catholic clergy remonſtrating againſt the new heretical article, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours with the chiefs of the Hugonots to have it aboliſhed, but without any effect [h].

The Jeſuits deny the infallibility of the pope. A. D. 1604. AT the ſame time the authority of the pope received an attack from the Jeſuits; who, being offended that, in the late diſpute with the Dominicans, he had not patronized their order, began to aſſert, that the pope was not infallible, and that it was not an article of the catholic faith to believe that Clement VIII. was the lawful ſucceſſor of St. Peter. They likewiſe defended the lawfulneſs of confeſſing by proxy, and aſſerted the orthodoxy of the opinion of the Jeſuit Molina concerning grace. Theſe queſtions greatly alarmed the aſſertors d of the papal ſupremacy. The Jeſuit, who impugned the infallibility, was impriſoned, and the whole order would have ſuffered, if the Spaniſh ambaſſador had not interceded earneſtly in their behalf. The queſtion about confeſſion was alſo ſuppreſſed; but the pope allowed the diſpute, concerning the influence of grace and the freedom of the will, to be canvaſſed more fully (R). As he was not a little offended with the behaviour of the Jeſuits, he abſolutely refuſed to canonize their founder Loyola, notwithſtanding the great intereſt they at this time made in the papal court, and tho' they were now ſupported by Henry IV. who, in the beginning of this year, allowed their order to return to France, and choſe his confeſſor from their ſociety. Tho' Clement had repulſed the Jeſuits, yet at the requeſt of the clergy of Milan, he canonized cardinal Charles Borromeo.

A commotion in Rome. MEAN time the peace of the city was, in ſome meaſure, diſturbed by a conteſt about the privilege of an aſylum. A priſoner having been purſued by the Sbirri, or conſtables, took refuge in the palace of cardinal Odoard Farneſe, where he was protected by force againſt the prefect of Rome. The cardinal, with ſeveral Roman nobles, and the Spaniſh ambaſſador,

(R) The Jeſuits in a general aſſembly, held in the year 1558, altered one of the original ſtatutes of their founder, who had died about two years before; and allowed the books of Peter Lombard, and other divines, to be taught in their ſchools; whereas, before that time, they had only admitted the works of St. Thomas Acquinas. Many of their members had about that time abandoned the doctrine of St. Thomas, fifty of whoſe theological opinions they rejected in their fourth general congregation, held at Rome in the year 1584. As they began to teach their new opinions publicly, and to aſſert them by theſes, they were cenſured by the univerſities of Louvain and Douay. But to free themſelves from the ſuſpicion of hereſy, after ſeveral years controverſy, they themſelves delivered Molina's book to the judges of the inquiſition in the year 1594. The affair, four years afterwards, was carried to Rome; where Molina's book was ſuppreſſed by the congregation de Auxiliis Gratiæ, which had been then appointed by the pope. The Jeſuits, before the cenſure of the congregation was publiſhed, obtained leave to hold a conference with their impugners, the Dominicans; which continued without any effect for a whole year. Clement likewiſe ordered the congregation to re-examine Molina; and, in the year 1601, added ſome new conſultors to the others. Molina was again condemned by their ſecond ſentence, which declared, that he agreed with the Pelagians and Semipelagians, both in his doctrine, his proofs, and his objections. The diſpute, nevertheleſs, was not ended; for the Jeſuits ſtill undertook to prove the orthodoxy of the cenſured propoſitions, and, by their importunities, prevailed on Clement to grant a new examination, which commenced on the 20th of March 1602, and was not concluded at his death. As the pope did not interpoſe his authority to procure a ſentence in their behalf, probably on that account he drew upon himſelf the reſentment of thoſe fathers (2).

a after continuing in arms all night, with ſeveral of their dependents, next morning marched out of the town with the criminal, to a caſtle at thirty-ſix miles diſtance; which behaviour irritating the pope, he ſent to him, and ordered him to reſign his government of St. Peter's Patrimony, which his anceſtors had enjoyed ever ſince the pontificate of Paul III. Upon his refuſal, Clement immediately ordered new levies to be made, and prepared to reduce him to his obedience by force; which the cardinal being informed of, he thought proper to ſubmit, and effected his reconciliation by means of his brother the duke of Parma, who had married one of the pope's nieces [i]. The pope ſurvived this diſturbance only a few months, and died on the 2d of March, in the 70th year of his age, and the 14th year of his pontificate; during which he had created, at different promotions, upwards of fifty car- *The death of Clement VIII. b dinals, among whom were Baronius, Bellarmine, Du Perron, De Sourdi, D'Oſſat, and Olivier. This pope was greatly extolled for his piety and moderation. He was a great patron of learned men, and is ſaid to have promiſed liberty of conſcience to the celebrated Scipio Gentilis, to induce him to accept of a profeſſor's chair in the univerſity of Bologna [k]. He is repreſented, however, in another light by Heydegger; who ſays, that he formed a ſcheme of a holy league for oppreſſing the proteſtants, which was approved by the emperor, and by which it was propoſed to begin with ſurpriſing Geneva and Straſburg [l].

Cardinal Aldobrandino, the nephew of the late pope, who, a few months before his death, had ſucceeded to the archbiſhopric of Ravenna, and had great authority in the ſacred
c college, upon entering into the conclave endeavoured to procure the election of the famous cardinal Baronius. He was ſeconded by the cardinals of the French faction; but the Spaniſh party, which for a long time had been ſuperior in the Roman court, oppoſed him with great violence and malice, in reſentment of what he had written, in the eleventh volume of his Eccleſiaſtical Annals, againſt the right claimed by the king of Spain to the kingdom of Sicily, independent of the holy ſee. They produced a letter of complaint againſt him, as if written from the viceroy of Naples to the late pope; which, to their great confuſion, was proved to be a forgery. After two or three ſcrutinies, his intereſt was found to be pretty ſtrong; but, as there were no leſs than ſixty cardinals in the conclave, he could not procure a legal majority, the Spaniards being ſufficiently ſtrong to put a negative upon the election
d of any one whom they diſapproved. Bellarmine and ſome others were alſo rejected. At length cardinal De Joyeuſe, chief of the French faction, propoſed cardinal Alexander de Medicis, who was not unacceptable to either party, and was accordingly elected, by a ſcrutiny with open billets on the firſt of April, when he aſſumed the name of Leo XI. He was the ſon of Octaviano, couſin of Coſmo great duke of Tuſcany; and, having been created cardinal by Gregory XIII. he had long diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the court of Rome by his magnificence and kindneſs to learned men. His predeceſſor ſent him as legate to France; where, by his wiſe and moderate conduct, he gained a great reputation. His promotion, which gave great joy to the Romans, made no alteration in his behaviour; but he gave audience with his uſual affability, and continued thoſe in office who had been appointed by his predeceſſors. Leo XI. is chosen pope.
e He promiſed to eaſe his ſubjects of their taxes, and to adorn the city of Rome; but he was prevented from executing his deſigns by death, which happened to him on the 27th day of his pontificate, and the 70th year of his age [m]. His death.

Upon the death of Leo XI. the conclave was divided into four principal factions; namely, the Spaniſh and French, and that of Aldobrandino and Montalto. Cardinals Sauli, Mariano, and Bellarmine, were propoſed, and rejected. Toſco de Reggio was alſo nominated by the Spaniſh and Aldobrandine factions; but by the clamours of Baronius, who exclaimed loudly againſt him, forty-four cardinals deſerted him, and propoſed to adore the other, whom they conducted to the Pauline chapel. The election of Baronius, however, met with an interruption, and Toſco, when he returned to his cell, found it pillaged, his palace in the city
f being alſo plundered, according to cuſtom, as his election was looked upon as certain. Aldobrandino then propoſed Camillo Borgheſe; who, being acceptable to Montalto and De Joyeuſe, was conducted to the Pauline chapel, where he was elected by an open ſcrutiny, on the 16th of May, and took the name of Paul V [n]. He was then only in the 53d year of his age, and was born at Rome; where his father, who had come from Siena, had been conſiſtorial advocate. He had a great reputation for his knowlege in the civil law, and was created a cardinal by Clement VIII. who ſent him as his nuncio to Spain. Soon after his promotion he gave his own cardinal's hat to Scipio Caffarelli, his ſiſter's ſon, and elevated his two ſurviving brothers, Francis and John Baptiſt, to the chief dignities in Rome, the firſt
g being appointed governor of the Vatican, and the other governor of St. Angelo. Paul V. elected.

He endeavours to advance the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction.

THE chief concern of the new pope was to advance the eccleſiaſtical authority and juriſdiction. He earneſtly preſſed the king of France to publiſh the decrees of the council of Trent, and ſollicited the king of Spain to grant the Jeſuits an exemption from the payment of their tythe, and to ſend the regent of Ponte to Rome, becauſe, in conſequence of the king's edict, he had ſent two bookſellers of Naples to the gallies for ſelling the eleventh volume of the Annals of Baronius, contrary to the royal prohibition. He was offended with the republic of Lucca, becauſe it had publiſhed an edict, prohibiting all commerce and correſpondence with thoſe Luccheſe who had left their country, and embraced the proteſtant religion. He inſiſted that the edict ſhould be repealed, that there might be an opportunity to act by the cenſures of the church. He likewiſe threatened the Genoeſe for having ſuppreſſed a ſeditious congregation, which aſſembled at a chapel of the Jeſuits in their city; but his chief diſpute about eccleſiaſtical immunity was with the republic of Venice. a b

On which account he quarrels with the Venetians. A. D. 1606.

THE Venetians, a few years before, had publiſhed ſeveral laws for reſtraining the power and licentiouſneſs of the clergy; particularly, they had prohibited the building of new churches, convents, and monaſteries, in their dominions, without the expreſs permiſſion of the ſigniory, and had declared eccleſiaſtics incapable of making any new acquiſition of immoveable goods, without the leave of the ſenate. They had likewiſe, by their own authority, impriſoned an abbot and a canon, who had been guilty of enormous crimes; on which account the pope ſent two briefs to his nuncio at Venice, the one for annulling the new-made laws, and the other ordering the two priſoners to be remitted to the eccleſiaſtical courts. The republic defended their proceeding with great ſpirit, while ſome of the cardinals endeavoured to mediate an accommodation. Others, with more ſucceſs, inflamed the difference, in hopes that the pope, by being engaged in ſuch an intricate affair, would be ſeized with grief, which might ſhorten his days °. Paul accordingly, not being able to obtain his imperious demands from the Venetians, on the 17th of April thundered out a bull of excommunication and interdict againſt the republic, unleſs they would give him ſatisfaction within twenty-four days. A great number of treatiſes appeared on both ſides of the controverſy; but the Venetians reſolved to defend their cauſe, not by writings, but by arms. They prohibited the eccleſiaſtics within their dominions from paying any regard to the pope's bull (S). They began to equip a fleet, hired 8,000 Griſons, and aſſembled ſeveral other forces on the borders of the Milaneſe. The pope likewiſe, at firſt, with great ardour, aſſembled an army in the duchy of Spoleto, and ſolicited ſuccours from the kings of France and Spain; who both promiſed to aſſiſt him with a formidable army. In the mean time he put an end to the controverſy concerning grace, betwixt the Jeſuits and Dominicans, ordaining that each party might modeſtly defend their own opinion in the ſchools, without condemning that of the other, till a determination of the apoſtolic ſee ſhould be publiſhed P. He likewiſe erected a congregation of war; which proceeding ſurprized all Italy, as the court of Rome, till that time, had always covered their temporal deſigns with ſpiritual names. However, as he found the Venetians not terrified by his threats, and that they had the promiſe of aſſiſtance not only from the king of Great Britain and the ſtates of Holland, but even from the grand ſignor, he expreſſed his deſire of an accommodation to the French ambaſſador at Rome; finding that the king of Spain only deſigned to amuſe him, having demanded, as the condition of engaging in the war, a releaſe of the yearly tribute for the kingdom of Naples, and a ſurrender of Ferrara and Ancona. Henry IV. of France was more ſincere in his endeavours to ſerve both parties, and, by his ambaſſador at Venice, had preſſed the republic to make ſome offers of a ſubmiſſion. They, as well as the pope, accepting of his mediation, he ſent the cardinal de Joyeuſe into Italy, who conducted his negociation with ſuch prudence, that he at laſt concluded a peace on theſe conditions: that the republic ſhould deliver the two priſoners into the hands of the French ambaſſador, to be delivered to the pope; and ſhould revoke the proteſt againſt the apoſtolical cenſures, and reſtore all eccleſiaſtics to their eſtates; on which account the pope ſhould give them abſolution (T). (S) Some few of the clergy thought proper to obey the pope; but the monks continued quiet in their monaſteries, only the orders of Capuchins and Jeſuits aſked leave to depart. The Capuchins had liberty to return when thy pleaſed; but the Jeſuits were baniſhed for ever by an edict, and all were prohibited from holding any correſpondence with them, under pain of the gallies and the loſs of goods. At their departure from the city, the mob conducted them to the ſhore, ſhouting, and calling after them, that they might go to the devil if they pleaſed. They, in reſentment for this treatment, endeavoured, by private intrigues, to raiſe factions among the nobility, and cauſed two gentlemen of the Venetian ambaſſador's retinue in Poland to be affronted at maſs, and to be expelled the church (3).

(T) The treaty was retarded ſeveral months on account of the Jeſuits, whom the pope, at firſt, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to have reſtored. But the republic abſolutely refuſing to repeal their edict againſt them, he at laſt conſented to wave that point (4).

a at Venice, with great ſolemnity revoked the ſentence of excommunication on the 21ſt of April [q].

About the commencement of this difference with the Venetians, the pope, being informed that the king of Great Britain had publiſhed the form of an oath, by which all his ſubjects in England were required to ſwear, that king James was ſupreme lord of all the dominions which he poſſeſſed, and that the pope had no authority of depoſing a king, he immediately diſpatched a brief into England, prohibiting all the papiſts from taking that oath, and exhorting them patiently to endure all manner of perſecution rather than comply. As many of them, nevertheleſs, took the oath, pretending that the brief was a forgery, he again wrote to them this year, aſſuring them of the genuineneſs of his former brief, and that the b oath could not be taken with a ſafe conſcience [r].

The following year Paul received an embaſſy from the king of Congo in Africa, where the monks, after a long interval, had again inſinuated themſelves. He received the ambaſſador with great reſpect, and promiſed to ſend ſeveral learned and pious preachers with him into his own country; but as he died ſoon after his arrival at Rome, the deſign of ſending miſſionaries to Congo was at that time laid aſide. About the ſame time the archbiſhop of Goa procured letters to the pope from the king of Perſia, and next year the Perſian ambaſſador arrived at Rome, to yield obedience, as it was pretended, to Paul, and to inform him, that he allowed Chriſtians to build churches and ſchools in his dominions [s]. The pope receives an embaſſy from the king of Congo, A. D. 1609. and from the king of Perſia.

An embaſſy arrived likewiſe this ſame year from Elias, the Neſtorian patriarch at Babylon; c who, having received a confeſſion of the Roman faith from Paul, in the beginning of his pontificate, now ſent one Adam, an archdeacon, to Rome, with a new confeſſion, drawn up in different terms from the Roman, but without any material alteration as to the ſenſe; intending to ſhew the pope, that the faith of the orientals differed only in words from that of Rome. The pope's ſecretary, in his examination of this writing, explained every article in an unfavourable ſenſe, and obliged the legate of the patriarch to ſubmit, not only to the doctrines, but to the words of the Roman church. The legate ſigned every thing that the pope propoſed to him, and not only abjured the errors of his nation, but alſo addreſſed ſome treatiſes to his countrymen, exhorting them to an entire conformity with the church of Rome. At his departure, which happened two years afterwards, he was accompanied by d two Jeſuits, and carried with him a brief from the pope to the patriarch, requiring him to renounce all expreſſions which might ſeem to countenance error [t]. The Neſtorians are reunited to the church of Rome.

During his reſidence at Rome, the pope was earneſtly preſſed by the king of France to enter into a defenſive alliance with him and the princes of Italy; and, to prevail upon him to accede to the treaty, a match was propoſed betwixt his nephew and the king's natural daughter. But Paul abſolutely refuſed to engage in the alliance, as he was apprehenſive, from the great preparations made by the king, that he intended a rupture with Spain, and to invade the Milaneſe; in which caſe he propoſed to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality, tho' he was deſirous to prevent, if poſſible, any hoſtilities in Italy. This negociation was interrupted by the aſſaſſination of Henry IV. at which the pope expreſſed great ſorrow; and, as e a teſtimony of his regard, he aſſiſted perſonally at his obſequies; which were celebrated at Rome with great ſolemnity. Hearing that ſome young Frenchmen in the city rejoiced at the king's death, and ſtiled the aſſaſſin the deliverer of their country, he ordered them to be ſeized; and, upon proceſs made againſt them, condemned them to the gallies [u]. About the ſame time the congregation delle Indice publiſhed their cenſure of the hiſtory of Thuanus, while Paul, in imitation of Clement V. and other popes, publiſhed a bull, ordering all the religious orders to maintain profeſſors in the Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, and Latin languages [w]. As the report ſtill continued, that the marſhal de Leſdiguieres was on the point of entering Italy with an army to join the duke of Savoy, Paul declared to the French ambaſſador at Rome, that if the marſhal ſhould offer to paſs the Alps, he would endeavour to oppoſe him f by force. The pope had no occaſion to repeat his threats; for the death of Henry IV. and the minority of his ſon Lewis XIII. put a ſtop to the intended expedition of the French into Italy. A. D. 1610. Paul expreſſes great ſorrow for the murder of the king of France.

Not long after, Paul received a meſſage from the duke of Bavaria, to inform him of his diſpute with the archbiſhop of Saltzburg, whom he detained a priſoner. The duke had formed pretenſions to the ſalt-pits in the territory of Halle the Rich, then in the poſſeſſion of the archbiſhop; and, upon his refuſal to acknowlege his right, had entered his territories with an armed force, ſeized ſome of his towns, and impriſoned himſelf. the prelate was prevented from ſending a deputy to Rome, the elector found means to juſtify his conduct at that court; and the four cardinals, who were appointed by the pope to examine the affair, decreed, that the archbiſhop, having endeavoured to fly from his territories upon the invaſion of the duke, had rendered himſelf unworthy of his dignity, which he ſhould therefore reſign, and content himſelf with an annual penſion of 20,000 florins. Paul is remiſs in the adminiſtration of public affairs.

MEAN while, being diſguſted with buſineſs, on account of the great trouble and vexation in which he had been involved by his rupture with the Venetians, he now indulged himſelf in ſloth and indolence. He neglected almoſt intirely the adminiſtration of affairs, and was chiefly intent upon enriching his nephew cardinal Borgheſe, on whom he beſtowed a revenue of upwards of 250,000 crowns, by conferring upon him very many rich benefices, and drawing penſions from a great many others both in Spain and Italy [y]. He took great delight in adorning the city with magnificent buildings, and about this time finiſhed the large palace of Monte Cavallo, which had been begun by Sixtus V. Beſides, he greatly enlarged the church of St. Peter, and the Vatican palace and library; he built two magnificent palaces for his relations, one in the city, and the other, with ſpacious gardens, without the walls; and in both he collected the moſt valuable works in ſculpture and painting, and the fineſt monuments of antiquity which he could purchaſe. He brought water to ſeveral parts of the city by aqueducts, and embelliſhed the ſtreets with a great number of fountains; on which account he was ſtiled by Paſquin, Pontifex Maximus. [z]. b c

AS the duke of Mantua, about the end of the following year, died without male iſſue, Paul allowed his brother, cardinal Ferdinand, to whom the ſucceſſion fell, to reſign his hat; however, notwithſtanding the earneſt intreaties of the French and Venetian ambaſſadors, he refuſed to concern himſelf in the leaſt with the diſputes betwixt the new duke and the Spaniards, who had formed pretenſions to ſome part of his territories, and in the following ſpring threatened to diſturb the peace of Italy with their warlike preparations. Though a war actually commenced, Paul ſtill continued unconcerned, and could not be moved in behalf of the houſe of Mantua by the moſt preſſing ſollicitations of the French ambaſſador, who wrote to the queen regent, that the pope was like a beaſt fattening in a ſtall, and thought only of enjoying the pleaſures and conveniencies of the pontificate [a]. Paul pretended to be afraid of the reſentment of the court of Madrid, or perhaps was convinced, from the weakneſs of the Spaniſh monarchy, and the peaceable diſpoſition of Philip III. that the hazard of a war with France would make the Spaniards readily accommodate their differences in Italy. d

The pope oppoſes an alliance betwixt the prince of Wales and a daughter of France. A. D. 1614.

MEAN while he publiſhed a bull for founding a ſeminary of cardinals at Rome; and, at the requeſt of the queen regent of France, he confirmed the congregation of pious prieſts, which had been inſtituted by her at Paris, under the title of the congregation of the fathers of the oratory, in honour of the prayers put up by Chriſt in the days of his fleſh [b]. He likewiſe, by a treaty with Lewis XIII. regulated the limits of the county of Venaiſſin, ſituated between Dauphiny and Provence, and belonging to the holy ſee [c]. During this negociation, being informed that the queen regent was treating with the king of Great Britain about a marriage betwixt the prince of Wales and her ſecond daughter Chriſtina, he ordered his nuncio Ubaldini to remonſtrate againſt the propoſed alliance, as prejudicial to the church, that is, in the ſtile of the Roman court, contrary to the intereſts of the pope. The nuncio, finding that he made no impreſſion upon the queen, endeavoured to alarm the devotees at Paris; but his intrigues were unneceſſary; for the queen was not ſincere in the negociation with the Britiſh court, and only intended to quiet the diſcontents of the French, who murmured greatly at the double alliance which ſhe had contracted the year before with Spain [d]. This alliance with Spain chiefly gave offence to the prince of Conde and the Huguenots, who remembered the late fatal effects of the Spaniſh councils in their kingdom. Together with the prince, the duke of Mayenne and ſeveral other nobles entered into an aſſociation; and, after publiſhing ſeveral remonſtrances againſt the queen's mal-adminiſtration, had recourſe to arms. An accommodation, however, was ſoon effected, by means of the parliament of Paris, the queen having made great conceſſions to the prince of Conde, with which the pope's nuncio was greatly offended, as he imagined the prince intended to renounce the popiſh religion, and to claim the ſucceſſion to the crown [e]. e f

He accuſes the parliament of Paris of encroaching upon the juriſdiction of the church.

THE proceedings of the parliament of Paris gave great jealouſy to the pope, who about that time accuſed them of incroaching upon the rights of the church, as they had condemned a book of Suarez, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, as containing pernicious and damnable doctrines. He made great complaints againſt them to the French ambaſſador at Rome, and ordered him to deſire the queen regent to annul the dea cree, promiſing, that if any propoſition of Suarez was derogatory to the ſovereignty of the king, it ſhould be cenſured at Rome. The ambaſſador repreſenting the impracticability of annulling the decree, and obſerving that, if the doctrine of aſſaſſinating princes, who are accuſed of tyranny, ſhould become general, the popes themſelves were not ſafe, but might happen to be murdered by ſome fanatical heretic, Paul, after ſome reflection, agreed to write to his nuncio in France, and ſent briefs to the cardinals Joyeuſe, Perron, and Rochefoucault, enjoining them to confer with the nuncio about the means of procuring ſatisfaction to the holy ſee. He had at firſt been inflamed by the Jeſuits at Rome, who, preferring the honour of their ſociety to all other conſiderations, had uſed their utmoſt endeavours to occaſion a rupture betwixt him and France, and to prevail with him to cauſe the parliament's decree

b to be burnt, as heretical, by the hangman. Lewis XIII. being declared major about the beginning of October, immediately after, to ſatisfy the pope, publiſhed a declaration, affirming, that the execution of the decree of parliament ſhould not infringe the lawful authority of the pope, or the privileges acknowleged by his anceſtors to belong to the holy ſee. Paul was far from being ſatisfied with this declaration, as by the word lawful, the authority of the holy ſee ſeemed in ſome meaſure limited; he therefore ſtill inſiſted that the decree ſhould be judicially annulled; but all the ſatisfaction he could obtain, was only the ſuſpenſion of its execution [f].

He was likewiſe diſappointed in his endeavours to prevail with the ſtates of France, who were then ſitting at Paris, to order the publication of the decrees of the council of Trent. He endeavours to cauſe the council of Trent to be received in France. A. D. 1615.
c Though the clergy, who were zealous in the intereſt of the court of France, had gained the nobility, yet they were both oppoſed by the third eſtate, whoſe delegates made a motion for treating of the extent of the pope's authority over kings. But as that diſpute would have only kept alive the factions in the kingdom, they were oppoſed by the two other eſtates; who, on that account, received congratulatory briefs from the pope [g]. Paul in the mean time received a letter from the biſhop of Paphlagonia, acknowleging his ſupremacy; and a few months after two ambaſſadors arrived at Rome from Japan, one of whom was a noble Japaneſe, and the other a Spaniſh friar of the order of St. Francis, who had converted one of the kings in that diſtant country. Thoſe ambaſſadors requeſted of the pope, that he would ſend a greater number of miſſionaries into that kingdom to convert the infidels, d and mentioned ſeveral other particulars, which are fully related by the continuator of Thuanus [h]. An ambaſſador extraordinary alſo about the ſame time arrived at Rome from France, who ſolemnly yielded obedience to the pope, in the king's name.

The following year the pope endeavoured to mediate a peace betwixt the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy, who, though a few months before they had agreed to an accommodation, now renewed hoſtilities with greater animoſity. His attention, however, was much more engaged with a controverſy betwixt the Dominicans and Franciſcans, about the immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin. Ever ſince the beginning of the former century, there had been great diſputes among the papiſts about this very important point; but they had never been carried to ſo great a height as at preſent. The Dominicans maintained the e affirmative, and the Franciſcans ſupported the negative; but both parties were tranſported with ſuch animoſity and furious zeal, that Spain was almoſt engaged in a religious civil war on their account. The catholic king, to prevent the fatal effects of this blind conteſt, preſſed the pope, by repeated embaſſies, to give an authoritative deciſion of the queſtion in diſpute; but all that he could obtain of Paul was a renovation of the conſtitutions of Sixtus IV. and Pius V. on that ſubject, with more ſevere ſanctions than formerly; to which the next year, in the month of Auguſt, he added a decree, prohibiting abſolutely any one A. D. 1617. from teaching, or aſſerting publicly, that the Holy Virgin was conceived in original ſin, although, at the ſame time, he allowed every one to believe any ſide of the diſpute they pleaſed [i]. Great diſputes about the immaculate conception of the virgin Mary.

f By this means he, in ſome meaſure, put a ſtop to the animoſities in Spain; but quickly after he was engaged in another diſpute with the court of France, on account of the poſſeſſions of marſhal D'Ancre at Rome. As that Florentine, by the abuſe of his power, had acquired immenſe wealth, which he laid out in purchaſes at Florence and Rome, the parliament of Paris, after his murder, which happened in the end of April, declared him a traitor, and confiſcated for the uſe of the king, all the eſtates that he had acquired, whether within or without the kingdom. In conſequence of this parliamentary decree, the archbiſhop of Lyons demanded, for the uſe of the French king, all the eſtates which the late marſhal poſſeſſed at Rome. This arrogant demand was at firſt treated with contempt by the pope; but at length, after many propoſitions, he agreed to a partition of the eſtate with Lewis XIII. in ſuch a g manner, that of the whole, which amounted to 425,000 livres, the king ſhould have 250,000, and the remaining 175,000 should be left to the pope, to be appropriated by him to the building of St. Peter's church [k]. This treaty of the partition of the succession of D'Ancre was concluded about a year after his death, which had occasioned great revolutions at the court of France. The queen regent was obliged to retire to Blois, and Richelieu, bishop of Luçon, one of the late marshal's creatures, was ordered to quit the kingdom. He retired to Avignon, where he was at first countenanced by the pope, who interceded for him as a persecuted bishop; but the French ambassador at Rome, by order of the king, representing that some of the bishop's intrigues had been discovered prejudicial to the state, Paul ceased to interest himself in his behalf, though he allowed him still to reside in his territories. a

An universal jubilee published at Rome. A. D. 1619.

In the mean time he employed himself in confirming several monkish orders; and, in the beginning of the following year, he published an universal jubilee, for imploring the assistance of God for the defence of the church, which was endangered by a general insurrection of the protestants in Bohemia and the other countries under the Austrian dominion. They had been provoked to take arms, on account of the oppression which they suffered from the emperor Matthias, by the instigation of his cousin Ferdinand, arch-duke of Gratz, who a few years before had been declared heir of the crown of Bohemia by the States. Ferdinand, a few weeks after the publication of the jubilee, succeeding to all his cousin's hereditary dominions, and not long after being elected emperor, endeavoured to prevail with the rebels in Bohemia to hearken to an accommodation, by offering them a full confirmation of all their privileges; but they, distrusting his sincerity, rejected his offers, chose the elector palatine for their king, and entered into an alliance with the protestants in Hungary, Austria, Moravia, Silesia, and Lusace, who were also in arms. The pope, alarmed at this powerful confederacy, gave assistance in money to the emperor; who, the following year, gained a decisive victory over his competitor in the neighbourhood of Prague, which secured to him the possession of Bohemia, and obliged the other rebels to submit [l]. b c

The death of Paul. A. D. 1621.

PAUL survived the news of this victory only a few months, and died at Rome on the 28th of January, in the 69th year of his age, and the 16th of his pontificate. He is greatly commended by father Hyacynthe de Graveson, who was a dependent of his nephew Mark Anthony Borghese [m]. But he is represented in a very different light by Nicholas de Marbais, doctor in divinity, who complains he had bought lands for his nephew to the value of 2,000,000 of crowns, which sum he had raised by distressing the clergy, as he conferred no benefices without reserving a part of it as a pension to some person whom he had not the confidence to name; that he did not regulate his conduct according to the laws and canons of the Roman church, the rights and jurisdiction of which he entirely neglected; that the ecclesiastical immunities were not only trampled upon in France and Spain, but also at Florence and Naples, and in the Milanese; that in Spain and Naples, if any criminal took sanctuary in the churches and monasteries, he was dragged from thence to the magistrates by force and violence, who contemned the pope's bull prohibiting such proceedings under pain of excommunication. The false pope Paul, he says, left the administration of affairs entirely to his nephew Borghese, who opened the letters of the legates and nuncios, and answered them in the pope's name. He countenanced licentiousness and debauchery among the cardinals, bishops, and other prelates, that they might not reproach him with his own crimes; and all of them lived, not like Christians, but like the corrupt heathens of antient Rome. To procure the pontificate to his nephew Borghese, he created a great many young and worthless cardinals, of mean birth and no education, whom he kept needy and dependent, hoping to survive all the antient cardinals, and to renew the whole sacred college before his death [n]. d e

After the celebration of the funeral obsequies of Paul V. which, according to custom, continued nine days, on the 8th of February fifty-two cardinals entered the conclave in procession, where the different factions immediately began to cabal. The most antient party was that of Montalto, the second of Aldobrandino, the third was the Spanish, and the fourth the French faction. Some cardinals, such as Bonti, Sforza, Farnese, Medici, and Este, formed small parties of their own: but the most powerful of all was that of Borghese, who was confident of carrying the election in favour of cardinal Campora. That candidate, however, being disagreeable to the other parties, they united together; so that Borghese could not obtain a legal majority of votes, and Campora, who before the shutting of the conclave began to assume the state and dignity of a pope, suffered a most mortifying disappointment. Borghese finding his intrigues in favour of Campora ineffectual, proposed cardinal Ludovisio, who, being approved of immediately by almost the whole conclave, was conducted to the Pauline chapel, where he was unanimously elected and adorned that same evening, and as- f

A few days after he was crowned with the uſual pomp in St. Peter's church, and made a grand proceſſion to that of St. John di Lateran, to take poſſeſſion of the ſovereign power of the church; after which ceremonies he publiſhed an univerſal jubilee, to implore the divine bleſſing upon his government [p], and perhaps to bring in ſome money into his coffers, which was alſo probably his motive for creating ſeveral new ſaints, having in his ſhort pontificate canonized Ignatius Loyola, Francis Xavier, Lewis Gonzaga, Staniſlaus Kolka, Iſodore Agricola a Spaniard, Ambroſe Sonſedan of Siena, James de Salomiome a Venetian, Philip de Neri, founder of the fathers of the oratory, and Thereſa, the reformer of the order of the Carmelites [q].

As the Hugonots in France, on account of the violation of the edict of Nantz, about this
b time again had recourſe to arms, Gregory wrote to the young king, exhorting him to root them out and deſtroy them; which letter was accompanied with a bull, animating the papiſts to riſe up againſt them. For that purpoſe he likewiſe ſent into France a Spaniſh Carmelite friar, one Dominicus de Jeſu Maria, a moſt cunning hypocrite, who had acquired a great reputation for ſanctity among the ignorant people [r] (W). While this impoſtor was fomenting the civil diſſenſions in France, Gregory publiſhed a bull, preſcribing a new form of election of a pope, altering the manner of giving the votes publicly, and allowing the cardinals to give their ſuffrages ſecretly, by way of ſcrutiny, which would prevent the chiefs of parties from having ſo great an influence.

He excites the king of France againſt the Hugonots.

In the ſecond year of his pontificate he publiſhed a bull, amplifying that of his predeceſſor,

About the ſame time likewiſe he eſtabliſhed the congregation de propaganda fide; and, at the deſire of Lewis XIII. he erected the ſee of Paris into an archbiſhopric, ſubjecting to its juriſdiction the biſhoprics of Chartres, Orleans, and Meaux. As the war ſtill continued in Germany betwixt the emperor and ſeveral princes, who eſpouſed the cauſe of the elector palatine, the pope ſent a reinforcement of troops to the former, who conquering the Palatinate that campaign, ſent the famous library of manuſcripts at Heydelberg to Rome, where the greateſt part of the books never arrived, the beſt of them being privately picked out, and many of the reſt loſt at ſea [s]. Gregory not only aſſiſted the emperor, and ex-
d cited the king of France againſt the proteſtants, but deſigned likewiſe to extirpate hereſy from Geneva, and ſollicited Lewis XIII. to allow the duke of Savoy to ſeize that city. He quarrelled alſo with the Venetians, for granting a church, and the free exerciſe of the Greek religion, to ſome Greek ſoldiers whom they had taken into their ſervice [t].

As James I. of England diſcovered great earneſtneſs to conclude an alliance betwixt his ſon the prince of Wales and an infanta of Spain, Gregory laid hold of that opportunity to advance the intereſt of the catholic religion in England. He refuſed to grant a diſpenſation for the marriage, unleſs it ſhould be celebrated in Spain, according to the rites of the Romiſh church; and that the eccleſiaſtics of the infanta ſhould all be Spaniards, and ſubject to a biſhop; and that, beſides the queen's chapel, the papiſts ſhould be allowed to build a church

King James agreeing to theſe conditions, the abhorrence of the Spaniards to the match was greatly leſſened. Gregory, after conſulting the cardinals, granted the diſpenſation, and wrote to the prince of Wales, exhorting him to enter into the boſom of the church. As he was informed of his arrival in Spain before the diſpenſation was expedited, he added new articles to the brief, and inſiſted that the children of the marriage ſhould be educated by the

(U) Gregory XV. whoſe former name was Alexander Ludoviſio, was born at Bologna, of an illuſtrious family, which had been aſſociated among the Neapolitan nobility by Jane, queen of Naples. He was in his youth educated in the Jeſuits college at Rome; and returning afterwards to Bologna, he there ſtudied the civil law, in which he arrived at the degree of doctor. Settling afterwards at Rome, he acquired the friendſhip of the three popes, Gregory XIV. Clement VIII. and Paul V. the laſt of whom conferred upon him the biſhopric of Bologna, created him cardinal, and appointed him his nuncio to adjuſt the differences betwixt the Spaniards and the duke of Savoy (1).

(W) He had attended the emperor's army in Bohemia, and the victory of Prague was, in a great meaſure, owing to him, as he run up and down among the imperial troops, during the engagement, with a crucifix in his hand, animating them to the combat. He was ſent to Rome by the emperor with ſome booty and ſtandards taken from the enemy, and the pope now thought him a fit agent to inflame the French papiſts againſt the Hugonots. As he impudently pretended to the gift of miracles, and undertook to cure all manner of diſeaſes in France, he was continually attended with great numbers of people, who cut off pieces of his cloak, and publiſhed every where that it was not diminiſhed. At laſt his impoſtures were detected and expoſed by Richer, a ſyndic and doctor of the faculty of divinity at Paris, who a few years before had acquired a great reputation, and had incurred the reſentment of the eccleſiaſtics by a book that he had publiſhed, De eccleſiaſtica & politica poteſtate (2).

queen, till they were ten years of age, and that the king of Great Britain ſhould immediately give ſecurity to the papiſts in his dominions, for the quiet poſſeſſion of their eſtates, and for liberty of conſcience. Theſe new articles occaſioned ſome difficulties, which the king with great zeal was endeavouring to remove; but, in the midſt of the negotiation, the affair was again ſuſpended by the death of the pope [u]. a receives the depoſite of the Valteline, and dies at Rome.

DURING this negotiation the pope was ſollicited by the Spaniards to accept of the depoſite of the Valteline. About two years before they had aſſiſted the papiſts in that valley to maſſacre the proteſtants; but as it was a convenient paſs from Germany and France, they thought proper to raiſe forces, and to keep poſſeſſion of the country. This uſurpation alarming the French, Venetians, and duke of Savoy, they concluded a league, to compel the Spaniards to leave the inhabitants of that valley free, which induced the uſurpers, who were apprehenſive of the power of the league, to reſign their conqueſt into the hands of the pope, till their pretenſions to that territory ſhould be fully diſcuſſed. As the French and Venetians, after ſome oppoſition, agreed to that propoſal, Gregory ſent his nephew, the duke of Fano, with a ſmall body of troops, who took poſſeſſion of the forts in the valley [w]. The pope ſurvived this tranſaction only a few weeks, and died on the 8th of July, in the 70th year of his age. He is commended for his charity to the ſick and to the poor, and, according to the Spaniſh writers, was eminent for his piety and learning. During his ſhort pontificate he created eleven cardinals, among whom was Richelieu, biſhop of Luçon in France. b

ON the 19th of July fifty-four cardinals entered the conclave for the election of the new pope. As there were a great many cardinals, who for their age, virtues, and abilities, might expect the pontificate, and as the new bull of Gregory was to be obſerved, it was generally ſuppoſed that the election would be very tedious, and that the conteſts among the competitors would be very warm. The chiefs of the moſt powerful factions were Borgheſe, and Ludoviſio, nephew of the late pope, and they both, after ſome canvaſſing and intrigues, which it would be needleſs to particularize, agreed to join their intereſt in favour of cardinal Barberini. His great merit was univerſally allowed; but as he had always acted with a free independent ſpirit, and ſpoke his ſentiments with great freedom, he had, unwarily, offended ſome of the old cardinals, who beſides objected to him on account of his youth, as he was then only in the 55th year of his age. However, no other cardinal could raiſe an intereſt of any conſequence; and though he himſelf diſcovered no marks of precipitancy and eagerneſs, but on the contrary acted with great modeſty and reſerve, he was elected on the 6th of Auguſt, by the ſuffrages of fifty cardinals, when he aſſumed the name of Urban VIII [x] (X). As he was attacked with a violent fever a few days after his election, his coronation was deferred till the 29th of September, the feaſt of St. Michael, whom the popes generally take for their guardian, and to whom Urban particularly erected an image in bronze, upon the altar of Sancta Petronella in St. Peter's church, with his own image kneeling before it, and the inſcription, Te mane, te veſpere. He began his pontificate with ordering the prayers of forty hours to be put up to God, for imploring his bleſſing upon his government, and endeavoured to reſtore and ſettle the peace of the city, which had been diſturbed by a violent ſedition during the conclave [y]. He likewiſe publiſhed the bull for the canonization of the ſaints nominated by his predeceſſor (Y) and increaſed their number with eight new ones of his own nomination [z]. c

(X) Maffeo Barberini, or Urban VIII. was born of an antient noble family at Florence, which had flouriſhed in that city and its neighbourhood for ſeveral centuries. He was educated in his youth with great care, and early diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to learning and virtue. When he was only twenty-one years of age he was admired and eſteemed by Sixtus V. who made him referendary. He went afterwards through many degrees of preferment with great reputation and applauſe. He was twice nuncio in France. Paul V. created him a cardinal, conferred upon him the archbiſhopric of Spoleto, and appointed him his legate at Bologna, where he reſided three years. Before his promotion to the pontificate, he had acquired a great reputation for learning and taſte, and was reckoned one of the beſt Latin and Italian poets of his time. His moſt conſiderable pieces are paraphraſes upon ſome pſalms, and other places of the Old and New Teſtament, hymns and odes upon the feaſts of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and other ſaints, and epigrams on ſeveral illuſtrious men. His odes are particularly commended for their purity, and were ſo agreeable to the Jeſuits, that they taught them in their ſchools, even during the life of the pope, as if they had been the work of a claſſic author. He corrected the barbarous hymns of the Romiſh church; and in an elegy prefixed to his works, he adviſed his cotemporaries to compoſe poems on pious ſubjects. Though he did not, as ſovereign pontiff, prohibit publiſhing poems on profane ſubjects, yet he is ſaid ſo ſeverely to have reprehended an author who preſented him with an indecent poem, that he died of confuſion (1). During his whole pontificate he was a great protector of men of learning and genius, though he treated falſe pretenders with contempt and ridicule. To one Ruſticus, archbiſhop of Rouen, who dedicated a huge inſignificant volume to him, he replied by a line from Diſpanter's grammar,---Sufrimit Urbanus quæ Ruſticus edit inepte (2).

(Y) He appointed the feaſt of Ignatius Loyola on the 31ſt of July, which day had been previouſly occupied by St. Germain, whoſe name the Jeſuits blotted out of the calendar, a He did not neglect to dignify and enrich his relations. He conferred his own cardinal's hat upon one of his brothers, Anthony, a capuchin, who, after his promotion, ſtill obſerved the ſtrict rules of his order, and ſpent the greateſt part of his time with his brother monks in a convent, which he built in the city. Urban alſo conferred the dignity of cardinal upon two of the ſons of his other ſurviving brother Charles, whom he loaded with benefices and penſions: for a third nephew he revived the office of prefect of Rome, which he conferred upon him, with great power and authority; and near the quirinal he built a vaſt and magnificent palace, with fine gardens, for the family of Barberini, purchaſing alſo for them large eſtates [a], among which is that of Paleſtrina, which they enjoy at this day, under the title of a principality.

He confers honours and wealth on his relations.

b As the prince of Wales was ſtill in Spain, Urban, before he would grant the diſpenſation for his marriage, wrote to him, and to his father king James, exhorting them to embrace the faith of their anceſtors. As they had both advanced ſo far inconſiderately, he was in hopes of their compliance; but he was diſappointed by the ſudden departure of the prince from Spain, who having conceived a diſlike to the match, broke off the negociation. King James immediately after publiſhed an order, commanding all the popiſh clergy to quit Britain and Ireland, and all the papiſts in his dominions to deliver up their arms. However, with great inconſtancy, he again thought of a popiſh alliance for his ſon; and for that purpoſe ſent an embaſſy to France, to negociate a treaty of marriage betwixt the prince of Wales and the princeſs Henrietta Maria. Urban, afraid of the conſequences of an union betwixt Great Bri-
c tain and France, oppoſed this match with great earneſtneſs, and declared that he would never grant the diſpenſation. The articles of marriage were, nevertheleſs, agreed upon; and Lewis XIII. aſſuring the pope that he would not, on that account, grant any protection to the heretics, Urban at length conſented to ſend the diſpenſation [b].

He exhorts the king of England and his ſon to embrace the popiſh religion. A. D. 1624.

In the mean time he endeavoured to put an end to the diſpute betwixt the French and Spaniards, with regard to the poſſeſſion of the Valteline; and for that purpoſe propoſed ſome articles of accommodatian to both parties, which were rejected by Lewis XIII. as being too favourable to the Spaniards. During this troubleſome negociation, Urban renewed the bull of Pius V. againſt the alienation of church-lands, and appointed a ſelect number of grave and religious men to viſit the monaſteries, colleges, hoſpitals, and other public places, to inſpect
d their abuſes and irregularities, and to give a weekly account to him of their proceedings [c]. He likewiſe publiſhed a bull for the celebration of an univerſal jubilee the following year at Rome; but before the commencement of this feſtival, he was alarmed with the news that the marquis de Cœuvres, the French ambaſſador in Switzerland, had invaded the Valteline. Without any regard to the pope's flag, the marquis entered the valley in the end of November, and in leſs than two months reduced all the forts. The pope made loud complaints againſt this proceeding by his nuncio at the court of France, and ſent another nuncio to Paris to demand ſatisfaction. A ſuſpenſion of arms, with regard to the Valteline, was granted for two months; but as the duke of Savoy had begun a war againſt the Genoeſe, in which he was aſſiſted by the French, the pope was ſtill very uneaſy; and being deſirous to put a ſtop to the diſturbances
e in Italy, he recalled the nuncio who had lately gone to France, and in his room he ſent his nephew cardinal Francis Barberini, in the character of legate a latere, to accommodate the differences which had occaſioned a war in Italy. The legate was received at Paris with great honour; but after ſeveral conferences, finding that he could expect no ſucceſs from his negotiation, he returned in the month of September to Rome [d].

A few months after, Urban ſent his nephew legate a latere to Spain, to endeavour to negociate a peace in that kingdom, and to ſtand as godfather to the king's daughter. In the mean time he raiſed 6000 troops, which he ſent towards the Valteline, to aſſiſt the Spaniards and Germans againſt the French. However, theſe proceedings were unneceſſary; for cardinal Richelieu being afraid of the conſpiracy, which ſoon after broke out, willingly agreed to a

The peace was accordingly concluded betwixt the two nations at Monçon, a town in Arragon, without conſulting the legate, whom they deceived by dating the concluſion of the treaty two months before his arrival [e]. Urban expreſſed no reſentment for this neglect of his legate and nephew, but, on the contrary, declared to the French ambaſſador at Rome, that he rejoiced greatly at

MEAN while Urban made a promotion of twelve cardinals, and sent cardinal Gipsius to take possession of the duchy of Urbino, at the desire of the duke Francis Maria Rovere, who having no male heirs, and being near eighty years of age, agreed to deliver up his fief to the apostolic see before his death, in consideration of 100,000 crowns for military stores and artillery [f]. The pope was also very sollicitous, by means of his nuncio at London, to convert king Charles, who was generally believed to have an inclination to the popish religion, which he dissembled from political views. Though his nuncio was obliged to quit the kingdom, he still found means to prevail with the king to shew some favour to the papists: and being very zealous for subjecting England to the apostolic see, he desired all those who were qualified to inform him, to give him their advice in writing, how such a re-union could be most conveniently accomplished (Z). He was greatly deceived in his expectations from Charles, king of England; for that same year he sent back the French domestics that had accompanied his queen; and, at the intreaty of the Hugonots in France, he provided a fleet and army for their assistance, which the following year made a descent upon the isle of Rhee, from whence they were obliged to retire with considerable loss. Urban hearing of the defeat of the English army, wrote a congratulatory brief to Lewis XIII. He likewise congratulated him the year after upon the reduction of Rochelle; for which event he expressed his joy by composing an epigram upon the king, and going in procession with the cardinals to the church of St. Lewis, where he celebrated mass, and returned solemn thanks to God [g]. While the French king was engaged in this siege, Urban in the month of April published an universal jubilee, for imploring success to his arms, and prosperity to the church. About the same time he offered his mediation to terminate the differences betwixt the duke of Nevers, who had succeeded to Mantua and Montferrat, and the dukes of Savoy and Guastalla, who formed pretensions to that succession. As he could not prevail with the duke of Savoy and the Spaniards to lay down their arms, and refer the dispute to his arbitration, he sollicited Lewis XIII. to march into Italy, promising to act in concert with him in defence of the duke of Mantua. Lewis willingly hearkened to the pope's proposal; and while he was engaged in the siege, his ambassador at Rome offered the plan of a league to be concluded betwixt himself, the pope, and the Venetians. Though Urban was very desirous to see the duke of Mantua in peaceable possession of his territories, yet his apprehensions of the resentment of the Spaniards made him decline entering into the league; and he continued in the same sentiments the following year, notwithstanding the success of the king of France, who in the month of February forced the passes of the Alps with a powerful army, and took possession of Susa. The presence of the French king quickly obliged the duke of Savoy to come to an accommodation with the duke of Mantua, and forced the Spaniards to retire from before Casal: the pope, nevertheless, could not be prevailed upon to sign a defensive alliance against the house of Austria, which Lewis again proposed to him: and though the war continued for some time in Italy, occasioned by the emperor's rejecting the accommodation planned by the French king, and claiming the ultimate decision of the dispute as supreme lord of the fief, Urban still persisted in his resolution of observing a neutrality. Lewis XIII. being obliged to march back into France against the Hugonots, the Spaniards renewed the siege of Casal; and an imperial army entering Italy, invaded the duchy of Mantua, and laid siege to the city of that name. Urban, with great sollicitations, endeavoured by his legates and nuncios to effect an accommodation; but, at the same time, he imprudently contributed to the continuation of the war, by allowing the imperialists before Mantua, who were reduced to great distress, to purchase provisions in the ecclesiastical state. By this means they were enabled to lie all winter before the city, which they took by treachery and surprize the following year, in the month of July [h].

a ing drawn ſwords to his throat, compelled him to ſign and ſeal a declaration, by which he acknowleged the Roman ſee the infallible judge of truth, and ſubmitted his book to the judgment of his holineſs [k]. The pope, a few days after receiving this declaration, ſent a hat to the archbiſhop Richelieu, who was diſtinguiſhed from his brother by the title of cardinal of Lyons. Urban a few weeks after publiſhed a bull, on the 15th of January, for ſuppreſſing a new order which began to appear in Italy, and was compoſed of ſome female diſciples of the Jeſuits, who aſſumed the name of Jeſuiteſſes.

AT the ſame time he continued his endeavours to conclude a peace in Italy, and for that purpoſe ſent his nephew Anthony Barberini and cardinal Mazarine, the one as legate, and the other as nuncio, to Pignerol, to negociate with cardinal Richelieu. The conferences were then b ineffectual, and in the end of April the legate returned to Bologna; but the loſs of Mantua, and the death of the duke of Savoy, and Spinola the Spaniſh general, which happened a few months after, made a great alteration in affairs. The Spaniards beginning to be apprehenſive of the power of the imperialiſts in Italy, and the duke ſeeing his territories entirely in poſſeſſion of the French, began willingly to hearken to a peace, which was at length concluded on the 26th of October, by the unwearied endeavours of the nuncio Mazarine [l]; and by which, among other articles, it was agreed, that the dukes of Savoy and Mantua ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of their reſpective territories. Mean while the pope, by a conſiſtorial decree, conferred the title of Moſt eminent and moſt reverend upon the cardinals, becauſe that of moſt illuſtrious was then become too common. He prohibited all other eccleſiaſtics from c aſſuming this new title, excepting the three eccleſiaſtical electors of Germany, and the maſter of the knights hoſpitallers of Jeruſalem [m].

A peace concluded in Italy.

As Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, had about this time entered Germany with a powerful army, to defend the proteſtants, who were oppreſſed by the emperor, Lewis XIII. entered into an alliance with him, in hopes of humbling the overgrown power of the Auſtrian family. This alliance with the heretical prince gave great offence to the pope; and the following year he made many remonſtrances againſt it to the French king, who wrote to the pope with his own hand, offering to renounce his alliance with the Swedes, if the king of Spain would withdraw his protection from his brother the duke of Orleans, who in diſcontent had retired to Bruſſels, and would join his forces to thoſe of France, in order to extirpate d the French Hugonots, and the German proteſtants. Urban communicated this letter to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who immediately wrote concerning it to Madrid, from whence, however, he received no anſwer [n]. In the mean time the king of Sweden defeated the imperial army at Leipſic; and by that time the elector of Saxony had entered Bohemia and taken Prague, he had over-run all Germany from the Elbe to the Rhine. This rapid progreſs confounded the emperor, and greatly alarmed the pope, who did his utmoſt by his legates, exhortations, and letters, in ſupport of the catholic cauſe. According to Spondanus, he likewiſe gave ſupplies in money [o]; though other authors affirm, that he intereſted himſelf but very little in the German war, which ſeems to have been the opinion of the court of Spain; for in the month of March, cardinal Borgia preſented a formal proteſt to the pope, in e the name of the catholic king, declaring, that whatever damage the catholic religion had ſuffered, or ſhould ſuffer, could not be aſcribed to Philip, but to his holineſs.

The houſe of Auſtria complain againſt the pope; A. D. 1632.

URBAN is likewiſe ſaid to have given but a cold reception to a cardinal and ambaſſador extraordinary ſent to him by the emperor, to demand aſſiſtance in troops and money. He declared, that the treaſures of the church had been exhauſted by the late war in Italy; and that if the imperial troops, which had unjuſtly ravaged the Mantuan territories, had been employed againſt the Swedes, the emperor would not have needed any foreign aſſiſtance. He abſolutely refuſed to publiſh a cruſade againſt Guſtavus; but he granted the emperor 100,000 crowns, promiſed to endeavour to detach the French king from his alliance with the Swedes, and publiſhed an univerſal jubilee for the proſperity of the catholic religion in f Germany [p]. As he declared in a full conſiſtory, that the Spaniards, by their unbounded ambition, obliged even good catholics to rejoice at the victories of an heretic, the imperial and Spaniſh miniſters at Rome endeavoured to perſuade the cardinals to call a general council to depoſe him [q]. Their endeavours, however, were ineffectual; the temporal power and grandeur of the pope rendering ſuch an attempt ridiculous, eſpecially as Urban about the ſame time, by his diſintereſtedneſs, had greatly raiſed his character among the Romans. Though, by the death of the duke of Urbino, he had then entered into the peaceable poſſeſſion of that duchy, he nevertheleſs refuſed to give the inveſtiture of it to any of his nephews, and, contrary to the perſuaſions of the Italian princes, united the whole territories of the late duke to

The reſentment for the pope's conduct was indeed very high in Spain, where even ſome of the Jeſuits declared againſt him. The king's council alſo deliberated about depriving his holineſs of all collation to benefices in that kingdom, and propoſed to erect a datary in Spain, to prevent any money from being carried to Rome: however, their reſentment cooled upon the death of Guſtavus, who was ſlain at the battle of Lutzen on the 16th of November [s]. a

A rupture betwixt him and the Venetians. A. D. 1633.

NOT long after the pope had a rupture with the Venetian republic, occaſioned firſt by a public affront given by one of his nephews to the Venetian ambaſſador at Rome; on which account the republic ordered their ambaſſador to return without taking leave. They, in their turn, had offended the pope, by refuſing to give the title of Eminence to the cardinals; but what chiefly irritated both parties, was a conteſt about the navigation of the Po, which had been obſtructed by the legate at Ferrara. Some ſkirmiſhes had happened in the neighbourhood of this city betwixt the Romans and Venetians; but the pope being apprehenſive of a war, willingly accepted the mediation of the duke of Crequi, the French ambaſſador, who, about the middle of June, arrived at Rome with a ſplendid retinue, to yield obedience to the pope in the king's name. Crequi made great profeſſions of the attachment of Lewis XIII. to his holineſs; but not being able to prevail with Urban to engage in a defenſive alliance with France, he left Rome, and proceeded to Venice, where, in conjunction with the ſieur de la Thuilerie, the French ambaſſador to the republic, he entered into a negotiation with the Venetian deputies [t]. The pope, in the mean time, made an encroachment upon the liberties of the Gallican church, by naming commiſſaries to judge ſix biſhops, who were accuſed of favouring a rebellion, which the year before had been raiſed by the dukes of Orleans and Montmorency. This proceeding, however, was not in the leaſt oppoſed by the court or clergy of France; but, on the contrary, Richelieu was ſuppoſed to have deſired the commiſſion from Rome, that his power and authority might ſeem to be countenanced by the pope, whoſe friendſhip he was at great pains to ſecure, that the imperialiſts and Spaniards might be deprived of the papal intereſt [u]. b c

The French offer their mediation.

A. D. 1634.

THE following year Urban ſent Mazarine, his vice legate at Avignon, as nuncio extraordinary to France, in order to be fully ſatisfied with regard to the origin of the war in Germany, and the complaints of the houſe of Auſtria againſt the French, for granting protection to the elector of Triers. During his reſidence in that kingdom, Urban publiſhed a bull, renewing the decrees of the council of Trent, and of the following popes, for the reſidence of biſhops, ordering all biſhops, archbiſhops, patriarchs, and cardinals, to reſide in their own dioceſes, and not to depart from thence without an apoſtolic licence. By this new conſtitution Urban intended civilly to remove from Rome and Italy ſome cardinals and prelates, who endeavoured to oblige him to declare himſelf a party in the preſent war [w]. Far from engaging warmly in the diſputes in Germany, he ſeemed not even greatly to reſent the impriſonment of the elector of Triers, who in the month of March, was ſurpriſed in his capital by the Spaniards, and carried priſoner to Bruſſels. The elector had inflamed the reſentment of the houſe of Auſtria againſt him, by embracing a neutrality upon the invaſion of the Swedes, and putting his territories under the protection of the French, who had a garriſon in Triers, when it was ſurpriſed by the Spaniards. The French inſiſted upon the liberty of the archbiſhop, who had never been declared an enemy, or put to the ban of the empire; and, upon the refuſal of the Spaniards, immediately declared war againſt them. d

The pope offers his mediation betwixt the kings of France and Spain.

MAZARINE, who was ſtill in France, wrote to the pope, that, by his mediation, the differences betwixt the two crowns might be eaſily accommodated. In conſequence of this letter, Urban immediately ſent an order to Mazarine, and to his nuncio Bolognetti, to act as mediators; but he quickly found, that the two kingdoms were too much animated againſt each other, to hearken at that time to an accommodation: he therefore continued in his former reſolution, of ſtrictly adhering to a neutrality, though he was again ſollicited by the French to enter into a defenſive alliance with them [x]. About the ſame time, he ordered his two nuncios at Paris to complain to the king againſt the proceeding of Richelieu, who had procured ſeveral biſhops to annul the marriage of the duke of Orleans with the ſiſter of the duke of Lorrain, as contracted without the knowlege of his brother the king. The pope intereſted himſelf in that affair, at the deſire of the queen mother and the ducheſs of Orleans, who were then refugees at Antwerp; but all that he could obtain from the court of France was a long memorial, preſented by the biſhop of Montpelier, urging the abſolute neceſſity of annulling the marriage, which had been contracted contrary to the fundamental laws of the kingdom [y]. e f g a THE great power and arbitrary behaviour of Richelieu began to give ſome uneaſineſs and jealouſy to the pope, who was apprehenſive leſt he ſhould aſſume the title and dignity of patriarch, as he had taken poſſeſſion of all the regular abbies, which in France are chiefs of orders. The following year, therefore, he refuſed him the bulls which he demanded for the abbies of Ciſteaux and Premontre; and recalled Mazarine, who, he was informed, was devoted to the ſervice of the cardinal duke. Though Richelieu deſired that he might be ſent to Madrid, on pretence of negotiating a peace, but in reality to be his ſpy at that court, Urban would not conſent, but ordered him to return to his legation at Avignon [z]. In reſentment for theſe mortifications, Richelieu recalled the count de Noailles from Rome, and ſent the marſhal d'Etrees in his place, who he knew was not agreeable to the pope, and much b leſs to the Spaniſh faction at Rome.

He is jealous of the power of Richelieu. A. D. 1636.

D'ETREES was ordered to complain to the pope of his great ſeverity to his vaſſal the duke of Parma, whom he had threatened with excommunication, for eſpouſing the French party in Italy. Urban at firſt refuſed to acknowlege the marſhal as an ambaſſador; but even after he had granted him an audience, he would give him no ſatisfaction with regard to his difference with the duke of Parma (A). The pope's nephews, particularly cardinal Francis, at that time had a ſecret pique againſt the duke of Parma, who it ſeems had not paid his court to them ſo aſſiduouſly as they expected. They had alſo deſired that the duke ſhould contract an alliance in their family, on which account they had prevailed with him to viſit the pope at Rome, and promiſed him an abatement of the intereſt of a large c ſum of money, which his father had borrowed from a public bank in the city. As the pope attributed to himſelf the power of lowering the intereſt borrowed from the public banks, the duke eaſily obtained the abatement which he deſired; nevertheleſs ſome difference happening betwixt him and the cardinal nephews, about ceremony, he rejected the propoſed alliance, and left Rome without taking leave. He ſoon after married a princeſs of the houſe of Medicis; on which account he incurred the reſentment of the pope and his nephews, who reſolved to make him ſenſible of their power. As he had mortgaged the duchy of Caſtro, a fief of the apoſtolic ſee, for the money which he had borrowed, and paid the annual intereſt in corn from that duchy, which the miniſters of the apoſtolic chamber, who had the care of ſupplying the public granaries of the city, received inſtead d of money, the nephews prohibited any corn from Caſtro from entering the eccleſiaſtical ſtate: they likewiſe allowed the intereſt to run in arrear for two or three years; at the end of which time they made a demand of the whole, which the duke was not able to ſatisfy; on which account the whole duchy of Caſtro was confiſcated, and Taddeo, prefect of Rome, ſeized upon it with an armed force. The viceroy of Naples and the grand duke of Tuſcany interceded for the duke, who found himſelf unable to oppoſe the army, and was apprehenſive of being attacked in his dominions of Parma and Placentia. The ſenate of Venice likewiſe offered their mediation; but Urban ſcorned to admit of any interceſſions betwixt him and his vaſſal; declared the duke to be deprived of his dominions and fiefs, in conſequence of having incurred the ſentence of greater excommunication; and condemned him alſo to e pay all the expences of the war. In purſuance of this ſentence, the duke's palaces and goods in Rome were expoſed to ſale, and the duchy of Caſtro was taken into the poſſeſſion of the Camera, though not annexed to the popedom. Towards the end of the year likewiſe, Urban demanded a paſſage for his army, conſiſting of 20,000 men through the dominions of the the duke of Modena, with the intention of carrying the war into the duchy of Parma.

Difference betwixt the pope and the duke of Parma; which proceeds to an open rupture.

A. D. 1641.

DURING theſe confuſions in Italy, the pope had ſent cardinal Ginetti to the congreſs, which was eſtabliſhed at Cologn for negotiating a peace betwixt the emperor, French, Spaniards, and Swedes. He had alſo received the filial obedience from the emperor Ferdinand III. though the legality of his election was not a little conteſted in Germany; and had ſome diſputes with the cardinal Richelieu, who being diſobliged with him for refuſing the cardif nal's hat to Mazarine, and denying to grant the bulls for the abbies of Ciſtaux and Premontre, would not receive his nuncio in France. At length the difference betwixt the pope and the French court was accommodated; and about the time that he demanded a paſſage for his army through the Modeneſe, he made a promotion of cardinals, when he conferred a hat upon Mazarine [a]. About the ſame time he publiſhed a bull, condemning all the books of

But the chief concern of the pope at this time was the war with the duke of Parma, which began to engage him in difficulties, that, in the beginning of the rupture, he had not expected. Though he had obtained leave of a free paſſage for his army from the duke of Modena, yet the Venetians and duke of Tuſcany having aſſiſted the duke with money and troops, he found it impoſſible to advance, as his raw men, from their dread of a new enemy, deſerted in great numbers. In theſe circumſtances the pope inconſiderately made an offer of a ſuſpenſion of arms for fifteen days, during which time the Venetians, the grand duke, and b

the duke of Mantua, entered into a formal alliance to aſſiſt the duke of Parma, who immediately, with great boldneſs, invaded the Bologneſe territory with three thouſand horſe, without either foot or cannon. This unexpected irruption ſtruck a panic into the pope's army, which fled with preat precipitation; while the duke, without oppoſition, made himſelf maſter of Imola, Faenza, and Forli. Upon theſe ſucceſſes, Rome was thrown into great conſternation; new levies were ordered, the coach-horſes were ſeized, and ſent from the city to mount the ſoldiers; the prefect, who had behaved with great cowardice, was recalled, and the command of the army given to cardinal Antonio, who proceeding to Viterbo with 9000 men, endeavoured to oppoſe the march of the duke into the duchy of Caſtro. Early in the following ſpring the war was again renewed, with various ſucceſs on both ſides, though carried on with little vigour, each party declining the approach of their enemy, and making conqueſts where they were ſure to meet with no reſiſtance. After the ſummer had been ſpent in ſuch military operations, without much blood-ſhed, propoſals for peace were again offered by the pope, who being affected with the diſtreſſes of his ſubjects, which his nephews had long diſguiſed, began to be very deſirous of ſeeing an end of the war. Accordingly Urban, conſenting to reſtore the duchy of Caſtro to the duke, and the court of France interpoſing as of the ſubjects of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, who curſed the ambition of the Barberini, for having engaged their uncle in a diſgraceful and ruinous war, which had coſt the apoſtolic ſee upwards of 20,000,000 of crowns [c]. During the continuance of this war, an ambaſſador arrived at Rome, to yield obedience to the pope in the name of John duke of Braganza, as king of Portugal; but as the Spaniards were very powerful in Italy, and looked upon the Portugueſe as rebels, the pope, from an apprehenſion of the Spaniſh reſentment, refuſed to acknowlege the new king, and would not admit his ambaſſador to an audience [d].

(B) We have already mentioned, that, in the end of the former century and the beginning of this, the controverſy about the agreement of grace with the freedom of the will, had made a great noiſe, occaſioned by the book of Molina, the Spaniſh Jeſuit, on that ſubject. The two parties, after the trial they had at Rome, were ſilent for ſeveral years, till one Garaſſe, a Jeſuit, revived the diſpute by publiſhing a book in the year 1626, intituled, A ſummary of the fundamental truths of the Chriſtian religion. This treatiſe was anſwered by the abbé de St. Cyran in a maſterly manner; ſo that the Jeſuit's book was generally condemned, and was publicly cenſured, as containing a great many erroneous, ſcandalous, and heretical propoſitions, and being full of falſe quotations of ſcripture, and of the fathers of the church. The revival of this diſpute induced Janſenius, who was then at Louvain, to examine thoroughly the ſentiments of St. Auguſtin upon grace, predeſtination, and free-will; and after reading the works of that father on theſe ſubjects thirty times over, and reconciling his infinite variations, he at length compoſed a huge volume in folio, intituled, Auguſtinus, which was publiſhed in the year 1640, two years after his death. The Jeſuits denounced his book to the inquiſitor at Rome, and publiſhed theſes againſt it; ſo that the popiſh clergy were immediately divided into two parties, diſtinguiſhed by the names of Janſeniſts and Moliniſts. Theſe laſt were oppoſed by the Sorbonne and the moſt eminent divines of Europe; however, they found means of ſecuring their intereſt at the court of Rome: but though the pope publiſhed a bull in their favour, the conteſt betwixt both parties hath ſtill ſubſiſted, and hath lately been the occaſion of great animoſities and diſturbances in France (1).

a men of his time, and was greatly commended for prudence and generosity. His chief fault was nepotisme, or too great a desire of aggrandizing his nephews, who, in the end of his life, gained a great ascendency over him, and engaged him in the war of Parma, which made the Romans long remember his pontificate with detestation. He was likewise greatly blamed for stripping the brass from the roof of the pantheon, or rotondo, to adorn an altar in St. Peter's church, which gave occasion to the pasquinade, Quod non fecere Barbari, fecere Barberini [g].

THO' at the death of Urban his nephews were in possession of great power, yet as they had governed in a very arbitrary manner during his pontificate, they had drawn upon themselves a general hatred; so that, according to the author of the history of Mazarine, Thaddeo b was obliged to deliver up his commission of prefect of Rome to the general congregation of cardinals. But, according to Rycaut, two cardinals were only joined in commission with him, and a lieutenant-general was created with absolute power over the forces [h]. The cardinals then to the number of fifty-five entered the conclave, where at first the Barberini used all their interest to procure the election of cardinal Sachetti; but he being excluded by the Spanish faction, several other candidates were afterwards named, who were also rejected. At length, after a contest of six weeks, which is minutely narrated in the history of the conclaves, cardinal Pamphilio was elected pope on the 15th of September, by the general concurrence of all the cardinals, excepting five, and assumed the name of Innocent X. According to Heydegger, his election met with great opposition, on account of the aversion he was known to c have for the study of divinity and the belles lettres, being acquainted only with the bar and the rota; and because he was universally said to be entirely under the direction of his sister-in-law Donna Olympia [i] (C).

Innocent X. is elected.

IMMEDIATELY after his promotion he discovered his great vanity, by accepting an impious and blasphemous panegyric that was presented to him by a certain Latinised Greek, named John Baptist Calumsirito, who insisted, that, as he was named Pamphilio, his honour and authority was greater than that of our Saviour, who was only filius Dei [k]. He soon took an opportunity likewise of breaking the peace lately concluded with the duke of Parma. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of the duke, he conferred the bishopric of Castro on a certain monk, whom he forced, even against his inclination, to accept of the benefice. d The new bishop, upon going to take possession of his church, was assassinated; which murder provoked the pope to remove the bishopric of Castro to Aquapendente. He also excommunicated and declared war against the duke; and marching against Castro, took and demolished the city. The duke's allies, however, quickly obliged the pope to agree to a peace, by which the duchy of Castro was again restored, on condition that the duke should pay a considerable sum of money; which article the duke, being either unable or not willing to comply with, the duchy was at last re-united to the apostolic chamber [l].

The war renewed against the duke of Parma;

who loses the duchy of Castro.

ALTHOUGH Innocent had been greatly obliged to the Barberini for his elevation to the papal dignity, yet he ungratefully resolved to ruin that house, which had then likewise unfortunately incurred the displeasure of the court of France, for having espoused his cause in e the conclave. The French ambassador at Rome, by order of Mazarine, desired cardinal Antonio Barberino to deliver up the brevet of protector of the French affairs, granted him by the king, and ordered him to take down the French arms, which were placed above the gate of his palace [m]. Though the Barberini endeavoured to persuade the pope that they were persecuted by the French for having favoured his election, he behaved to them, nevertheless with great indifference and coldness; and before his coronation he ordered the prefect Thaddeo to yield the preference in all ceremonies to foreign ambassadors. They endeavoured to secure his protection by proposing a marriage betwixt Donna Olympia's son Camillo, and the daughter of the prefect, with whom they offered in dowry a yearly revenue of 30,000 crowns, to be raised out of the benefices which they held from the church, to- f gether with the estate of Montelibreto, which they had bought from the Ursini for a million of livres. He however rejected these great offers, created his nephew Don Camillo a cardinal, and appointed him legate of Avignon, in the room of Anthony Barberino, who in the month of December left Rome, and went to France, to endeavour, if possible, to recover the favour of that court.

He was afterwards consistorial advocate, auditor of the rota, nuncio at Naples, and datary in the legation of cardinal Barberini in France and Spain; in which last kingdom, after the departure of the legate, he was left a resident nuncio, and a few years after was promoted to the dignity of a cardinal (1).

They are supported by the court of France. A. D. 1645.

His journey was very successful; for Mazarine, considering that the court of Rome a was then chiefly composed of a faction entirely devoted to the house of Austria and the grand duke, thought the Barberini, when supported by France, would serve as a counterpoise to that party: he therefore received Anthony into his protection, allowed the French arms to be replaced upon his palace, and wrote a letter to the pope in favour of the Barberini, who in the mean time received daily affronts and mortifications at the papal court. The pope paid no regard to the letter of Mazarine; but a few days after erected a congregation of five cardinals, all enemies to the Barberini, with a commission to examine their past conduct. He ordered cardinal Anthony to return to Rome within two months, under pain of excommunication, and forfeiture of all his revenues and benefices which he held from the church, in the mean time sequestering his revenue, and prohibiting cardinal Francis and b the prefect from removing any of their effects. The new congregation cited cardinal Francis to give an account of all the sums which he had taken from the castle of St. Angelo, during the five last years of the pontificate of his uncle: and as he endeavoured to defend himself, by alleging that his office of vice-chancellor exempted him from giving an account of his administration, they produced a decree, annulling the dispensation granted by his uncle for his indemnification. This severe persecution of the Barberini raised the public compassion, and drew a general odium upon the pope, who was universally accused of ingratitude and imprudence, especially as he discovered as great a passion of nepotism as his predecessor, and was wholly guided by the counsels of Donna Olympia Maldachini, who had impudently assumed the administration of affairs, domineered over the whole court, and amassed money c with such greediness and rapacity, that the extortion of the former pontificate appeared moderate and merciful [n].

The pope's nephew is banished from Rome.

The behaviour of the pope to his nephew Camillo, or cardinal Pamphilio, likewise exposed him to the public censure. The cardinal having fallen in love with the princess Rossana, a young widow, laid aside his hat without the knowlege of the pope, and privately married her; which proceeding so exasperated his uncle and his mother, that, after a private conference for two hours, they resolved to banish him and his lady from Rome. This severe determination was accordingly executed, to the astonishment of the Romans, who thought the crime very pardonable, as the princess Rossana was not only distinguished by her birth and fortune, but by her beauty and personal accomplishments. Their banishment d was chiefly attributed to Donna Olympia, who being jealous lest the princess should lessen her sovereign authority, thought proper to keep her at a distance from the court [o].

A. D. 1646.

In the mean time the Barberini prepared their accounts, which they delivered to the congregation in the beginning of January, referring themselves to the books in the apostolic chamber for their discharge, and desiring that these books might be examined. Their demand, however, was refused, and the court in an extraordinary manner, and without form of law, sequestered their money in the public bank, and all their revenues within the ecclesiastical dominions. This severe and unexpected sentence made them think of their personal security. They accordingly left Rome privately and retired to France, where they were received with great respect; Mazarine, in the mean time, earnestly solliciting the pope in e their behalf, and even threatening to send an army into Italy, if Innocent would not consent to a reconciliation. The Venetians being desirous of preventing any disturbances on their side the Alps, used their utmost endeavours to reconcile the pope and Mazarine, but without any effect. Both parties were too much actuated by private resentment to hearken to an accommodation. The pope having refused a red hat to the archbishop of Aix, the brother of Mazarine, that cardinal in resentment protected the Barberini, and fitted out a powerful fleet, with a design of making a descent on the coast of Italy, and humbling his holiness.

The French invade Tuscany;

The news of the French preparations alarmed the pope; but what confounded him much more was a report that the chapel at Loretto had again taken flight, and quitted Italy. Soon after the French fleet appeared on the coast, and took possession of Piombino, Portolongone, f St. Stephano, and Telamone, places belonging to the Spaniards in Tuscany. These successes obliged Innocent to think in earnest of a reconciliation with the Barberini; he therefore suspended the execution of his bull, which he had published against them for three months, during which time he re-established them in their former employment, took off the sequestration from their effects, and declared, that he would accept of their submission, if they would repair to the county of Avignon, and write to him from thence [p]. The duke of Guise soon after arriving at Rome, insinuated himself into the favour of Donna Olympia and of the a pope; and having had several conferences with his holiness, he persuaded him the following year to a reconciliation with Mazarine, and prevailed with him to confer a hat on the archbishop of Aix, as a means of securing for the future the interest of the prime minister of France, who governed that kingdom in a most absolute manner. Mazarine, however, being offended that the promotion of his brother had been so long delayed, thanked the pope in a very cold manner, and, contrary to his expectation, still kept possession of Piombino [q].

MEAN while several bishoprics becoming vacant in Portugal, the king nominated successors to them; and the clergy of that kingdom, with his consent, dispatched Nicholas de Monteyro to Rome, to procure the bulls. The Spanish ambassador made several attempts to assassinate this envoy in Rome, on which account he was ordered by the pope to quit the b city. He refused, however, to confer the bishoprics at the nomination of the king of Portugal, but offered to bestow them, proprio motu, on the same persons whom the king mentioned. This expedient was rejected by the king, who nevertheless refused to order his clergy to elect a patriarch, or to allow the chapters to chuse the bishops, and the other prelates to consecrate them, as he was advised by several doctors in his dominions [r].

He refuses to acknowlege the king of Portugal.

ABOUT the same time the authority of the pope received a check from the clergy of France, who, knowing the disposition of the present prime minister, in a numerous assembly drew up a formal protest against the encroachments upon their liberties during the late pontificate. The parliament of Paris likewise endeavoured to oppose the innovations introduced by the nuncio of Innocent, who, from his own authority, had ordered a decree of c the Roman inquisition against a book of Mr. Arnaud, doctor of the Sorbonne, to be published and dispersed in France. The parliament, in defence of the privileges of the nation, drew up an arret, prohibiting all persons from printing, publishing, and selling any briefs, decrees, or bulls, from Rome, without letters patent from the king, registered in their court. They received a letter from the king, who was then at Compeigne, or rather from Mazarine, who was biassed in favour of the see of Rome, desiring them not to proceed on that subject. They, nevertheless, continued their deliberations, and, by a decree, prohibited, the archbishops and bishops, their vicars and officials, the rector and members of the university, from receiving, publishing, or executing, the decrees of the inquisition, or other bulls and briefs, excepting those allowed of by the laws of the kingdom [s].

d MEAN while the celebrated dispute about grace, betwixt the Jansenists and Jesuits, revived with great warmth. Innocent observing that the bull of his predecessor on that subject was eluded, sent briefs to the governor of Flanders, to the archbishops of Mechlin and Cambray, to seven other bishops, to the Sorbonne, to Mr. William des Anges, doctor of Louvain, to William Leopold, archduke of Austria, and to the bishop of Strasburg: by which he confirmed the bull of Urban, and strictly ordered it to be published and put in execution. It was accordingly published in some places, and a prosecution began to be raised against the Jansenists, all being rigorously prohibited from being admitted to the direction of souls, unless, after having solemnly made profession of the faith of the council of Trent, they should sign the formula of the condemnation of Jansenius. The Jansenists, provoked e by this rigorous treatment, drew up an appeal to the pope, under the title of The complaint of the Augustinian truth suffering in the Low Countries, supplicating him to order the doctrine to be examined before it should be condemned. In three other writings, which they then published, they maintained, that an opinion, which was not contrary to the Scripture nor the councils, could not be condemned as heretical, and that the censure had been published not against Jansenius, but against St. Austine, whose doctrines he had only put in a proper light. The primate of Flanders, the bishop of Ghent, and the grand vicars of the episcopal see of Ypres, likewise declared their reasons why they could not publish the pope's bulls; on which account the Jesuits, who were favoured at Rome, formally condemned five propositions taken from the works of Jansenius, which the Jansenists maintained were f not to be found in his writings [t].

DURING these proceedings a rebellion happened in Naples and Sicily, occasioned by the grievous taxes laid upon the people to support the war against France. The duke of Guise, who was then at Rome, was encouraged by the pope to head the rebels, in hopes of securing the possession of those kingdoms, to which he had some distant pretensions. The duke accordingly proceeded to Naples, and by his courage and conduct, without being assisted by France, quickly made a surprising progress. The French however, the following year, making a shew of sending a powerful army to that kingdom, the pope was very apprehensive lest they intended to seize it for themselves: he therefore urged the duke to assume the title of king of both Sicilies, offered to give him the investiture of the kingdom, promised to lend him 300,000 crowns, and assured him that all Italy would form a league in his behalf. The duke replied, that it was not then a proper time to declare his pretensions, but begged that Innocent would send him the money, of which he was in great need. The pope, however, did not think proper to send him the subsidy he had promised him, but only advised him to be diffident of the French and Spaniards, who were equally his enemies. a condemns the treaties of Osnaburgh and Munster.

Soon after Innocent, having received copies of the treaties of Osnaburg and Munster, by which a general peace was established in Germany, France, and Sweden, he published a bull, by which he protested against them with great formality. His nuncio Fabio Chigi, who had presided at the negociations for three years as mediator, had done his utmost, by declamations and protests, to prevent the conclusion of the peace; but his remonstrances being ineffectual, the pope, in his bull, which he published in the end of November, exclaimed against the injustice and iniquity of the treaties, as the heretics were allowed thereby to secularize ecclesiastical possessions, and were admitted equally with catholics to public offices and employments. As the number of electors was augmented without the consent of the apostolic see, and many other things agreed to, prejudicial to the orthodox religion, he therefore condemned, annulled, and declared invalid, all those articles in the treaties prejudicial to the catholic religion, divine worship, and the apostolical Roman see, the inferior churches, and the ecclesiastical order, as also to their jurisdictions, authorities, immunities, franchises, liberties, exemptions, revenues, privileges, and rights [u]. This protestation, however, had no effect upon the different parties concerned in the treaties; and Conringius, Blondel, Hoornbeeck, and other protestants, wrote an answer to it, shewing the necessity and reasonableness of the treaty. b c

He adopts a nephew, whom he creates cardinal patron.

In the mean time, finding himself loaded with the multiplicity of affairs, he resolved to adopt a nephew, with the design of creating him cardinal patron, to give audience to ambassadors and ministers, and in his absence to preside at the council. Accordingly, by the advice of his favourite cardinal Panzirollo, and afterwards upon his public recommendation, he fixed upon Astalli, brother of the marquis Astalli, that had married a niece of Donna Olympia, who being consulted slightly on the affair, seemed not averse to his promotion. However, to her great surprize, a few days after, Astalli, who was then about twenty-seven years of age and clerk of the chamber, was promoted in a full consistory, and declared cardinal of the house of Pamphilio. The same day the pope sent him to lodge at one of his palaces, and assigned him a revenue of 10,000 crowns; and by way of public rejoicing, though unusual on such occasions, ordered the cannon of St. Angelo to be fired. The pope, with great irresolution, immediately began to repent of his proceeding, and when the new cardinal took his leave of him to go and visit the members of the sacred college, he said to him, "Go, we do not know what we have been doing." Donna Olympia likewise, coming to the palace with her daughters, and complaining with great bitterness against him, he was immediately disgraced, and not allowed a single servant; so that Panzirollo, who found the necessity, for his own sake, of supporting him, was obliged to furnish him with attendants, and to maintain him at his own expence for fifteen days. d e

PANZIROLLO, soon after, prevailed upon the pope to countenance and honour Astalli; and, what was more, had influence sufficient to persuade him to disgrace Olympia, and to banish her the court. She had abused her authority in a most scandalous manner, and had gained such an absolute ascendant over the pope, that in every thing his will had been subservient to her dictates. Her avarice and ambition were unbounded: she disposed of all benefices, which were kept vacant, till she fully informed herself of their value: she rated an office of 1000 crowns for three years, at one year's revenue, and if for life at twelve years purchase, one-half of which sum she required to be paid by advance: she gave audience upon public affairs, enacted new laws, abrogated those of former popes, and sat in council with Innocent with bundles of memorials in her hands. It was generally said that they lived together in a criminal correspondence, and that she had charmed him by some secret incantation. In the protestant countries the loves and intrigues of Innocent and Donna Olympia were represented upon the stage, and libellous jests were daily put into the hands of Pasquin at Rome. As she had usurped such an absolute authority, the new cardinal nephew saw the necessity of ruining her credit; he therefore seconded the endeavours of Panzirollo, and insinuated to the pope, that his reputation had suffered greatly among the catholics by her scandalous proceedings, and that his nuncios were treated with disrespect and contempt at the courts of the emperor, France, and Spain. Upon these representations, Innocent at length, but with great reluctance, banished Olympia, and was reconciled to prince Camillo and the princess Rossana; though some authors affirm that her f g a baniſhment was no more than a political retreat, and that ſhe ſtill in private directed the affairs of the pope [w]. After the baniſhment of Olympia, the cardinal patron and Panzirollo were for ſome time in great credit and eſteem; but Panzirollo having weakened his health by his continual application to buſineſs, and dying the year following, cardinal Aſtalli, or Pamphilio, quickly found his influence leſſened.

DURING theſe tranſactions, the Barberini ſuffered continual mortifications at the pope's court, notwithſtanding ſeveral remonſtrances of the French ambaſſador in their behalf. At length the averſion of Innocent for Mazarine and the French increaſing, he began to think of a reconciliation with the Barberini, in order to leſſen the French intereſt in the conclave. For this purpoſe he conſulted with the heads of the Spaniſh faction, who, in order b to bring over Francis Barberino to their party, offered an advantageous match for his niece the princeſs of Paleſtrina, who was then in France, and promiſed to reſtore to him 10,000 crowns a year, which he held in abbies within the dominions of his catholic majeſty. The French ambaſſador at Rome, being informed of this ſecret negociation, wrote to France, urging the abſolute neceſſity of giving the princeſs of Paleſtrina in marriage to one of the peers of the kingdom, and of writing without delay to cardinal Francis, to prevent him from cloſing with the Spaniards. Mazarine having conſidered the ambaſſador's letter, created cardinal Antonio biſhop of Poictiers, and cardinal Francis grand almoner of France. However, they could not reſiſt the offers made to them by Donna Olympia, who had now recovered great credit with the pope, and promiſed to reſtore them to his intimate favour, on c condition that they would aſſent to the marriage of Don Thaddeo's ſon with her grand-daughter, without any dowry. They embraced theſe offers with great ardour; and cardinal Antonio having privately conducted his niece, the princeſs of Paleſtrina, to Padua, returned to Rome, where the eldeſt ſon of Thaddeo was created a cardinal, and the marriage celebrated betwixt his ſecond ſon and the grand-daughter of Olympia. Soon after the princeſs of Paleſtrina was married to the duke of Modena, and cardinal Francis was admitted into the cabinet council, which was compoſed of the pope, Donna Olympia, the cardinal patron, and monſignor Azzolini [x].

INNOCENT in the mean time intereſted himſelf, in ſome meaſure, in the civil commotions in France; and being informed that Mazarine had impriſoned cardinal de Retz, he d ſent an extraordinary nuncio to obtain his liberty. The nuncio, however, was prohibited from paſſing Lyons, which ſo provoked the pope, that he declared to the abbe Chartre, whom the cardinal had ſent to Rome, "That if the malcontents would furniſh an army, he would "ſupply them with a legate [y]." About the ſame time he was ſollicited by the Janſeniſts and Moliniſts to publiſh a bull in their favour. The Janſeniſt clergy of France complimented the pope on this occaſion, and referred to his deciſion in the firſt inſtance, which, by the privileges they enjoyed, they were not obliged to do. They hoped by this complaiſance to flatter the pope to declare in their favour; however, they were greatly deceived; for the intrigues of the Jeſuits prevailing, the pope publiſhed a a bull, condemning the five propoſitions of Janſenius, though he had acknowleged to Mr. St. Amour, that, as he had never ſtudied divinity, he would not conſider them. Notwithſtanding this bull, as the pope e declared that he did not intend to condemn the two doctors of grace, St. Auguſtine and St. Thomas, and deſired the Auguſtines and Dominicans at Rome to preach grace as formerly, according to the opinion of thoſe two doctors, both parties claimed the victory, and the diſpute ſtill continued [z].

DONNA Olympia and the Barberini had at this time the management of the pope. Olympia again aſſumed the ſupreme direction of affairs, as before her diſgrace; and the Barberinii, having had long experience in the adminiſtration of the government during the pontificate of their uncle, ſo ſucceſsfully inſinuated themſelves into the pope's eſteem, that he refuſed them no favour they aſked; ſo that, before his death, they repaired all the loſſes that f their eſtates had ſuffered during their diſgrace. As the Barberini increaſed in favour, the reputation of the cardinal patron declined; and he being likewiſe undermined by Donna Olympia, the pope was provoked, in the beginning of the following year, to order him to lay aſide the arms and name of Pamphilio, and to retire from Rome. He likewiſe deprived him of all his offices and benefices, obliged him to deliver up 60,000 crowns of ready money, and left him only a yearly revenue of 6000 crowns [a]. A few weeks after the diſgrace of Aſtalli, Innocent as a means of procuring new friends to protect his family, made a promotion of nine cardinals; among whom was Azzolini, who, a few months before, by the

As the commotions in Naples were again renewed, Azzolini, together with the Barberini, endeavoured to perſuade the pope to attempt the conqueſt of that kingdom, the Barberini offering to maintain an army of 10,000 men at their own charge, on condition that, after the conqueſt ſhould be made, the principality of Salerno ſhould be granted to them in full ſovereignty. a

INNOCENT declined this enterprize on account of his great age, and in the mean time reſigned himſelf wholly into the hands of Donna Olympia; who, obſerving his infirmities daily increaſing, redoubled her ardour in her rapacious ſchemes, diſpoſing of benefices and livings to the higheſt bidders, in all parts of Italy, eſpecially in the ſmall province of La Marca, where ſhe is ſaid to have conferred no leſs than 336 benefices. She was again in hazard of being diſplaced by a new favourite, namely, the cardinal De Retz; who, having eſcaped from his impriſonment in France, arrived at Rome in the end of autumn, and was received by the pope with uncommon marks of diſtinction. three days after he was ſeized with a diſtemper, under which he languiſhed for ſeveral weeks, and died on the 7th of January, in the 81ſt year of his age, and the 11th year of his pontificate [b]. During his laſt illneſs, he received nothing but from the hands of Donna Olympia, who was at great pains to prolong his life, watched continually at his bed-ſide, and prevented the ambaſſadors or others from diſturbing him with diſcourſes upon buſineſs. She is ſaid, during the laſt ten days of his life, when he continued without the uſe of reaſon, to have amaſſed about half a million of crowns [c]. According to Priorato, his aſpect was noble and majeſtic, and his ſpirit firm and active [d]; but other authors affirm, that he was exceſſively ugly and deformed; and that he was ignorant, irreſolute, cunning, and revengful [e]. He is commended for his temperance and ſtrict regard to juſtice, which he executed with great impartiality; and, during his pontificate, he adorned the city with ſeveral magnificent buildings and public works [f]. c

UPON the death of Innocent X. the cardinals immediately began to cabal, and to form parties for the future conclave. The moſt powerful factions were thoſe of Spain and France; but ten cardinals, who had been promoted by Innocent, formed a party independent of any crown, and privately reſolved to elect Fabio Chigi, though they agreed apparently to advance the intereſt of cardinal Sachetti, as a means of diſtracting the other factions. On the 18th of January, the cardinals entered with the uſual ceremony ino the conclave, where the independent party, which was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the flying ſquadron, quickly diſcovered its power, being ſufficiently ſtrong to prevent the election of any whom it did not approve of. There were no leſs than 22 pretenders, moſt of whom had conſiderable intereſt, and all of them high expectations. Many of the candidates quickly ſuffered the mortification of an excluſion; but Sachetti continued for ſeveral days to have thirty-two and thirty-three voices upon every ſcrutiny, which was made every forenoon and afternoon. The various intrigues at this election are minutely related in the hiſtory of the conclaves, and by Priorato and the cardinal De Retz; but we ſhall only obſerve, that the cardinals, after they had been ſhut up eighty days, unanimouſly choſe cardinal Chigi, who owed his election chiefly to the intereſt of cardinal De Retz and the Barberini, and during the conclave behaved like Sixtus V. with great reſerve and affected modeſty [g]. He was elected on the 8th of April, and aſſumed the name of Alexander VII. (D). (D) Fabio Chigi, or Ghigi, was deſcended of an ancient and noble family at Siena, and was born in that city in the year 1599. His anceſtors had made a conſiderable figure at Rome during the pontificate of Julius II. but meeting afterwards with misfortunes, they were obliged to return to Siena. Fabio was educated carefully, and went early to Rome; where, being recommended by the marquis Pallavicini to Urban VIII. he, by his taſte for poetry, and profeſſed admiration of Horace, ſecured the eſteem of that pope, who ſent him as inquiſitor to Malta; from whence he returned with the greateſt commendations from the grand maſter and the knights, who declared that Malta had never before been bleſſed with ſuch a legate. Urban then appointed him vice-legate at Ferrara; where he reſided three years, and acquired the eſteem of all ranks of people by his moderate and juſt adminiſtration. He was afterwards ſent as nuncio to Cologn, to be preſent at the negociations for a general peace, where, it is ſaid, he diſcovered ſome inclination to embrace the proteſtant religion (1). At Munſter he preſided at the negociations, as pope's legate, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to prevent the concluſion of the treaty, which was prejudicial to the intereſts of the Roman ſee. talked talked of at Rome but the ſanctity and piety of the pope, it was generally believed; that the virtue of miracles would be again reſtored to the church. Great rejoicings were alſo made in all the catholic countries, in hopes that they would now be no longer ſubject to the blind paſſions which had prevailed for ſo many centuries at the Roman court. Several proteſtants are even ſaid to have come expreſsly to Rome, to examine if matters were really ſo as repreſented. In reality, he began his pontificate in ſuch a manner as increaſed the hopes that had generally been conceived of him. He continued to faſt twice a week, as he had practiſed when he was cardinal. He prohibited his relations to come to Rome without his permiſſion: rejected the congratulations of Donna Olympia, and forbid her to enter the palace; and, inſtead of indulging himſelf in the luxury of a court, he lived in the ſtricteſt

b abſtinence and mortification of body. To remind him of his mortality, he ordered his coffin to be brought into his chamber; he eat common victuals ſeaſoned with aſhes, and ſlept on a ſtraw mattreſs, or on boards, with a ſtone pillow under his head [h]. Whether by theſe external obſervances he deceived himſelf, or wanted to deceive the world, is uncertain; but cardinal De Retz mentions, that he urged upon him the neceſſity of ſome outward ſhew, to ſecure the regard of the public; and remarks likewiſe, that the pope appeared to him to have a little genius, which placed a great importance upon minute and trifling matters; as inſtances of which remark he relates, that, when a fine ſtatue was ſhewed to the pope, he took notice only of a fringe that went round the bottom of the robe, and in a converſation with himſelf in the conclave, when talking of his youthful ſtudies, he obſerved that he had
c wrote two years with the ſame pen [i].

AFTER his coronation, in his firſt conſiſtory, he granted the pallium to the cardinal De Retz, by which he confirmed him in his archbiſhopric of Paris, contrary to the inclination of the king. Having, by this proceeding, greatly exaſperated the French court, he, for the future, acted with greater reſerve towards the cardinal, and refuſed to intereſt himſelf in protecting him from the reſentment of Mazarine [k]. Mean while, having received a great number of memorials againſt Donna Olympia, he ordered her to retire to Orvieto within eight days, and not to remove from that city without new orders from him. The ſame day that ſhe quitted Rome, he began to take the examination of witneſſes for drawing up the proceſs againſt her; but, the charges againſt her being ſo numerous, he ordered ten of the moſt mad terial points to be ſelected, to which ſhe ſhould be obliged to give an anſwer.

He orders Donna Olympia to be proſecuted.

WHILE he was thus proſecuting Olympia, with all the ſeverity that the law would allow, he began to abate of his rigour to his relations, and at the perſuaſion of ſome of the cardinals he ſent for his brother Don Mario, with his ſon Flavio, and two other nephews Auguſtine and Sigiſmond, with ſeveral other relations, whom, in a ſhort time, he loaded with wealth and dignities (E). Don Mario was made governor of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; his ſon was created cardinal patron; Sigiſmond, being too young for any dignity, was gratified with rich penſions; Auguſtino, deſigned to be the pillar of the houſe, was married to a rich niece of cardinal Borgheſe; another nephew, by his ſiſter, was created a cardinal; and the brother of this nephew, who was a knight of Malta, was made general of the gallies [l]. Alexander like-e wiſe, by degrees, began to lay aſide his auſtere manner of living, and, at length, by the perſuaſions of his relations, he ran into the other extreme, and exceeded all his predeceſſors in the pomp and magnificence of his robes, furniture, and equipages [m]. Cardinal De Retz mentions, that, upon his return from the medicinal wells in Tuſcany, he found the pope quite changed; that he was continually employed in trifles; that he was envious and jealous of all the world; that he was ridiculouſly vain; and that he never ſpoke a word of truth [n]. Mean while a grievous plague afflicted the city of Rome and its neighbourhood, which raged to ſuch a degree, that not only trade and commerce were interrupted, but the common courts of juſtice were ſhut up. Donna Olympia was cut off by this peſtilence; and Alexander, inſtead of confiſcating her eſtate to the apoſtolic chamber, as was generally expected, allowed f the prince Pamphilio to ſucceed as her heir, after drawing from him about a million of crowns, which he beſtowed on his own kindred [o]. At the ſame time, being informed, that Chriſtina queen of Sweden had abdicated her crown, embraced the popiſh religion, and was arrived in Germany in her way to Rome, he ſent an extraordinary nuncio to congratulate her

The Venetians ask aſſiſtance from the pope againſt the Turks.

As the Venetians at this time were engaged in a war with the Turks, who had invaded the iſland of Candia, they earneſtly ſollicited the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian powers againſt the infidels. The pope excuſed himſelf from granting them any ſubſidy, as his treaſury had been exhauſted by the rapaciouſneſs of the nephews of his predeceſſors, and by the large ſums which had been lately iſſued to ſupport the poor, who had been diſtreſſed by a famine, which preſented him with a large ſum of money, he hearkened to ſome expedients propoſed to b him by the Venetians for ſupporting the holy war; and, on condition that they would repeal the law againſt the Jeſuits, and allow them to return to their dominions, he granted a bull, authorizing the ſenate to ſell ſome lands and rents belonging to the two orders of the Cro-ciferi and Santo Spirito, and likewiſe appointed a nuncio, who, with three ſenators, ſhould great oppoſition in the ſenate; but the neceſſity of their affairs obliging them to court the favour of the pope, they at laſt conſented to allow the Jeſuits to return; and, having obtained the bull, raiſed above a million of ducats by the ſale of the church lands, though not without the cenſures and curſes of the clergy againſt them, the pope, and the Jeſuits. This con-deſcenſion of the republic was very agreeable to the court of Rome, and ſeveral cardinals, as c a teſtimony of their zeal againſt the infidels, granted very conſiderable ſubſidies to the maintenance of the war [q].

Alexander condemns the book of Janſenius.

The Jeſuits being thus re-eſtabliſhed at Venice, the pope employed his authority to confirm their doctrine in France; and as the Janſeniſts, by ſubtle diſtinctions, had eluded the bull of his predeceſſor, he renewed the cenſure of Innocent X. againſt the five propoſitions ſaid to be contained in the books of Janſenius, and condemned them by a new bull, both in their obvious ſenſe, and in the ſenſe intended by the author. This bull, however, had not the effect he deſired; for, inſtead of putting an end to diſputes, the controverſy was continued with greater animoſity; and the French court, and ſome biſhops, eſpouſing the cauſe of the Je-ſuits, a confeſſion of faith was drawn up, which the king, by a particular edict, ordered all d the clergy to ſwear to, then the ſeculars, and even the nuns. By this formulary, all per-ſons, though they had never ſeen or read the book of Janſenius, were obliged to ſwear that propoſitions wherever they ſhould find them; but this propoſal being rejected by Mazarine, the divines and nuns of that place abſolutely refuſed to conſent to any other expedient. The biſhops of Alet, Angers, Beauvais, and Pamiers, refuſed purely and ſimply to ſubmit to the pope's bull, which condemned the doctrine of Janſenius; on which account Alexander the following year appointed commiſſaries to try them for their diſobedience and hereſy. But e nineteen of their brethren writing to him, and affirming, that the French prelates, when ac-cuſed of hereſy, could only be tried by the council of their province, the affair at that time proceeded no farther, Tellier and Colbert perſuading Lewis XIV. to ſtop the diſpute, which had already proceeded too far, and which, in the end, might occaſion a rupture betwixt him and the court of Rome [s].

The peace of the Pyrences concluded without his participation. A. D. 1659.

ALEXANDER in the mean time earneſtly preſſed the courts of Spain and France to agree to a peace, offering himſelf as mediator, and deſiring that the conferences might be held at Rome. As he had acted as mediator at Munſter, and had thoroughly canvaſſed the differences betwixt the two nations, he expected that they would have both willingly deſired his arbitration; however, to his great diſappointment and ſurprize, the treaty was conclud- f ed the following year, without his knowlege, at the Pyrenees, by Mazarine and Don Lewis de Haro [t]. Alexander blamed the French more than the Spaniards for his being excluded from the treaty, as he obſerved that Mazarine induſtriouſly ſeized all opportunities of throwing contempt upon his perſon and authority. He diſſembled, however, his reſentment; and, as the Turks had begun hoſtilities in Upper Hungary, he wrote to the kings of France and a fidels, to declare himself the head of the alliance, and to animate the other Christian princes by his example, Alexander paid no regard to these exhortations; but even by his backwardness cooled the zeal of others, who seemed desirous of a general league [w]. The pope at that time was chiefly engaged in filling the city with inscriptions, and adorning it with magnificent buildings. He, however, did not neglect to testify his hatred for Mazarine, by assembling a consistory, and re-uniting the duchy of Castro to the apostolic chamber, because that minister had presumed to intercede in behalf of the duke of Parma [x].

The difference and animosity between the pope and the cardinal occasioned a bad correspondence betwixt his holiness and the duke of Crequi, the French ambassador at Rome. This ambassador, at his first arrival, was received with the utmost ceremony and respect; and, b being distinguished by his nobility and personal accomplishments, was greatly caressed by the pope. As he was naturally of a haughty disposition, and had secret orders from the king to mortify the pope and his relations, he soon began to pay more respect to other cardinals than to the pope's nephews. Alexander immediately resented this affront, and behaved to Crequi with great coldness and indifference at his audiences. This bad correspondence soon broke out into an open enmity, occasioned at first by two Frenchmen, who, to shew their bravery, disarmed the night patrol, consisting of three Corsi. These Corsi were punished for having made no resistance, and their officer broke. Soon after some bailiffs and officers, to shew themselves diligent in their duty, entered the ambassador's house in search of some criminals, while he was at mass in his chapel. That same evening a Frenchman, who, in pas-c sing thro' the quarters of the Corsi, had thrown out against them some ignominious reproach, was pursued by them to the ambassador's house, where they assembled, to the number of 400, with drums beating and colours flying, and fired upon the ambassador, who came to the window to endeavour to appease them. They likewise fired upon his lady, who was returning home in her coach, and killed one of her lacquies. As Don Mario and cardinal Imperiali covered the escape of the Corsi who were reckoned most guilty, and but slightly punished the others, the duke of Crequi looked upon the pope's relations as the authors of the insult; and though the whole family of the Chigi paid their visits of condolance to him and his lady, excusing the riot and tumult, which, they said, was owing solely to the insolence of the guards, he insisted upon more full satisfaction for the outrage, and sent an account d of the whole transaction to his court.

The French ambassador insulted at Rome. A. D. 1662.

The pope and the queen of Sweden likewise wrote to Lewis XIV. excusing the tumult; but he paid more regard to the letters of his ambassador, and immediately ordered the nuncio to leave Paris, and soon after conducted him with a guard to the confines of Savoy. About the same time the duke of Grequi left Rome, and retired into Tuscany, where he continued for some time, receiving proposals of an accommodation from the pope, who likewise wrote several other letters to Lewis XIV. full of sorrow and resentment for the late outrage. The duke, not receiving the satisfaction he expected, at length left Italy, having, before his departure from Leghorn, notified to the pope the demands of the king; who required, that Don Mario should be banished to Siena for five years; that cardinal Imperiali
e should be deprived of his hat; that the Corsican nation should be banished for ever from Rome; and that a pyramid should be erected, with an inscription, in the place where the outrage was committed; and besides, that Castro should be restored to the duke of Parma, and the vale of Commachio to the duke of Modena. These high terms quite confounded the pope, especially as he observed, that the dukes of Savoy, Modena, and Parma, declared for the French, and the Spaniards had granted leave for a French army to march through the Milanese into the ecclesiastical state. However, having private assurances of assistance from the emperor, and being encouraged by some cardinals, he made great professions of hazarding every thing in defence of the dignity of the apostolic see.

He quits Italy, and returns to France. A. D. 1663.

As he soon found that the emperor had no great intention of fulfilling his promises, and f was informed that the parliament of Aix had taken the opportunity of an insurrection at Avignon, to reunite that city and its dependences to the crown of France, he willingly embraced the offer of the Venetians to act as mediators. Accordingly Lewis Grimani, the Venetian ambassador at Paris, prevailed upon the king to agree to a congress at Lyons for an accommodation; but as the pope sent the title of extraordinary nuncio to his deputy Rasponi, the conferences were quickly broke off, without any effect. Soon after the negociations were again renewed at Buonvicino on the frontiers of Savoy, Rasponi residing in the duchy, and the agents from Modena and Parma, with Crequi, Grimani, and the twelve consuls of Avignon, residing in France. But the pope absolutely refusing to consent to the restitution of Castro and Commachio, the treaty was again broke off. During this congress at Buonvicino, a French fleet appeared on the coast of the ecclesiastical state, and great warlike preparations were made at Rome; the fleet, however, retired, without any act of hoſtility, to Sardinia; and to the ſurprize of Italy, when the treaty broke off, the pope ordered his new-levied troops to be diſbanded. Both parties thus diſcovering a deſire of an accommodation, a few months afterwards Piſa was appointed for a third congreſs; where a treaty was at length concluded, on the 22d of February, between Raſponi and Bourlemont, the plenipotentiaries of the pope and the French king. a

The conditions of the treaty.

THE conditions of this treaty were very diſhonourable for the pope; for it was agreed, that Caſtro ſhould be again diſmembered from the patrimony of the church, and reſtored to the duke of Parma, on condition of his paying to the apoſtolic chamber, within eight years, 1,629,750 crowns, at two payments; ſo that, upon making the firſt payment, he ſhould receive the inveſtiture of one half of the duchy. In lieu of Commachio, the pope was alſo obliged to give the duke of Modena 40,000 crowns, or a palace at Rome, to deliver to him Mont d' Eſte, valued at 30,000 crowns, to remit to him a debt of 50,000 crowns, which he owed to the Montiſts, and beſides to grant him the right of perpetual patronage to the abbeys of Pompaſa and Bondeno. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the cardinal nephew ſhould be ſent as legate to France; where, at his firſt public audience, he ſhould declare to the king, according to a form of words inſerted in the treaty, that his holineſs was ſorry for the outrage committed againſt the duke of Crequi, of which neither he nor any of his family was culpable; that cardinal Imperiali ſhould go to France to make his ſubmiſſion in perſon to the king; that cardinal Maldachini ſhould be allowed to return to Rome, there to live in freedom and ſecurity; that Don Mario ſhould declare in writing, upon the faith of a gentleman, that he had no part in the outrage committed againſt the king's ambaſſador; and till ſuch certification, confirmed by the pope's brief, ſhould be delivered into the king's hands, he ſhould not have liberty to enter Rome; that Don Auguſtino ſhould, upon the approach of the duke of Crequi to Rome, go out to meet him as far as St. Quirico, or Civita Vecchia, or Narni, according as the duke ſhould chuſe his route; that Donna Berenice, or the princeſs Farneſe, ſhould go out to meet the ambaſſadreſs as far as Ponte Molle; that the pope ſhould annul all proceedings againſt the duke Ceſarini, and all others, on account of the above-mentioned outrage; that the Corſican nation ſhould be declared for ever incapable of ſerving either in Rome or in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; and that the captain of the guard at Rome ſhould be broke; that, oppoſite to the place where the Corſi held their chief guard, a pyramid ſhould be erected, with an inſcription, declaring the crime for which they were baniſhed; that upon the arrival of the cardinal legate at Paris, and the execution of the foregoing articles, the king ſhould reſtore Avignon, with its dependences, to the pope; who ſhould grant a free pardon to all the inhabitants who had been concerned in the revolt, and ſhould proſecute none of them for any thing that had happened ſince that time; and laſtly ſhould grant aſſeſſors to the judges of Avignon, and the county of Venaſſin. However mortifying and diſgraceful theſe conditions were to Alexander, he was obliged punctually to fulfil them, though he laboured much to excuſe the baniſhment of Don Mario, and the ſending cardinal Chigi as legate to France[y]. b c d

A. D. 1665.

AFTER the execution of the articles of the treaty, Don Mario returned from Sora to Rome, and the pope had leiſure to attend to the diſputes in Spain betwixt the Dominicans and Jeſuits, concerning the immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin. This controverſy was carried on with ſuch animoſity, that, inſtead of being determined in the ſchools by a moderator, it was in danger of being decided in the field by the ſword. To prevent any commotion, the king ſent the biſhop of Placenza to Rome, deſiring his holineſs to determine the controverſy by a bull: but Alexander, inſtead of deciding which of the opinions was orthodox, followed the example of his predeceſſors, and left the article of faith ſtill unſettled. The Jeſuits, however, having prevailed upon him to embrace the opinion of the immaculate conception, he publiſhed a bull, prohibiting any one, under ſevere penalties, from aſſerting the contrary doctrine, either in public or private. This determination did not ſatisfy the king of Spain, who was beſides greatly offended with the pope for ſeeming to favour the king of Portugal, and ordered his ambaſſador to threaten him with the loſs of 130 biſhoprics and 60 abbeys in Spain, if he ſhould concern himſelf with the biſhoprics in Portugal[z]. e

Alexander offends the king of Spain by favouring the king of Portugal. f

ABOUT the ſame time the divines of the Sorbonne having cenſured two books, which had been publiſhed by the Jeſuits, under the falſe names of James de Vernant and Amadeus Guimenius, and which defended the pope's ſupremacy and infallibility, Alexander wrote to the king, complaining of their proceeding. Lewis, in compliance with his holineſs's requeſt, aſſembled a congregation of biſhops at Pontoiſe, who paſſed a ſlight cenſure on the Sorbonniſts, blaming their preſumption, without condemning their opinion. The parliament of Paris, however, publiſhed a declaration againſt the pope's brief, and in defence of the pro-

a ceeding of the divines of the Sorbonne, whoſe ſentiments they affirmed were the ſame with thoſe of the fathers, councils, holy ſee, and all the parliaments and univerſities of the kingdom. The pope, greatly irritated at the freedom of the parliament, in the month of June publiſhed a terrible bull againſt the cenſures of the Sorbonniſts, annulling them as preſumptuous, raſh, and ſcandalous, and prohibiting all eccleſiaſtics from receiving or approving them, under pain of excommunication latæ ſententiæ. His bull, however, in France, was treated with great contempt, and looked upon with deteſtation, as plainly countenancing the moſt immoral doctrines, ſince it condemned thoſe who had cenſured them. The parliament of Paris, in the end of July, publiſhed an arret, prohibiting all the king's ſubjects from reading, ſelling, or poſſeſſing, the ſaid bull, and ordered the cenſures of the Sorbonniſts againſt the b books of Vernant and Guimenius to be regiſtered in the rolls of the court, prohibited all perſons of whatever rank from maintaining or teaching the cenſured propoſitions, declared their intention of ſupporting the faculty of divinity in their right of cenſuring all books, which ſhould contain propoſitions contrary to the authority and diſcipline of the church, to the purity of Chriſtian morality, to the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the Gallican church; and ordered two of their members to read their arret in the preſence of the members of the faculty, and to exhort them to continue their cenſures, as occaſion ſhould anſwer, with the ſame zeal [a]. Though no author mentions how the pope received this terrible ſtroke, it may be preſumed, that it greatly affected him; however, that he might not ſeem expreſsly to approve of the deteſtable maxims which had been cenſured, he ſoon after pub- c liſhed a bull, condemning ſeveral propoſitions taken from the writings of the Jeſuits [b]. At the requeſt of the court and clergy of France, he likewiſe canonized Francis de Sales, titular prince and biſhop of Geneva, having alſo a few years before made another ſaint in favour of the Spaniards, namely, Thomas de Villa Nova, a hermit, of the order of Auguſtines, and archbiſhop of Valencia, who had been dead upwards of 100 years [c].

He publiſhes a bull againſt the proceedings of the doctors of the Sorbonne;

who are ſupported by the parliament of Paris.

THE following year the pope fitted out his gallies againſt the Turks, and ſent them, under the command of Bichi, into the Archipelago; where, in conjunction with the gallies of Malta, they attacked ſeveral maritime places belonging to the infidels; but, having paſſed the ſummer without any memorable action, they returned in the beginning of winter to Italy [d]. A few months after he again offended a great many catholics, by a bull, which he affixed to d the gates of St. Peter's church, ordering all cardinals, biſhops, and others, in treating of the point of attrition, either in diſcourſes or in books, not to cenſure thoſe who held the opinion contrary to what they themſelves maintained, whether that which affirms the neceſſity of the love of God, proceeding from the fear of the pains of hell, or that which denies any ſuch neceſſity in attrition. On this occaſion he was accuſed of intending to extirpate true piety from the heart, and to impoſe, as problematical or dubious, an opinion which was aſſerted in the moſt clear terms through the whole ſcripture [e]. About the ſame time he ſent three cheſts of relics to France, together with a bull, which affirmed that they might, with all confidence, be expoſed to the veneration of the people. Notwithſtanding this bull, when the relics were examined by a phyſician, one of the ſkulls, intitled Caput Sancti Fortunati, or the e head of St. Fortunatus, was found to be artificially made of paſteboard, and fell to pieces upon being put into warm water. The phyſician, however, received a letter de cachet, prohibiting him from publiſhing the diſcovery, upon pain of being ſent to the Baſtile [f].

The pope fits out a fleet againſt the Turks. A. D. 1667.

THESE were ſome of the laſt acts of Alexander; for very ſoon after he died at Rome, on the 22d of May, in the 69th year of his age, and the 13th of his pontificate, very little regretted by the people; who, being diſappointed in their expectations of great things from him, looked with prejudice and diſſatisfaction upon all his conduct, which, during his whole reign, was very inconſiſtent. He was of a middle ſtature, and good habit of body, had an agreeable air in his countenance, and was pleaſant and facetious in his converſation. He is accuſed of being ungrateful, irreſolute, hypocritical, vain, proud, envious, of having made a game f of religion for worldly purpoſes, and of having chiefly attended to the enriching of his own family, without any regard to juſtice. He was, however, tolerably learned, loved the ſciences, and delighted in the converſation of learned men. He had a great taſte for magnificent buildings, and enlarged and adorned many ſtreets in Rome, much to the ornament of the city and the convenience of the inhabitants, though he thereby exhauſted the apoſtolic chamber, and ruined ſeveral private perſons, by ordering their houſes, which interrupted the regularity of the ſtreets, to be demoliſhed, without granting them any ſatisfaction [g] (F).

THE conclave, which followed upon the death of Alexander, was not without parties and factions, according to the usual manner. The faction of Chigi consisted of thirty-seven voices; that of the Barberini of about sixteen; the Spanish of nine; the French of about seven; besides some others who adhered to no party. A few candidates made some ineffectual endeavours in their own behalf; but the weather being extremely hot, the air unhealthy, and one of the cardinals dying, Barberino and Chigi joined their interests in favour of cardinal Rospiglioſi; who, without having made any interest for the pontificate, was elected on the 20th of June, and assumed the name of Clement IX [h] (G). After his coronation, which was performed on the 26th of the same month, he thanked the cardinals in a full consistory for their suffrages; and, to reconcile his subjects to his government, he abolished some taxes with which they were burthened, and took care that provisions might be cheap and plentiful at Rome. He was likewise very desirous to assist the Venetians against the Turks; but, his predecessor having left an empty treasury, he was obliged to suppress some of those orders of regulars, which appeared of little service to the Romish church, and had degenerated from the rules of their institution. He accordingly issued out a bull, authorising the Venetians to secularize the lands of these orders within their dominions, and to apply the money to the sacred war. The sale of these lands, however, in the Milanese and the kingdom of Naples, met with great opposition from the Spaniards; who affirmed, that they could not be sold without the consent of the catholic king, and that the pope had no right to dispose of the money arising from their sale. The execution of the pope's decree was opposed at Naples by force; on which account he thundered out an anathema, but without success; for the king's ministers defended their proceeding with great firmness, so that the controversy continued for several years in suspence, and was not terminated till the time of the succeeding pope [i].

He orders the secularizaton of some monasteries.

THOUGH Clement is said to have blamed himself afterwards for this secularization, on account of a scruple of conscience, yet at this time he appeared fully satisfied of the necessity and justice of such a proceeding, and endeavoured besides to engage the Christian princes in a league against the infidels; for which purpose he ordered his nephew, whom he recalled from Brussels, where he had resided as inter-nuncio three years, to return by Paris, and to persuade Lewis XIV. to a peace with Spain, and to an alliance against the Turks. The cardinal Rospiglioſi accordingly proceeded to Paris; but his conferences with the king produced but very little effect. A few French gentlemen went as volunteers to Candia; and the French king agreed to treat of a peace at Aix-la-Chapelle, though in the mean time he sent an army, the following February, into Franche Compte, and in a few weeks made himself master of that whole province. About the same time the cardinal nephew having returned to Rome, Clement sent an extraordinary legate to France, and another to Spain, to forward the peace; and having appointed Bargellini as his plenipotentiary at Aix-la-Chapelle, the treaty was at last concluded, by his mediation, in the month of May [k].

had mixed themselves with others at an audience, and were reproved by the pope for offering to commit, what they believed, an act of idolatry (5). As a singularity, it is affirmed that he was related to the grand signior Mohammed IV. A Turkish corsair, in the year 1525, had made a descent in Italy, and pillaged a castle belonging to Siena, from whence they carried off Margaret Marsili, who was married to Soliman, and by him had Selim II. from whom Mohammed IV. was descended in a direct line. Leonard Marsili, the brother of the captive Margaret, was grand-father to Laura Marsili, the mother of Alexander VII (6).

(G) Julio Rospiglioſi was born at Pistoia in 1600, being descended from an ancient and noble family. Having received a good education, and being distinguished by his active and lively genius, Urban VIII. appointed him auditor to his nephew Barberino, when he went as legate to France; and being satisfied with his conduct, he sent him afterwards as nuncio to Spain, in which character he behaved to the satisfaction both of the court of Rome and of the catholic king, and his commission was therefore continued for eleven years, tho' usually it did not exceed three. Upon his return to Rome he was appointed governor of the city, during the vacancy of the see, at the death of Innocent X. Alexander VII. created him a cardinal at his first promotion, and afterwards made him secretary of state; in which office he so distinguished himself, that he had the approbation of the pope, of the sacred college, and of all Rome (7).

a contenting themſelves with the reſpect they received at court, not ſeeming to reflect upon the change which would happen to them upon the death of the pope, or acting as though ſuch a change would be of no importance [l]. A certain author indeed alleges, that the pope had allowed cardinal Chigi to engroſs his confidence, and that reſigning himſelf too much to his counſels, he was perſuaded by him to overlook his own kindred [m].

He quiets the differences betwixt the Janſeniſts and Moliniſts.

As the differences betwixt the Moliniſts and the Janſeniſts in France began to threaten the public peace in that kingdom, the court found the neceſſity of abating the rigour exerciſed againſt theſe laſt; and the pope conſenting to alter the form of proceeding againſt the four biſhops who had refuſed to ſubſcribe to the formula ordained by the king, they gave an account of their conduct in a letter to his holineſs, who declaring that he was ſatisfied with
b their reaſons, the king immediately publiſhed a decree, affirming, that he was likewiſe ſatisfied, and prohibited all his ſubjects from writing in that controverſy, or provoking each other by party names [n]. About the ſame time Clement granted a bull, allowing Lewis XIV. to nominate ſucceſſors to all biſhoprics, abbeys, and benefices in his kingdom, and likewiſe permitted him to remove the croſs which had been erected at Rome, over-againſt the church of St. Anthony, in memory of the converſion of Henry IV. of France to the catholic religion. In return for theſe favours, Lewis XIV. allowed the pyramid, erected on account of the baniſhment of the Corſi, to be demoliſhed, and omitted intereſting himſelf in behalf of the duke of Parma, who offered the money ſtipulated at the treaty of Piſa for the reſtitution of Caſtro, but could not prevail with the pope to grant him the inveſtiture of the duchy [o]. In the c mean time, Clement ſollicited the Chriſtian princes, with great earneſtneſs, to ſend ſuccours to Candia; and having prevailed upon Lewis XIV. to ſend a fleet thither, under the command of the duke of Beaufort, he fitted out his own gallies, and ordered his nephew Vicenzo Roſpigliоſi, who commanded them, to join the French fleet and the gallies of Malta. By his ſollicitation other ſuccours were likewiſe ſent from Germany, by the elector of Bavaria, the biſhop of Straſburg, and other princes of the Rhine.

He acknowleges the king of Portugal.

While he was thus endeavouring his utmoſt to prevent Crete from falling into the hands of the Turks, he was informed that the king of Portugal had been depoſed by his brother Don Pedro. This prince had ſucceeded him in the throne, and married his queen, who had obtained a divorce from her firſt huſband. The cardinal de Vendome, uncle of the queen, d whom the pope had ſent as legate into France, ratified the diſſolution of the firſt marriage, without waiting for any inſtructions from Rome, although his legation did not extend to Portugal. The legate excuſed this extraordinary ſtep, by alleging, that his commiſſion was conceived in the moſt ample terms, and that he had written to Rome without receiving any anſwer, though it is ſaid that his letter was purpoſely never ſent. To ſatisfy the pope, the queen ſent her confeſſor to Rome; and Lewis XIV. likewiſe wrote to his holineſs, to perſuade him of the juſtice of the divorce, as the impotence of the queen's firſt huſband was atteſted by no leſs than thirty phyſicians. Clement, however, would not conſent to confirm the marriage, but gave a commiſſion to the dean of the inquiſitors in Portugal to examine the cauſe. A. D. 1669.
e As the dean, after going through a new proceſs, declared the firſt marriage invalid, and the ſecond lawful, the pope at length, at the ſollicitations of the French king and the marquis de las Minas, who came to Rome as ambaſſador of obedience, granted the bull for a diſpenſation in the beginning of the following year: and as the kingdom of Portugal, by the peace with Spain, had been declared independent, he made no difficulty of receiving the obedience of Don Pedro, and of conferring the Portugueſe biſhoprics according to his nomination [p].

Complains of the ignorance of the prelates.

About the ſame time he applied himſelf earneſtly to re-eſtabliſh his finances, which were under ſuch a bad regulation, that the apoſtolic chamber was in great hazard of becoming bankrupt. For this purpoſe he inſtituted a congregation Dello aggravio, conſiſting of ſome cardinals and prelates, which was then much approved of, though it appeared aff terwards that it was inſufficient to remedy the diſorders in the finances. Clement likewiſe complained greatly of the ignorance of the prelates about his court, and was revolving ſome means of reforming that evil, when being informed by the Venetian ambaſſador, of the loſs of Candia, which is ſaid to have been delivered to the Turks by the intrigues of the Jeſuits [q], he was ſo ſeized with grief, that he ſuddenly fell into a kind of apoplexy. This perhaps, in ſome meaſure, might be owing to his intemperance in eating, which vice he ſeemed to glory in, thinking that he thereby demonſtrated the ſtrength of his conſtitution. Though he revived from this fit, yet melancholy ſo oppreſſed his ſpirits, that he died about a month after, on the 9th of December, generally lamented by all ranks of people. He was a possessed of many eminent virtues, and, among others, of modesty, mildness, and charity. Immediately after his promotion, he discovered great generosity and public spirit; and it was evident to all that his heart was engaged in promoting a general reformation. He is accused of wanting firmness and resolution, of being too indulgent to the great, and to those from whom he had received any obligations; but these faults may have proceeded from the weakness of old age, and the excess of his gratitude. As he was not ambitious of worldly honour, he forbad his relations to raise any magnificent monument to his memory: his successor, however, erected a stately monument for him, with his statue, in the church of St. Peter, and the people of Rome voluntarily caused several eulogies to be engraved to his honour, particularly one in the area of the Capitol, on the triumphal arch of Septimius b Severus [r].

A. D. 1670. After the usual ceremonies at the death of the pope, the cardinals entered the conclave on the 20th of December, where, upon account of the obstinacy of the factions, they continued more than four months, before they could agree in their choice of a successor to the papal chair. Besides the Spanish and French factions, and the flying squadrons, there were other three parties, headed by Rospiglioси, Barberino, the dean of the college, and by cardinal Chigi, which last, to intimidate his adversaries, declared, that he proposed to eat cherries in the conclave; to which Barberino replied, that he intended to eat figs. The great number of candidates likewise retarded the election; but, after several exclusions, and a remonstrance from the Spanish ambassador, who was admitted to an audience in the c conclave, the intrigues quickly ceased. The old cardinals declared, that they would agree to the choice of any one to obtain their liberty; and Rospiglioси, Barberino, and Chigi, finding that their obstinacy had no other effect than to retard the election, at last united their interest in favour of cardinal Emilio Altieri, a decrepid old man, of eighty years of age, who, on the 29th of April, was elected pope by fifty-nine voices, and assumed the name of Clement X [s].

His election gave great joy to the Romans, as he was descended of a Patrician Roman family, which had been illustrious for more than 600 years. His brother had been created a cardinal by Urban VIII. but did not long survive his promotion. The same pope sent Emilio into Poland, as auditor to the nuncio, and, upon his return, gave him the govern- d ment of Ravenna, created him bishop of Camerino, and sent him as nuncio to Naples, where he resided during the insurrection of Massaniello. During the pontificate of Innocent X. he was recalled to Rome, and likewise deprived of his revenues; but upon the election of Alexander VII. his reputation was restored, and he obtained the nunciature of Poland. Clement IX. declared him chief of his bed-chamber, and when he was lying on his death-bed, upon his own sollicitation, created him a cardinal [t].

He adopts cardinal Paluzzi as his nephew,

Immediately after his election, as he had no near relations of his own name, he adopted cardinal Paluzzi as his nephew, for no other apparent reason, but because his niece Donna Laura Altieri was married to the cardinal's nephew Don Gasparo Paluzzi. He ceded to the family of the Paluzzi all the revenues of the house of Altieri, erected their castle Russina into e a principality, and appointed Don Angelo, the cardinal's brother, general of the gallies, and Don Gasparo, his nephew, general of the forces of the church [u]. This sudden promotion of the family of Paluzzi, which was known to be poor and loaded with debts, greatly surprized the Romans, who dreaded that the new cardinal nephew and his relations would usurp the whole administration, and govern with great avarice and extortion. It quickly appeared that their fears were just; for cardinal Paluzzi or Altieri, refused to affix the seal to several grants and favours which the pope, according to the usual custom, had bestowed at his coronation, under pretence that his holiness had been surprised, or that the benefices had been disposed of before. He likewise gave orders to the master of the pope's chamber, and to all the attendants near his person, not to permit any addresses, petitions, f or memorials, to be presented to the pope, without his knowlege and permission. Thus the cardinal nephew assumed an absolute power, and disposed of all offices, benefices, and places of trust, according to his pleasure, which was always regulated by the greatest profit; which proceeding occasioned an universal murmuring among the Romans, many of whom, since the promotion of the pope, deduced their lineage from some branch or other of the family of Altieri, and pretended to be his relations either by blood or alliance. The opposition to the exorbitant and despotic power of the nephew was not so great, however, as might have been expected; for as it was confined to ecclesiastical affairs and domestic concerns, it was overlooked at first by the courts of France and Spain; and the cardinals

a hoped, that, from the great age of the pope, it would be of very ſhort duration. But this very reaſon prompted the cardinal nephew to make the greateſt advantage of his preſent proſperity; he therefore ſought, by all means, to eſtabliſh the grandeur of his family, and ſoon after contracted an alliance with the houſe of Colonna.

After his departure, father Nitardo, inquiſitor general of Spain, was left as reſident ambaſſador at Rome, and was dignified with the title of archbiſhop of Edeſſa by the pope, who the following year promoted him, and ſeveral others, to the dignity of cardinal [w]. Clement, A. That he might not ſeem, however, intirely to neglect the Chriſtian cauſe, he raiſed the ſum of 300,000 crowns, by a tax on eccleſiaſtical benefices in Italy, as a ſubſidy to the Poles, of which only 50,000 crowns were ſent into Poland, the reſt being detained by Altieri for his own uſe. The king of Poland dying about the ſame time, Altieri, to gratify the Spaniards, preſumed to recommend prince Charles of Lorrain as a proper ſucceſſor; but the Poliſh nobility, who had never received kings at the nomination and recommendation of Rome, choſe the great general of the crown, John Sobieski, who, according to the uſual privilege, immediately after his elec-

c tion, nominated the biſhop of Marſeilles, as the perſon for whom he deſired the cardinal's hat. Altieri, at the deſire of the Spaniards, made an objection to his nomination; and tho' the king perſiſted in the choice that he had made, he ſtill prevented the pope from beſtowing the hat; on which account, during the whole reign of Clement, there was a bad correſpondence betwixt Poland and the court of Rome. A. D. 1673.

THE cardinal nephew, however, was more favourable to the family of the late pope; for, about the beginning of the following year, he perſuaded Clement to beſtow the hat he had received from his predeceſſor upon Felice Roſpiglioſi. About the ſame time he engaged him in a diſpute with the French king, who intending to reform the order of St. Lazarus, for that purpoſe appointed a new chief or general, in conſequence of the right of red galia, or jus patronatus, which he affirmed was inherent in his crown. Altieri, to vindicate the papal authority from the king's uſurpations, perſuaded a certain Gaſcon, who had come to Rome for preferment, to accept of the honour of the abbot of the order of St. Lazarus, and conferred upon him the abbacy of St. Colombiere. This proceeding of Altieri was reſented with great warmth by the French ambaſſador, who impriſoned the ſcrivener that had drawn up the new abbot's memorial to the pope. The Gaſcon, however, had the confi- A. By this edict, he in ſome meaſure appeaſed the farmers, whom he had obliged to give a greater ſum than uſual for the cuſtoms, on account of the approach of the jubilee year. But the ambaſſadors complained loudly of his arbitrary and irregular government, and agreed to go in a body, and to demand an immediate audience of the

He, however, prevented their acceſs to the palace, by drawing chains acroſs the ſtreets, and placing guards at the avenues; and being ſure of the protection of the pope, he behaved with ſuch reſolution, that they were obliged in the end to comply with the edict, which, however, was not rigorouſly put in execution, they being ſtill allowed, in ſome meaſure, to enjoy their immunities by way of indulgence [y]. All the ambaſſadors then, by orders from their courts, were reconciled to him, except the duke D'Etrees, the ambaſſador of France, who alleged, as the cauſe of his remaining diſcontent, that Altieri had made ſecret offers to aſſiſt the Spaniards in regaining Meſſina from the French.

A. D. 1675. THE following year the jubilee was celebrated according to the uſual manner; and as Italy was at this time free from the diſturbances of war, great numbers of pilgrims and ſtrangers crowded to Rome, to receive the benefits of indulgences and pardons. During this feſtival Clement created ſix cardinals, among whom was Philip Howard, a Dominican, of the illuſtrious family of Norfolk, who had been great almoner to the queen of England. About the ſame time he received a letter from the king of Perſia, concerning an alliance againſt the Turks, in anſwer to one that his predeceſſor had written to that prince [z]. Another alliance againſt the grand ſignor was alſo propoſed to him, by an ambaſſador that arrived at Rome from Muſcovy. Clement received this ambaſſador with great reſpect: no treaty, however, was concluded, in conſequence of his embaſſy; and he returned to Muſcovy diſſatisfied, becauſe the pope refuſed the title of emperor to his maſter [a]. Soon after Clement had a diſpute with the viceroy of Naples, who having formed a reſolution of extirpating the banditti from that kingdom, had for ſome time proceeded againſt them with great rigour, and had even ordered ſome of them to be ſeized within the juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. The pope did not live to receive ſatisfaction for this inſult, but died a few months after, on the 22d of July, loaded with old age, which had enfeebled his underſtanding, and reduced him to dotage. A few hours before his death, Altieri preſſed him to fill up four vacant places of cardinals with creatures of his own, but he would not conſent; and to ſtop his importunity, he ſaid to him, ſomewhat moved, "You ought to be content as you "have been pope for ſix years: ſuffer me now to follow my own inclinations, and to be "pope for ſix hours only [b]." He is commended for his goodneſs and moderation [c]; but he was treated by the Romans with great contempt, for ſuffering the Altieri to govern in a moſt ſcandalous manner, and to oppreſs his ſubjects in order to enrich themſelves, and to build one of the fineſt palaces in Rome [d].

Clement dies at Rome.

Innocent XI. is elected.

As cardinal Altieri, on account of his arbitrary proceedings, had incurred the public hate, it was generally believed, that, upon the death of the pope, he would be removed from all his offices, and deprived of his ſuffrage in the enſuing conclave; but the immenſe wealth that he had acquired during the ſhort reign of his reputed uncle, procured him a great number of friends; ſo that after the pope's death was publiſhed, and the ſigillum piſcatorium broken in pieces, he quitted Monte Cavallo, and repaired with a numerous train, to his new palace, where he received viſits of condolance from the cardinals, princes, ambaſſadors, prelates, and nobles. After the funeral obſequies of the late pope were performed, the cardinals entered the conclave in proceſſion on the 2d of Auguſt, and next day, after ſome others had come in, which made their number amount to fifty-two, the doors were ſhut, and the guard committed to prince Savelli. Several candidates were propoſed and rejected at various ſcrutinies, the time being conſumed in a trifling manner till the 1ſt of September, when four other cardinals from France entered the conclave. Though at ſeveral ſcrutinies many votes had appeared in favour of Odeſcalchi, yet the election was ſtill deferred, till a courier ſhould return from France with the approbation of Lewis XIV. His recommendation being obtained, the French ambaſſador entered the conclave, and preſented his letters to the cardinals, who accordingly, on the 21ſt of September, after the ambaſſador had retired, choſe Odeſcalchi, who took the name of Innocent XI [e].

HE had been a candidate at the former election; but the auſterity of his manners, and the innocence of his life, prevented him from ſucceeding [f]. At this conclave he ſhewed ſome reluctance to accept of the pontifical dignity; and before he would conſent he propoſed ſome articles for the reformation of the eccleſiaſtical government, which he required the cardinals to ſubſcribe to the performance of [g]. His former name was Benedict, and he was born at Como, of a very antient family, which is even ſaid to have flouriſhed in the times of the Lombards and Charlemagne [h]. In his youth he was educated in his own country by the Jeſuits, and afterwards he ſtudied the civil and canon law, partly at Rome, and partly at Naples. He propoſed at firſt to follow the profeſſion of arms in the Neapolitan ſervice; but ſtopping at Rome in his way to Naples, he was prevailed upon to embrace an eccleſiaſtical life; and having a conſiderable revenue of his own, he was immediately made a prelate [i]. Urban VIII. made him one of the prothonotaries of the apoſtolic chamber, and afterwards preſident of the ſame; then commiſſary of the province of La Marca, and governor of Macerata. Upon his return to Rome he made a preſent of a valuable ſervice of plate to Donna Olympia, which he obſerved ſhe had coveted, and by that means obtained the office of clerk of the chamber. Soon after, by voluntarily loſing conſiderable ſums of money in her houſe at play he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat, and was afterwards appointed legate at Ferrara, and bia bishop of Novara, which bishopric, some years after, he resigned to his brother, as the air of that place did not agree with his health [k]. In the mean time he lived at Rome in a retired and modest manner, and was looked upon as a good and charitable man, disengaged from the world, without pride, vanity, and pomp, moderately zealous, without bigotry, and chiefly severe upon himself [l].

He proposes a general reformation.

After his elevation he no sooner took the government of affairs into his own hands, than he began a reformation in several particulars. He determined to abolish nepotism, and prohibited his nephew Don Livio from receiving or returning visits as nephew of the pope. The senate of Venice honoured him with the title of nobility, and he was created duke of Ceri, which were all the honours he acquired; for the pope by no intreaties could be prevailed b upon to make him general of the church, or cardinal patron. Innocent even proposed by a bull, for ever to abolish that name and office; but he could not obtain the consent of the cardinals, of those especially who aspired at the pontificate. In the mean time he was indefatigable in re-establishing his finances, which were in the utmost disorder; in reforming the divine service, in correcting several abuses in the city, and in endeavouring to revive modesty and virtue among the ecclesiastics and religious orders. He immediately sent nuncios to France, Spain, Poland, and Portugal, exhorting them to peace; and abolished a great many indulgences, confraternities, and new offices, invented by superstition and monkery. He prohibited the Jews from dealing in usury, though he himself became afterwards the most insufferable usurer by threatening to reduce the interest of the money in the pubc lic bank one-half per cent. unless the proprietors would accept of 70 crowns for a hundred [m].

To assist him in the administration of the government, Innocent made choice of cardinal Cibo, whom he appointed superintendant and secretary of the ecclesiastical state. At the same time he reduced his army and increased the number of archers at Rome, with the intention of proceeding severely against all kinds of criminals. He publicly reproved the cardinals for their pomp and luxury, sent the bishops who remained at Rome to their dioceses, appointed four divines to reform the abuses of the church, and four cardinals, with as many clergymen, to examine the lives and manners of those who aspired to the priesthood, and ordered that none should be admitted to that dignity, who were in the least blemished with an ill fame, or had not applied themselves to study [n]. To prevent the Altieri, as he said, d from plundering elsewhere, he allowed them to remain in Rome, and continued them in their military and other employments.

He sends a nuncio to assist at the negociations at Nimeguen. A. D. 1677.

The following year the conferences for a general peace being appointed at Nimeguen, he sent his nuncio thither, to act as mediator, who, though he was not acknowleged in that character by the protestant powers, yet received particular honours from the magistrates of the city, who offered him all security for the free exercise of his religion during the congress [o]. Mean while great disturbances happening at Rome, on account of the franchises and immunities claimed by ambassadors, Innocent resolved intirely to abolish them, the bulls published against those privileges by his predecessors Julius III. Pius IV. Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V. having been hitherto ineffectual. As the ambassadors extended their privileges to a consie derable extent round their houses, so as to comprehend several streets, through which the officers of justice were not even allowed to walk, a sanctuary was thereby afforded to an infinite number of criminals, and the Spanish ambassador at this time was accused of abusing this privilege, by confining in his quarter a great number of pressed men, who were to be shipped off to recruit the army at Messina. This report occasioned several tumults in Rome, which the pope endeavoured to suppress, by punishing the rioters severely: but to put a stop to the original cause of the disorder, he published an edict, intirely abolishing the privileges of quarters, against which the ambassadors protested, but without any effect; the pope continuing firm and resolute, and prevailing upon the queen of Sweden to renounce the privif leges of her quarter, as an example to the rest [p].

He abolishes the franchises of ambassadors.

Before this contest about the franchises was entirely settled, the pope was engaged in another with the king of France about the regalia, or the right of investiture of bishoprics. Since the publication of the king's edict, declaring that right inherent in the crown, there had been some dispute in France, betwixt the king and the bishop of Pamiers, who refused to accept of one nominated by the king as his archdeacon, and appealed to the pope. Clement X. did not concern himself much in the controversy; but Innocent espoused the cause of the bishop, and wrote two briefs to the king, exhorting him not to violate the liberties of the church, by subjecting those dioceses to the regalia who were exempted from it;

As Lewis had ſequeſtered all the revenues of the biſhop of Pamiers, the pope likewiſe wrote to the cardinal d'Etrees, deſiring him to uſe all his influence in ſupport of the authority of the holy ſee; but by the cardinal's anſwer, he found that he was more attached to the king than to the ſee of Rome. The cardinal, indeed, ſoon after was ſent to Rome to treat with the pope; but his negociation was ineffectual, both parties inſiſting obſtinately upon their different pretenſions. Lewis XIV. in the mean time aſſembled all the biſhops then at Paris, who aſſerted the authority of national churches in judging of all matters, both of faith and manners; and prayed his ma- b jeſty to give leave for aſſembling a national council or general aſſembly.

The clergy of France declare againſt the pretenſions of the pope. A. D. 1682.

THE king conſented to call a general aſſembly, which was accordingly ſummoned to meet the 1ſt of October following. Its firſt deliberations were concerning the regalia, which queſtion was debated for ſome time. At length, on the third of February, an act was ſigned, whereby they declared, that the right to the regalia was inherent in the crown, and ought to prevail through the whole kingdom, without regarding the pretended exemption of ſome biſhoprics. The prelates likewiſe wrote concerning the diſpute to his holineſs; and, a few days after, the archbiſhop of Paris preſented the act to the king, together with the letter to the pope, which they begged his majeſty to order the duke d'Etrees to deliver to his holi- c neſs. They in the mean time continued their aſſembly, and made ſeveral regulations on-cerning morals and church diſcipline. To put a ſtop to the uſurpations of the ſee of Rome, they drew up four propoſitions; by the firſt of which they affirmed, that a general council was above the pope, according to the doctrine eſtabliſhed in the 4th and 5th ſeſſions of the council of Conſtance, rejecting the opinion of thoſe who allege that the doctrine above-mentioned is only true during a ſchiſm. In the 2d they aſſerted, that neither the pope nor the univerſal church has any power over the temporal juriſdiction of kings, who cannot be depoſed, and whoſe ſubjects can never be abſolved from their oath of allegiance. By the 3d they declared, that the power of the pope ought to be limited by the canons, and that he had no authority to decree any thing contrary to the liberties of the Gallican church, and to the maxims eſtabliſhed by the councils. In the laſt they maintained, that the deciſions of the d pope in matters of faith are not authentic, without the conſent of the univerſal church; therefore that he was not infallible, unleſs at the head of a council, and then only when he decreed according to the deciſions of the ſaid council. The king, by an edict, ordered the profeſſors in divinity and the canon law to teach theſe four propoſitions, and all his ſubjects to receive them, prohibiting the publiſhing of any doctrines that were contrary to them [r].

DURING theſe tranſactions in France, in oppoſition to the papal power, Innocent furniſhed the emperor with ſeveral ſubſidies againſt the Turks, who aſſiſted the rebels in Hungary, and threatened to invade that kingdom. He likewiſe condemned ſixty-five propoſitions about caſes of morality, which were partly drawn from the writings of the Jeſuits, and tended to the depravation of manners. And as there were no leſs than twenty-ſix e vacancies in the ſacred college, he made a promotion of ſixteen cardinals, reſerving the other ten hats to gratify kings or princes, who ſhould deſire that dignity for any of their favourites [s]. Being informed of the proceedings of the French biſhops, he immediately called a conſiſtory, in which they were formally condemned, and their four propoſitions ordered to be burnt: and in anſwer to their letter, he wrote to them in very ſevere terms, accuſing them of betraying the cauſe of God, and aſſuring them, that he was reſolved, at the hazard of his life, to defend the honour and authority of the holy ſee [t]. The cardinal d'Etrees ſtill reſiding at Rome, and finding the pope inflexible, the controverſy was allowed to remain in ſuſpence, rather than occaſion a breach of amity with the holy ſee; the pope, nevertheleſs, during the reſt of his pontificate, retained a warm reſentment againſt the French. f

He aſſiſts the emperor againſt the Turks. A. D. 1683.

THE following year, Innocent being informed of the immenſe preparations made by the Turks, which were deſigned againſt the emperor, he urged the king of Poland to conclude an alliance with Leopold, which was accordingly negociated by his nuncio at Warſovia; by which Sobieſki engaged to march in perſon to the relief of Vienna, if it ſhould be beſieged [u]. Though the infidels, in the end of September, were ignominiouſly defeated, and obliged to raiſe the ſiege of that city with great loſs, yet as the year after they ſtill continued their incurſions in Hungary, the pope was very ſollicitous to form a general league againſt them, and offered to contribute to the utmoſt of his power by ſubſidies in money, which he con-

DURING the progreſs of the war in Hungary againſt the infidels, the pope received the news of the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and of the proſecution of the proteſtants in France, on which account great rejoicings were made at Rome. The pope wrote to the king, commending his zeal and ſingular piety, and ordered Te Deum to be ſung, and the cannon of St. Angelo to be fired. He likewiſe teſtified his joy on that account in a Latin diſcourſe which he made to the conſiſtory; though ſeveral authors affirm, on the teſtimony of a letter which then appeared under the name of the queen of Sweden [x], that the pope diſapproved of the cruelties exerciſed againſt the proteſtants; while others ſay, that he was ignorant of their
b ſufferings, his health not allowing him to read the treatiſes which were then publiſhed on that ſubject [y].

and publicly approves of the revocation of the edict of Nantz. A. D. 1686.

INNOCENT in the mean time endeavoured, with great zeal, to repreſs the immodeſty and luxury of the dreſs of the women at Rome. In the firſt years of his pontificate he had ordered the capuchins, both confeſſors and preachers, to labour for the reformation of manners; and as the panic which had ſeized Italy, upon the irruption of the Turks into Germany, produced no effect, about that time he publiſhed an edict, ordering the women, both married and unmarried, to cover their ſhoulders and boſom to the neck, and their arms to the wriſt, threatening thoſe who did not obey within ſix days with excommunication, ipſo facto; and declaring that confeſſors, who ſhould preſume to abſolve any one, ſhould themſelves incur c the excommunication, and beſides be liable to all the ſpiritual and temporal puniſhments his holineſs ſhould think proper; which temporal puniſhments, fathers, huſbands, maſters, and heads of families, ſhould likewiſe incur, if they connived at the breach of the edict in any of thoſe under their authority. Theſe terrible menaces, however, produced but little reformation; ſo that this year the pope publiſhed another prohibition, expreſsly forbidding the women to employ any maſter of muſic to teach them to ſing, or to play on any inſtrument, even though the maſter ſhould be an eccleſiaſtic, or their own near relation; at the ſame time ordering the nuns, who were uſed to ſing at divine ſervice, to learn only from other nuns their companions [z].

Sumptuary laws againſt luxury of dreſs.

SOON after the pope was offended with the treaty of Augsburgh, concluded betwixt the d emperor, the king of Spain, and the eſtates of the empire, for their mutual defence againſt the enterprizes of the French king; not that he favoured the ambitious ſchemes of Lewis XIV. but becauſe the contracting powers had declared, in expreſs words, that they intended to provide againſt all infractions of the truce by France, both in ſpirituals and temporals. He inſiſted upon an alteration of that article; and his deſire not being complied with, he withdrew his ſubſidy from the emperor, though at the ſame time he granted a conſiderable ſum to the king of Poland [a]. This bad correſpondence betwixt him and the emperor continued but for a ſhort time; for, in the beginning of the following year, he renewed the ſubſidy, and granted a red hat to one of his nomination.

A. D. 1687.

ABOUT this time the ſect of the Quietiſts began to appear at Rome, and in ſeveral other e cities of Italy. The author of the ſect was one Molinos, a Spaniſh prieſt, who ſome time before had publiſhed a book, intituled, Il guida ſpirituale; in which he advanced ſeveral uncommon doctrines; and making ſmall account of corporal auſterities, reduced all the exerciſes of religion to a ſimplicity of mind, and abſtract devotion by a ſilent contemplation of God, and withdrawing the ſoul from all groſs images. Several of his tenets, however, were alleged to have an immoral tendency; ſo that the pope, at the inſtigation of the Jeſuits, ordered him, and ſeveral of his followers, to be impriſoned in the inquiſition, where he was put to the torture, to prevail with him to abjure his opinions. He, nevertheleſs, defended his doctrines with great ſubtilty, to the ſurprize of the cardinals and divines that examined him. The pope himſelf is ſaid to have looked upon him as a good man, and to have
f had a great opinion of his ſanctity; and ſeveral of the cardinals were thought to have ſecretly embraced his opinions: however, he was condemned to perpetual impriſonment, and obliged to abjure ſixty-eight propoſitions taken from his works [b].

The ſect of the Quietiſts is ſuppreſſed.

THE pope was not only diſturbed with the affair of Molinos, but likewiſe with the pretenſions of the French king to the privilege of franchiſes at Rome. The duke d'Etrees dying the foregoing year, Innocent ordered his nuncio at Paris to inform the king of his reaſons for aboliſhing franchiſes, and to deſire him to drop all pretenſions to that privilege: but Lewis XIV. replied in a haughty manner, that he intended to ſend another ambaſſador to Rome, and was reſolved to maintain the antient rights of his crown in that city. Innocent, irritated by this reply, on the 2d day of May publiſhed a bull, denouncing the penalty of the greater excommunication againſt all thoſe, whether eccleſiaſtics or ſeculars, who ſhould a claim or defend the privileges commonly called franchiſes, or ſhould, directly or indirectly, diſturb the officers of juſtice in the execution of their orders. He likewiſe ſent a maſter of the ceremonies to meet the new French ambaſſador at Bologna, to declare to him, that he would not be received in that character, unleſs he renounced his pretenſions to the franchiſes. The marquis de Lavardin the ambaſſador, without ſatisfying the maſter of the ceremonies, proceeded to Rome, attended by 200 officers, and 500 marine guards; and having intimidated the pope's officers, who offered to ſearch his baggage, he took poſſeſſion of the whole

A. D. 1688. quarter belonging to his predeceſſor, where he kept a continual guard. The pope, however, refuſed him an audience, treated him as a perſon excommunicated, and interdicted the church and the clergy of the pariſh of St. Lewis, where he was informed the ambaſſador on b
Chriſtmas-day had performed his devotions [c]. Lavardin proteſted againſt this ſentence of interdiction; and according to orders from his court, appeared frequently in the ſtreets and the churches, and took all opportunities of aſſerting the privileges belonging to his character. Innocent at the ſame time renewed the diſpute concerning the regalia; and by refuſing bulls in favour of thoſe biſhops appointed by the king, kept thirty-eight cathedral churches without paſtors.

'Tis probable Innocent followed the example of his predeceſſor Sixtus V. and ſaw the neceſſity of thwarting the ambition of Lewis XIV. who at this time diſturbed the repoſe of Europe, as much as his catholic majeſty Philip II. had ever done. Though the French king, in reſentment, ſeized the city and county of Avignon, in hopes that Innocent, like Alexander c
VII. would condeſcend to a ſubmiſſion, yet he found himſelf greatly miſtaken; for the

Though the cardinal's competitor, prince Clement of Bavaria, lay under ſeveral incapacities, A. D. 1689. the pope removed theſe by a bull, and confirmed him in the archbiſhopric, which ſerved Lewis XIV. with a pretence to renew the war [d]. On this occaſion the pope was accuſed by La Fontaine, Racine, and a great number of other French writers of abandoning the catholic cauſe, which they alleged was promoted by the conqueſts of their monarch [e]. The Jeſuits d even in ſome monaſteries, ordered public prayers to be made for his converſion [f].

It is certain that Innocent did not warmly countenance the deſigns of James II. of England, for reſtoring the catholic religion in that kingdom. He had indeed appointed a nuncio at London, but he received the Engliſh ambaſſador at Rome with great indifference; and one Mr. Porter coming at this time to Rome, to aſk his aſſiſtance in the expedition which king James was then undertaking for his reſtoration, he granted him only ſome chaplets and indulgencies, while at the ſame time he ſent money to the emperor to be employed againſt the Turks, which was in reality made uſe of to oppoſe the king's return [g]. Mean while the diſtempers, which he had for a conſiderable time laboured under, increaſing, he had waited for his death with much impatience. He was reckoned one of the beſt popes that for a long time had filled the papal chair: his ſubjects, nevertheleſs, ſtill felt the miſeries of a deſpotic government to a great degree, as he did not aboliſh any of the taxes of his predeceſſors, while at the ſame time he kept a very frugal court, did not employ any money in public buildings, and neglected to fill up the vacancies in the ſacred college; ſo that the circulation of money being languid, and the taxes exceſſive high, great numbers of people were compelled to leave his territories. On this account it was believed that Rome loſt one-fourth part of its inhabitants during his pontificate [h].

nice, which is ſaid to have come originally from the iſland Negropont in the Archipelago. Some of his anceſtors had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the wars of the republic againſt the Turks: his father had enjoyed the office of grand chancellor of the republic, and had purchaſed a patent of nobility, which had coſt him 100,000 ducats. After he had finiſhed his ſtudies at Venice and Padua, at which laſt place he took the degree of doctor of laws, he went to Rome, in the 20th year of his age, where Urban VIII. made him referendary of both ſignatures, appointed him governor of Terni, Rieti, and Citta Caſtellana, and afterwards, at the nomination of the republic, made him one of the auditors of the rota or rolls. Innocent X. created him a cardinal prieſt, and two years after conferred upon him the biſhopric of a Breſcia. Alexander VII. recalled him to Rome, and appointed him datary. He had a great ſhare in the public affairs during Clement IX. Clement X. and Innocent XI. was a member of all the congregations at Rome, and, when promoted to the pontificate, was biſhop of Freſcati, and ſubdean of the ſacred college. He was of an active, vigilant diſpoſition; had a ſmiling aſpect, and agreeable manners; ſo that having acquired a general eſteem, his election gave great joy to the Romans [i].

He promiſes aſſiſtance to the abdicated king of England.

ALTHOUGH he was older than the deceaſed pope when he arrived at the pontificate, yet he acted in the beginning of his reign with great vigour, and deſired to examine and to tranſact every affair himſelf. He immediately wrote to James II. late king of England, exhorting him to ſuffer his adverſe fortune patiently, and promiſing to ſpare neither his prayers, b authority, nor purſe, for his reſtoration [k]. As Louis XIV. had renewed the war with the emperor, he deſired to ſecure the favour of the pope, and therefore immediately reſtored Avignon, and dropped his pretenſions to the franchiſes at Rome: Alexander, in return, ſeeming not to give great attention to the diſpute concerning the regalia, which had continued in ſuſpence during the reign of his predeceſſor. The chief advantage, however, that the king of France gained by his good correſpondence with the new pope, was a delay of the peace which the emperor deſired to conclude with the Turks, with the intention of turning the whole of his force againſt France. Alexander, by his exhortations, and by the ſubſidies which he granted to Leopold and the Venetians, prevailed with them to continue the war againſt the infidels.

He obſerves no meaſures in aggrandizing his family.

c BUT the chief concern of the pope was the aggrandizing of his family; for he promoted all his nephews within three weeks after his elevation. He created his grand nephew cardinal patron, legate of Avignon, and grand chancellor of the Roman church, which laſt office Innocent XI. had aboliſhed. He afterwards conferred upon him ſuch a number of benefices, that his annual revenue amounted to 80,000 crowns. He appointed his nephew, Don Antonio general of the forces of the church, and another nephew, Don Marco, general of the gallies, and afterwards duke of Fiano, which duchy he purchaſed for him, and likewiſe procured for him an advantageous marriage with the houſe of Colonna [l] (D).

He renews the diſpute with France about the regalia. A. D. 1690.

NOTWITHSTANDING the ſeeming attachment the pope at firſt diſcovered to the intereſts of France, he ſoon renewed the diſpute concerning the regalia; and the following year he re- d fuſed the bulls to thoſe prelates who had aſſiſted at the general aſſembly of the clergy at Paris, unleſs they would agree to a recantation. The prelates rejected this condition, while both courts ſeemed averſe to a rupture, and conſented to a negociation, to put an end to the diſpute. The French found it inconſiſtent with their pretenſions to grant the terms of ſatisfaction which the pope demanded; and in the month of September a deputy was diſpatched to Rome, to ſupport the cauſe of the biſhops. The pope, however, though he agreed to a negotiation, had reſolved not to relinquiſh his claim; and a few weeks before the arrival of this deputy, had drawn up a bull, condemning the propoſitions compoſed by the general aſſembly. He kept this bull a ſecret, and ſtill endeavoured to prevail with the king of France to comply with his deſire; but finding his health declining, and Lewis XIV. threatening to His death.
e re-eſtabliſh the pragmatic ſanction, if the bulls were not granted before Eaſter, he publiſhed A. D. 1691. his bull on the 30th of January, and died two days after, in the 81ſt year of his age, having enjoyed the pontificate only fifteen months and twenty-two days [m]. He greatly diſappointed the expectations that were raiſed upon his promotion, and had rendered himſelf unacceptable to the empire, France, and Spain. The French writers at firſt made him the ſubject of panegyric, but they quickly changed their ſtile, and publiſhed ſevere ſatires againſt him. The Romans likewiſe revenged themſelves for the extortions of the Ottoboni by daily paſquinades, but the reproaches of the public did not influence his conduct. His predeceſſor, by oppreſſing his ſubjects with grievous taxes, had left about a million and a half of crowns in the treaſury, which Alexander immediately diſpoſed of. Beſides, he gave his nephew 100,000 f crowns, which Innocent had raiſed by ſequeſtering the revenues of ſome vacant churches, as a fund for the ſubſidies againſt the Turks. He likewiſe made a promotion of cardinals, by which means ſeveral vacancies were made among the clerks of the chamber, each of which offices he ſold for 60,000 crowns. He was greatly addicted to pleaſantry, and was familiar to every one without diſtinction. He is acuſed of a great many vices, but more particularly of drunkenneſs and atheiſm [n].

THE intrigues of the following conclave delayed the election for several months; at length, on the 12th of July, Anthony Pignatelli was elected, and took the name of Innocent XII. He was born at Naples, of an ancient and noble family, which had originally come from Tropea, a city in Further Calabria. Having made choice of an ecclesiastical life, he came early to Rome, where he finished his studies, and afterwards by his merit recommended himself to several popes. Urban VIII. made him vice-legate of the duchy of Urbino. Innocent X. appointed him inquisitor of Malta, governor of Viterbo, and nuncio at Florence; and his successor Alexander VII. sent him as nuncio to Poland and Vienna. Clement X. made him master of the household, and Innocent XI. honoured him with the hat, created him bishop of Faenza, legate of Bologna, and at last archbishop of Naples; in memory of which favours he took the same name, and declared that he would do his utmost to follow his steps, and to abolish nepotism [o]. He had hitherto lived in an exemplary manner, was remarkable for his simplicity, and seemed intirely free from artifice and dissimulation [p].

He reforms many abuses in Rome.

THE rejoicings at Rome on account of the election of the new pope were extraordinary. Immediately after his coronation (E) he applied himself to redress the disorders occasioned by the long vacation of the see. He refused to grant any benefices, or any share in the government, to his relations, and even prohibited them from coming to Rome. At the same time he declared, that he desired to be the universal father of the church and of good men; and that he would give employments only to men of merit, without regarding acquaintance or kindred. He forbade the officers of justice to take bribes, or to have regard to persons in the administration of their office. He had frequent conferences with cardinal Casanata about the means of extirpating the abuses and disorders that had crept into the government, and into the city of Rome. He recommended good œconomy to the masters of the household, and to the commissaries of the chamber, ordering, that the expence of his dinner should not exceed a feston, or eighteen-pence; and that nothing should be provided for his supper. He suppressed all useless offices, and by these means made a saving of 80,000 crowns a year to the apostolic chamber, which was indebted 5000000 of crowns, by nepotism, during the short reign of his predecessor. He ordered the Sbirri to go into all the quarters of the ambassadors, and commanded the garrison at Rome to assist them in case of need [q]. He soon after ordered a young man to be hanged for having offered to oppose them; which example of severity, though very disagreeable to the people, was nevertheless at this time very necessary; for assassins were become so daring and numerous at Rome, that, during the late vacation of the see, no less than 182 persons were murdered. The same day he happened, by a fall, to hurt his thigh, which accident obliged him for some time to keep his bed, and interrupted a laudable custom, which he had introduced about a month after his election, of giving public audience every Monday to the poor, and to all those who had any thing to propose to him.

ALTHO' he acquired great reputation by his conduct; yet his subjects did not receive so much advantage from it as might be expected, as he had not the resolution to grant any favours without consulting his ministers. It was, however, a means of the reformation of several abuses. Upon receiving a complaint against a Roman prince, he compelled him to pay his creditors, and to behave to his vassals with moderation. He imprisoned a duke in the castle of St. Angelo, for having threatened his uncle, who was a prelate; and banished a cavalier, who had been guilty of some irregularities, notwithstanding the intercession of a cardinal his uncle. Some ladies were sent to the castle of St Angelo for having played at bassat and hazard contrary to his edict; and some of the Sbirri were whipped for having taken money from several great players at cards whom they had discovered. He prohibited the ecclesiastics from wearing perukes, and ordered all the curates at Rome to assemble every Wednesday, to confer about cases of conscience. He was chiefly intent upon doing good to the poor, whom he called his nephews. He ordered 5000 of them to be lodged in the Lateran palace, and assigned a fund of 300,000 crowns for their support; at the same time, to prevent the increase of the number of poor, imprisoning or banishing all idle persons who refused to work [r].

IN the second year of his pontificate, by steadiness and resolution, he obliged the cardinals to comply with his design of abolishing nepotism. Several members of the sacred college were equally zealous with himself in that affair; and cardinal Albani, who was ordered to compose the bull, drew it up in the strictest terms, taking all possible precaution to a prevent any evaſions of future popes, and limiting the bounties that the moſt indulgent could grant to their nephews, in dignities and benefices, to the ſum of 12,000 crowns. Innocent publiſhed the bull, and cauſed it to be ſubſcribed by all the cardinals who were at Rome. He likewiſe ſuppreſſed the theatre where the operas were repreſented, and applied himſelf to reform the licentious manners of the regular monks, whoſe ſcandalous lives were a diſgrace to Chriſtianity. As theſe monks were very rich, and very numerous in Italy, and were beſides related to ſeveral conſiderable families, it was a bold attempt to venture to diſturb them. Upon the news of the intended reformation, Italy and Rome were filled with manuſcripts and printed pamphlets, deſcribing, in an exaggerated manner, the abuſes of the court of Rome, and exhorting his holineſs to begin at the root, and to reform the ſcandalous

b diſorders of thoſe who ought to give an example to the lower orders of the church. Innocent was not diverted from his intention by theſe writings; but, at length, he dropt the deſign, by the advice of thoſe who foreſaw the impoſſibility of ſucceeding [s].

MEAN while he carried on a negociation with the court of France, to regulate the difference about the regalia. Lewis XIV. endeavoured, in the beginning of his pontificate, to intimidate him with threats; but, finding him fixed and reſolute, he made ſeveral propoſitions for an accommodation, which were not accepted by the pope, who inſiſted peremptorily upon the ſubmiſſion of the biſhops. Innocent, by his firmneſs, at length forced the king to a ſubmiſſion; and the following year the French biſhops, who had aſſiſted at the general aſſembly, were compelled to write a Latin letter to the pope, wherein they declared, that
c they proſtrated themſelves at the feet of his holineſs, and that their grief, for the things that had paſſed in the aſſembly, which had ſo greatly diſpleaſed him and his predeceſſors, was very great, proceeded from the heart, and was more than they could expreſs. They therefore proteſted, that they held, and ought to hold, as null and invalid, all that had been decreed in that aſſembly with regard to the authority of the church and the pope. By this baſe and mean compliance, the court and biſhops of France were reconciled to the holy ſee, the deſpotic government in that kingdom forcing the prelates, in this public manner, to ſign what it is more than probable they believed a falſehood [t].

The French biſhops make their ſubmiſſion to the pope; A. D. 1693.

INNOCENT, having gained this victory over the French monarch, reſolved likewiſe to make the emperor ſubmit to his pretenſions. As there were many ſmall fiefs in the eccle-
d ſiaſtical ſtate that acknowleged the emperor as ſovereign, the count of Martinitz, the imperial ambaſſador at Rome, publiſhed a placard, ordering the poſſeſſors of, and pretenders to theſe fiefs, to make an acknowlegment to Leopold. Innocent was highly offended with this proceeding of the ambaſſador, and ordered cardinal Altieri to affix another placard, wherein, by his ſovereign authority, he declared all the fiefs within his territories reunited to the chamber of the church. On this account a great number of ſatirical writings were publiſhed by both parties; but the emperor, to prevent a final rupture, recalled his ambaſſador, and in his ſtead ſent the count of Lamberg, who ſeemed leſs reſolute than his predeceſſor, and purpoſely dropt the diſpute, leſt the pope, in reſentment, ſhould declare openly for the king of France, who at this time had a powerful army in Italy, under the command of Ca-
e tinat [u]. Lewis XIV. by his ſubmiſſion to Innocent, had ſo far gained his favour, that he privately devoted himſelf to the intereſt of France, withdrew his ſubſidy from the emperor, and wrote to the king of Spain to prevail with him to abandon the general alliance. His catholic majeſty, however, in his anſwer to the pope, juſtified the neceſſity of the war, which, he ſaid, was undertaken to procure the general repoſe of Europe, and the advancement of the catholic religion [w].

THE pope, not being able to prevail with the king of Spain to agree to a peace with France, applied himſelf to the duke of Savoy, with whom he was ſucceſsful; for, the offers made by France being very conſiderable, the following year the duke concluded a treaty with Lewis XIV. by which a neutrality was ſtipulated for Italy. Innocent being deſirous to f ſee the imperial troops out of Italy, ſent a preſent of 60,000 crowns to be diſtributed among the Germans [x]. At the ſame time he ſent a ſubſidy to the Venetians againſt the Turks, and another to king James; while at Rome he was endeavouring, to the utmoſt of his power, to put a ſtop to the progreſs of Quietiſm; which ſect was daily gaining ground, notwithſtanding the ſeverities of the inquiſition. The following year he received the agreeable news of the concluſion of a general peace, and of the converſion of the elector of Saxony to the Roman catholic religion, and ſent a nuncio to Poland, to congratulate him upon his election to that crown.

Archbishop of Cambray is accused of Quietism.

Soon after he received an accusation against the celebrated Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray, who was said to have embraced the doctrines and opinions of the Quietists. The archbishop, about the conclusion of the peace of Ryswick, had published a book concerning the maxims of the saints; in which he affirmed, that the true foundation of piety was a pure and disinterested love of God. From thence M. Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, who is said to have had a private pique against him, took an occasion of accusing him of Quietism. The archbishop defended the opinions he had published; but his enemies carrying the affair to Rome, his book was this year condemned by a bull, to which he immediately paid an entire submission. Instead of appealing from the censures of the apostolic chair, by vague protestations of catholicism, upon receiving the pope's bull he kissed it; and, ascending the pulpit, exhorted his hearers to conform to it, declaring, that he himself abjured his former sentiments from the heart. By this conduct he disappointed his enemies, and gave great satisfaction to the pope, who soon after wrote a brief to him, as a testimony of his regard for him, and approbation of his conduct [y]. Mean while Lewis XIV. who probably acted by the persuasion of his confessor, and had condescended to sollicit the bull from Rome, ordered the parliament of Paris to register it, and by his letters patent required the bishops to receive it in the assemblies of the different provinces. Both the bishops and the parliament, however, upon receiving the bull, added a protestation of saving the authority of the ancient canons [z].

His book is condemned. A. D. 1699.

A jubilee at Rome. A. D. 1700.

As the following year was supposed to begin a new century, the pope published a bull for the celebration of a jubilee at Rome; on which account great numbers both of protestants and papists, crouded thither, which occasioned a considerable augmentation to the revenues of his holiness. Innocent did not live to see the conclusion of this festival; but, after a long illness, died on the 7th of September, in the 86th year of his age, and the 10th of his pontificate, greatly reverenced and esteemed for his uprightness and integrity [a].

The long indisposition of Innocent had given leisure to the cardinals to form parties for the following conclave, which was composed of no less than fifty-nine members. Accordingly the factions and intrigues were very violent; but the disorders in Rome obliged the cardinals to lay aside their private cabals, and to hasten the election. All the factions at length united in the choice of cardinal John Francis Albani, who by a rare example of modesty, for three days refused, with the most ardent protestations, to consent to their choice. He prayed, wept, and conjured the cardinals to turn their thoughts upon a more worthy person; and, as a reason of his dissent, he mentioned his great love for his relations, which would influence him to break the law against nepotism, to the scandal of Christianity, the dishonour of the sacred college, and the damnation of his own soul. At last he yielded, on the 3d of November, and took the name of Clement XI. being then only in the 51st year of his age [b]. He was descended from a family of note in the dutchy of Urbino, his grandfather having been created a Roman senator by Urban VIII. After he had completed his studies, he was at first a canon in St. Laurence in Damaso, then vicar of St. Peter's, and afterwards governor of Rieti and Orvieto. Innocent XI. recalled him from Orvieto, and made him secretary of the briefs. As he was gay and chearful, he insinuated himself into the favour of cardinal Ottoboni; who, after his promotion to the pontificate, under the name of Alexander VIII. conferred upon him the dignity of cardinal, without allowing his nephews to accept of any money from him. Innocent XII. kept him near his person, and employed him in the administration of affairs, as an expert man, who possessed the rare talent of pleasing every one [c].

Clement XI. is elected.

He resolves to execute justice with exactness.

Immediately after his coronation, he declared to the governor of Rome, and to the principal officers, that he intended to cause justice to be executed with the utmost exactness, without respect of persons, ordering the Sbirri to have no regard to the quarters of the ambassadors, but to pursue criminals in every place without distinction. He appointed one of his nephews secretary of briefs; but, that he might not seem partial to his relations, he ordered that, according to the general rule, they should be examined with regard to their fitness and merit. He appeared to act with vigour, and every day was giving new orders to suppress different abuses, which had prevailed during the former reigns. He was always with the pen in his hand, to make remarks on different occurrences; and not trusting intirely to his ministers, desired to see and examine into every chief matter himself [d].

Refuses to engage in the war about the Spanish succession. A. D. 1701.

Soon after his election, he wrote with his own hand to king James, and sent him his picture. He likewise, in a private consistory, granted the investiture of Naples to Philip V. of Spain, grandson of Lewis XIV. who contested the succession of that kingdom with the archduke Charles, second son of the emperor. This dispute occasioned great disquietudes to the a pope, who was ſollicited ſtrongly by each party to declare himſelf in his favour. As he was afraid leſt the party he ſhould eſpouſe might be worſted, he would not declare for either; but embraced a neutrality, and offered himſelf as mediator of the difference. Each party, however, being reſolved to aſſert his right by arms, his mediation was rejected, and Lewis XIV. in behalf of his grandſon, took poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe; which obliged the pope to raiſe 10,000 men, and put his frontier places into a ſtate of defence, to prevent himſelf from being inſulted, and forced to abandon the neutrality. He leaned, however, to the ſide of France; and, hearing that the emperor intended to ſend an army into Italy, wrote to him, exhorting him to deſiſt from that intention, and aſſuring him that God would reward him a hundred fold.

b THE imperialiſts, nevertheleſs, entered Italy, where they quickly made a conſiderable progreſs, which obliged the pope to act with great reſerve. He therefore refuſed the Hacqueney, which was offered him in the name of Philip V. and, that he might ſeem to act with great impartiality, he ſent extraordinary nuncios to the emperor, and to the kings of France and Spain, to exhort them to peace. Clement had before this time acknowleged Philip as king of Spain, but refuſed to declare himſelf with regard to his ſucceſſion to Naples. The following year, the French being reinforced in Italy, and Philip V. arriving at the camp, Clelemnt ſent cardinal Barberini to wait upon him as legate à latere, with a preſent of a golden croſs, of the value of 10,000 crowns; which proceeding gave great offence to the imperialiſts [c].

c THOUGH the pope favoured the cauſe of Philip againſt his competitor, he was nevertheleſs offended with the juſt reſpects ſhewn to him by one of his ſubjects. Philip had aſſiſted at a divine ſervice, where cardinal Cantelmi, archbiſhop of Naples, had officiated. Afterwards he invited him to dine with him; when the cardinal, according to the reſpect paid by a ſubject to his ſovereign, continued ſtanding during the entertainment. This ſubmiſſion offended the court of Rome, and the pope wrote a brief to the cardinal, blaming his conduct, ordering him not to behave in ſuch a manner for the future, and delaring that what he had done ought not to ſerve as an example to others [f]. In the mean time, that the delay of accepting the Hacqueney might not prejudice the rights of the king of Spain to the kingdom of Naples, Clement conſented to declare, by an authentic act, that the delay
d ſhould have no conſequence to invalidate the right [g]. He likewiſe ordered Clementia Marchioni, an abbeſs of a monaſtery in Naples, to be apprehended, for endeavouring, by pretended prophecies, to cauſe the people to revolt in favour of the archduke Charles. The common people had a great opinion of her ſanctity, and believed her a real propheteſs; but ſhe afterwards made a ſolemn abjuration, in the great hall of the inquiſition, before an extraordinary aſſembly of cardinals and officers of the holy office; and confeſſing that, from vanity ſhe had deſigned to impoſe upon the world, ſhe was condemned to an impriſonment for ten years [h].

SOON after, towards the end of the year, he publiſhed an edict againſt luxury and extravagant entertainments, prohibiting the acting of plays, and the diverſions of the carnival, e and deſiring that ſeaſon to be employed in prayers for peace among the catholic princes [i]. The Romans were deterred, by more powerful and affecting motives, from indulging in the licentious pleaſures of that feſtival; for, in the beginning of the following year, the city of Rome, and the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate, were filled with deſolation, by a dreadful inundation of the Tyber, and ſeveral terrible ſhocks of earthquakes. On the 3d of February the ſhocks were extremely violent, and continued for fifteen minutes, ſo that the greateſt number of the cardinals and courtiers run out of the palace, and abandoned his holineſs. As Clement was looked upon by the common people as a prophet, this belief was the occaſion of a general conſternation next morning, about three hours after midnight, when the city was univerſally alarmed by pretended orders from the pope, deſiring all people immediately to f quit their houſes, as there would be inſtantly a more terrible ſhock than any that had been felt. The whole inhabitants, except the ſick and diſabled, quitted their beds, and run into the ſtreets; and the alarm even reached his holineſs, who, upon being informed of the cauſe of the general terror, immediately ſent the Sbirri and guards to aſſure the people, that the pretended revelation was only diabolical invention, and to exhort them to return to their houſes. This public calamity occaſioned a general penitence for ſome time. All courts of juſtice were ſuſpended, and a jubilee was publiſhed. Clement cauſed boxes to be placed at the churches, to receive the alms which ſhould be beſtowed to ſupport thoſe families that had been ruined. He appointed officers to viſit the ſhops of engravers, ſculptors, and painters, and to ſeize all indecent pictures and ſtatues. He prohibited men from teaching the women
g to ſing, or play on muſical inſtruments, and ordered that none of thoſe women who received their dowry from hoſpitals, ſhould wear any habits of ſilk. As an encouragement to re- a build the houſes that had been deſtroyed, he declared them free from all charges and taxes for a conſiderable time; and that the prelates and other eccleſiaſtics might by their lives, ſerve as an example to others, he publiſhed ſeveral regulations relating to them, and, among other things, prohibited them from playing at cards, or any other games in the ſacred palace [k].

MEAN while Clement continued to ſollicit the catholic princes who were at war, to agree to a congreſs for negociating a peace. His ſollicitations, however, were ineffectual; for, in the month of September, the archduke Charles was proclaimed at Vienna king of Spain. The imperial miniſters at Rome, on this occaſion, were preparing to make great rejoicings in the national church of the Germans, where they propoſed to expoſe the picture of the b pope, with that of the archduke, dreſſed with the royal ornaments, after the Spaniſh faſhion. Upon complaints of the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors againſt theſe preparations, Clement held ſeveral congregations, and at length declared to the Germans, that, if they preſumed to expoſe the pictures in any church, he would lay it under a ſentence of interdiction [l]. The pope, by endeavouring to give offence to no party, diſpleaſed both; and, tho' he continued to adhere to a neutrality, he could not ſecure his dominions from ſharing in the calamities of the war; for, in the following campaign, both armies entered the territories of Ferrara, where they committed a great many diſorders. As a means of removing ſuch troubleſome gueſts, Clement thundered out an anathema againſt thoſe generals who ſhould refuſe to withdraw their troops. The French immediately obeyed, and the Ger- c mans ſoon after marched towards the Trentin [m].

The imperial and French armies, without leave, enter the pope's territories.

A. D. 1704.

THE attention of the pope in the mean time was engaged by a ſpiritual conteſt, which for ſome years had divided the Roman church. Before the death of his predeceſſor, news had arrived in Europe, that the Jeſuit miſſionaries in China, to facilitate the converſion of that people, had allowed their converts, after they had embraced Chriſtianity, to continue their idolatrous rites paid to the great philoſopher Confucius. The Jeſuits on this account were accuſed of impiety, and many books immediately appeared, ſhewing the profaneneſs of ſuch an indulgence [n]. The ſociety, however, wrote in defence of the practice of their miſ- d ſionaries, and had intereſt at Rome, during the few months of the life of Innocent XII. to elude the proſecutions of their enemies. They were likewiſe ſo ſucceſsful as to procure the friendſhip of Clement, who gave a general ſcandal by the protection which he afforded them, and delayed giving ſentence in the affair as long as poſſible. But the clamour againſt the fathers of the ſociety became ſo univerſal, that he was obliged to give a deciſion; and, having appointed a congregation to examine the affair, on the 20th of November, by a bull, he authorized their ſentence, which condemned the worſhip and ceremonies of the Chineſe converts. The pope likewiſe, to examine fully into the affair, ſent the cardinal of Tournon to China; who, not favouring the ſociety, was, by their intrigues, expoſed to a great many hardſhips in that country [o].

As the reputation of the Jeſuits had, in ſome meaſure, ſuffered by this apoſtolic deciſion againſt them, Clement embraced the firſt opportunity of ſhewing himſelf favourable to the e ſociety. About two years before, the diſpute about Janſeniſm had begun to revive in France, occaſioned by a caſe of conſcience, which had been preſented to the doctors of the Sorbonne. It was demanded of them, what ought to be thought of a perſon who did not believe the fact concerning Janſenius; namely, that the five propoſitions were contained in his writings, and was firmly perſuaded, that the church had no right to exact ſuch a belief, and who, nevertheleſs in ſuch a diſpoſition of mind, had ſigned the formulary purely and ſimply. The doctors replied, that any perſon might act ſo with a ſafe conſcience; and forty of them ſubſcribed to this deciſion. As many writings immediately appeared, cenſuring the determination of the doctors, ſome of them replied in their own defence, addreſſing the explication of their opinion to cardinal Noailles, archbiſhop of Paris, as judge ſu- f preme in his own dioceſe. The cardinal, however, the year following publiſhed an ordonnance, condemning the deciſion of the doctors, as contrary to the conſtitutions and briefs of Innocent X. Alexander VII. and Innocent XII. at the ſame time condemning the invidious and ſcandalous libels that had been publiſhed againſt the doctors, and exhorting the clergy to peace. The ſame day a ſevere edict of the king appeared againſt renewing the diſpute; while at Rome the pope, by a brief, condemned the deciſion of the caſe of conſcience, and by another brief acquainted the king of his ſentence of condemnation. Clement this year wrote a third brief, addreſſed to the cardinal Noailles, to excite him to act zealouſly againſt the determination of the doctors, the greateſt part of whom, however, ſome time before, a had, by a formal act, promiſed to conform their ſentiments and conduct to the archbiſhop's ordonnance. By the influence of the pope's nuncio, Lewis de Pica and ſome others of the chief ſubſcribers were baniſhed; which drew another brief of thanks from Rome.

MEAN while the French prelates, particularly Godet des Marets, biſhop of Chartres, who had declared againſt the deciſion of the caſe of conſcience, perſuaded Lewis XIV. to demand a bull from Rome, which ſhould declare, that it was not ſufficient to keep a reſpectful ſilence with regard to the truth of the fact, but that it was neceſſary to believe it abſolutely and in the heart. As this was the chief point of the whole diſpute, the pope purpoſely ſhunned determining it; for if, according to truth, he had declared that an implicit faith ought not to be required to facts which might be known by ſenſible evidence, the b Janſeniſts would have been victorious; and if he ſhould give a contrary deciſion, he would eſtabliſh a principle oppoſed by all divines. He therefore, the following year, publiſhed A. D. 1705. a bull, diſtinguiſhed by its three firſt words, Vineam Domini Sabaoth; by which he declared that due ſubmiſſion was not given to apoſtolic bulls by a reſpectful ſilence only; which, with regard to points of faith, was acknowleged by both parties. He gave no further deciſion of the point in diſpute; but, taking it for granted that the propoſitions were in the works of Janſenius, he launched out into invectives againſt thoſe whom he accuſed of concealing error under the veil of a reſpectful ſilence. The king, having received the bull with a brief from the nuncio, wrote to the clergy who were then aſſembled at Paris, deſiring them to deliberate immediately upon the acceptation of the bull. Accordingly the c archbiſhop of Rouen, with ſeven biſhops and ſeven abbots, were appointed as commiſſaries, who firſt eſtabliſhed three preliminary maxims; 1ſt, That biſhops have a divine right to judge of matters of doctrine; 2dly, That the pope's bulls, after they are received by the body of paſtors, have an obligation upon the whole church; 3dly, That the receiving or acceptation of the biſhops is always by way of judgment. After theſe precautions, they determined, that the bull ought to be accepted with reſpect and ſubmiſſion; and that, by circular letters, all the biſhops in the kingdom ſhould be exhorted to publiſh it in their dioceſes. It was likewiſe accepted by the Sorbonne, and by the parliament: however, the diſpute was not thereby terminated; for a new diſtinction was found out betwixt human faith and divine faith; and the general obſcurity of the bull ſerved ſtill to ſeduce the ſimple, and d to give a handle to continue the perſecution of the Janſeniſts, among whom were reckoned the members of the Port Royal, whoſe monaſtery was ſoon after deſtroyed [p].

A rupture between the pope and the emperor;

DURING this ſpiritual conteſt, the pope had a difference with the emperor, occaſioned by the oppoſition made to the Sbirri by one Cavaletti, a Roman gentleman, and his ſon, who were thereupon impriſoned. The count de Lamberg, the imperial ambaſſador at Rome, inſiſted upon the liberty of Cavaletti, who he affirmed was one of his domeſtics; but his remonſtrances not being regarded by the pope, he wrote to Vienna. Cavaletti was ſoon after ſet at liberty; but the ambaſſador, receiving orders from his court, quitted Rome and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, without taking an audience of leave of the pope, while the nuncio at Vienna was ordered to retire from the court. The emperor at the ſame time, as a ſatisfac- e tion for the inſult, demanded that Pallavicini, governor of Rome, ſhould be baniſhed; that cardinal Paluzzi, ſecretary of ſtate, ſhould be forbid the palace; that another cardinal ſhould be ſent to Vienna, to excuſe the proceeding; and that in the mean time the imperial troops ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Ferrara. The pope would not conſent to theſe conditions; but wrote to Vienna, complaining of the irregular conduct of Lamberg, and deſiring that his nuncio might be allowed to return to court; but, not obtaining this laſt requeſt, he recalled him to Rome.

THIS bad correſpondence with the imperial court continued for ſome time. The pope, A. D. 1706. mean while, finding that his exhortations to peace were not effectual, the following year publiſhed an univerſal jubilee for that purpoſe, the calamities of the war occaſioning a ge- f neral murmuring through Italy, eſpecially after the celebrated victory obtained by the imperialiſts before Turin, when, not having any longer an enemy to keep them in awe, they lived at diſcretion, and committed a great many diſorders. But what chiefly irritated the Italians was the public worſhip of the proteſtants in the imperial army, which likewiſe greatly ſcandalized the pope; who, therefore, a few months after, in conjunction with the catholic Swiſs cantons, renewed his inſtances for a general peace, but without any effect [q]. He was the more earneſt for peace, as he obſerved that the cauſe, which he was known to wiſh well to, became the inferior; for ſince the victory obtained on the 7th of September, by prince Eugene before Turin, the French had been obliged intirely to evacuate Italy, and the imperialists had taken possession of the Milanese; the investiture of which duchy, in March following, the archduke Charles received from his brother the emperor. Besides, the imperialists had seized the duchy of Mantua, and sent upwards of 8,000 men through the ecclesiastical state to Naples, which kingdom, by the intrigues of cardinal Pignatelli, the archbishop of the capital, and his brother the duke of Monteleon, had been prevailed upon to declare for the archduke Charles. The count de Thaun, who commanded the imperialists in Naples, quickly reduced the whole kingdom with little or no opposition, and took the Spanish viceroy prisoner. a

As the Austrian troops, in their passage through the ecclesiastical state, had levied contributions upon several bishops, the pope complained of the outrage to the emperor; but, receiving little satisfaction, he excommunicated those troops which had committed the disorders. Notwithstanding this censure, prince Eugene took possession of several places in the duchy of Ferrara, particularly the city of Comacchio, where his troops lived at discretion. The emperor Joseph likewise published a manifesto, declaring the censures of the pope invalid, and alleging, that, as the cities of Italy were fiefs of the empire, his army had a right to require lodging and subsistence; adding also, that he intended to maintain all the rights of the imperial crown in Italy, and to except no cities which could not prove their immunities by authentic titles. About the same time the cardinal Grimani, who, for his services to the imperial party, had been appointed viceroy of Naples, published an edict in that kingdom, suppressing the tribunal of the nunciature, and prohibiting the clergy from paying annates to the Roman chancellary. He likewise affirmed in his edict, that the king of the Two Sicilies ought not to take the investiture from the pope, because these provinces were not ecclesiastical fiefs, and that the states of Avignon and Benevento ought to be reunited to the kingdom of Naples. b c

The pope raises an army to protect his dominions.

CLEMENT, in the mean time, to secure his territories as much as possible, with the consent of the cardinals, drew 500,000 crowns from the treasure lodged in St. Angelo; ordered considerable levies of troops to be made through the whole ecclesiastical state; gave the command of his army to the count de Marsigli, who had lately been disgraced by the emperor; and reinforced the garrison of Ferrara, with 3000 men. However, he was not powerful enough to restrain the disorders committed by the imperialists, who obliged many of his subjects to lay down their arms, under pain of military execution. The emperor pretended to seize the territory of Ferrara for his ally the duke of Modena; and as the duke of Mantua and Montferrat had espoused the cause of Philip V. he put him to the ban of the empire, confiscated his estates, and, having stripped the Mantuan territory of all the artillery and military stores, which were carried to Milan, he gave the investiture of Montferrat to his ally the duke of Savoy, on condition that he should not desert the grand alliance till the conclusion of a general peace[r]. These and other violent proceedings of the emperor obliged the pope and cardinals to act with greater spirit in their own defence. The levies were accordingly continued, and several cardinals, and the greatest part of the Roman barons, voluntarily assessed themselves in considerable sums, according to their ability. The count de Marsigli marched into the territory of Ferrara, where the papal troops had ventured to act offensively against the Germans. Upon the news of these hostilities, the count de Thaun, who had returned to Lombardy, marched thither with some new regiments; and, having taken possession of several posts in the territory of Bologna, invested Ferrara, prohibiting any provisions to be carried into the city under pain of death. At the same time an imperial army advanced from Naples towards the frontiers of the ecclesiastical state, threatening an invasion, on purpose to divide the pope's forces. The emperor, however, proposed an accommodation to his holiness, and, in the mean time, ordered a cessation of all hostilities. d e

He is obliged to consent to a peace with the emperor. A. D. 1709.

As the states and princes of Italy were over-awed by the Germans, and the coasts of the ecclesiastical state were threatened by the English and Dutch fleets, while the French were in no condition to give him any assistance either by sea or land, Clement found himself obliged to submit to the terms prescribed by the emperor. Accordingly, on the 15th of January, a treaty was concluded betwixt him and Joseph, by which he agreed to disband all his troops, excepting 5000 men; to give winter-quarters to 6000, or according to some authors, to 5000 Germans; to dismiss all the French and Spaniards in his service; and to pay a contribution of 100,000 Roman crowns. Among other articles it was also agreed, that commissaries should be appointed to examine the emperor's pretensions to Comacchio, Parma, Placentia, and Modena; and a congregation of cardinals was ordered to inquire into the claim of the archduke Charles to the crown of Spain. This last article was merely a form; for, before the ratification of the treaty was delivered, Clement was obliged to acknowlege f g

CLEMENT, however, notwithſtanding this declaration, ſoon after ſent an extraordinary nuncio to Philip V. at Madrid, with the bleſſed linen for his infant ſon the prince of Aſturias [s]; and in the midſt of the diſturbances occaſioned by the war in Italy, he had been very attentive to the religious diſputes in France, having granted a bull, at the requeſt of Lewis XIV. for ſuppreſſing of the monaſtery at Port Royal, in the ſuburbs of Paris, which he ſtiled a neſt of hereſy [t]. He likewiſe publiſhed a brief, condemning the New Teſtament which had been printed a few years before by father Queſnel, with moral reflections upon each verſe. He did

b not cenſure any particular propoſition, but condemned the book in general in the moſt ſevere terms: his brief, however, was not received and publiſhed in France, the clergy then inſiſting upon the priviieges and rights of the Gallican church; and this year a refutation of the brief was publiſhed, as was ſuppoſed, by Queſnel, under the title of A Dialogue upon the Decree of Rome againſt the New Teſtament of Chalons, with moral Reflections. The pope endeavoured to intereſt the French king in the affair, by means of the Jeſuit Tellier, confeſſor to his majeſty; but, whatever inclination Lewis XIV. had to ſecond the pope's deſires, the time and circumſtances would not then allow him to declare himſelf, as he had already too many enemies to contend with, who had rejected with diſdain the propoſals made by him for peace (F). Clement likewiſe omitted nothing to draw the French biſhops to his party;

Theſe decrees condemned a treatiſe of the origin of the regalia, and a mandate of the biſhop of St. Pons; but they were not written in the uſual form. The parliament of Paris, nevertheleſs, ordered them to be ſuppreſſed, and prohibited the printing and ſelling any bulls or briefs of the court of Rome, under the penalty of 3000 livres, unleſs they were allowed to be publiſhed by the king's letters patent regiſtered in parliament [u].

As the emperor Joſeph died the year after, and his brother the archduke Charles ſucceeded him, this revolution occaſioned a great alteration in the ſyſtem of affairs, and gave hopes that a general peace would ſoon be concluded; eſpecially as the queen of England had with-

d drawn her troops from Spain, and had agreed to a congreſs at Utrecht; and the Dutch began to be apprehenſive of the great power of the new emperor, if he ſhould unite the Spaniſh dominions to the imperial dignity and the Auſtrian hereditary countries.

(F) Paſquier Queſnel was born at Paris in 1634. After finiſhing his courſe of divinity in the Sorbonne, he entered into the congregation of the oratory, and addicted himſelf wholly to eccleſiaſtical ſtudies. For the uſe of his brethren, he wrote ſome moral reflections upon the four goſpels, which were approved by the biſhop of Chalons-ſur-Marne; who, in the year 1671, recommended them to the uſe of his dioceſe. Queſnel, about ten years afterwards, having offended Harlay, archbiſhop of Paris, by his attachment to the general of his order, was commanded to leave the dioceſe of Paris. He retired to Orleans; but, being ſoon after obliged to leave France, he went to Bruſſels, where he lived nine years, and finiſhed his moral reflections upon the New Teſtament; which work was publiſhed in the year 1694. After it had gone thro' ſeveral editions, it was approved by cardinal Noailles, who being hated by the Jeſuits, they, in the year 1698, publiſhed a libel, under the title of the Problem, againſt a work of his, in which they likewiſe cenſured many propoſitions of Queſnel's book. The Problem was ordered to be burnt by the parliament of Paris, and ſeveral pieces appeared in juſtification of the moral reflections. Queſnel, being perſecuted at Bruſſels, retired in 1704 into Holland; however, after his departure from the Spaniſh territories, a ſentence was publiſhed againſt him by the archbiſhop of Mechlin, and his enemies printed ſeveral treatiſes againſt him, under the titles of Father Queſnel a heretic, Father Queſnel a mover of ſedition. The HISTORY of VENICE.

CHAP. I.

Of the Form of Government, and preſent State of the Republic of VENICE.

SECT. I.

Of the preſent State and Form of Government at VENICE, including all the different Councils and Departments of the Republic.

PREVIOUS to our hiſtory, it may not be diſagreeable to the reader, that we give a general account of the origin, ſituation, dominions, commerce, and policy of this ancient, wiſe, and once powerful republic. a Origin of Venice.

Little indeed can be affirmed, with any degree of certainty, concerning the origin of Venice, few records having eſcaped the ravages of time, and of thoſe barbarous nations who over-ran the Roman empire. Nothing but what is conjectural, perplexed, and obſcure, can be gleaned from ancient authors. They differ from each other, ſometimes from themſelves, and too often give us the ſuggeſtions of their own imagination inſtead of facts. Polybius is of opinion, that the Venetians are deſcended from the ancient Veneti, a people of Vannes in Bretagne, conquered by Julius Cæſar, and ſold for ſlaves; by which means a great number of them were ſent into Italy. But no great weight can be laid on a notion founded b upon no better authority than a certain ſimilitude of manners and dreſs between both nations; eſpecially as the whole is rendered improbable by the circumſtance of their having been enſlaved: it was not the practice of the Romans to eſtabliſh colonies of ſlaves within the bowels of Italy, and in the heart of the empire. Cornelius Nepos goes higher, deriving their origin from the Henetians, a nation bordering on Paphlagonia. In this he agrees with Livy and Cato, who ſcruple not to affirm, that the Venetians are the lineal progeny of thoſe Henetians, who, after the death of their leader Pilemon, put themſelves under the conduct of Antenor, and accompanied him into Italy. It is thought [a], that diſpoſſeſſing the Euganeans, the former inhabitants of the Adriatic coaſt, they ſettled about Padua and Aquileia, extending themſelves over Breſcia, Friuli, and all that tract of land bounded by the Po and Adda, c the lake la Garda, anciently Benac, the Alps, and the Adriatic: Pliny comprehends under the province of Venetia the Eaſt ſide of Aquileia.

Building of the city.

HISTORIANS are no leſs divided concerning the time and manner of building the city of Venice. What the earlieſt Italian writers relate has much the appearance of panegyric and hiſtorical flattery. Jorandes affirms, that Attila advancing to Aquileia, the capital of the province of Venetia, inveſted it, and after a ſiege of three months, during which the garriſon performed prodigies of valour, took it by aſſault, pillaged and laid the city in aſhes, putting all thoſe to the ſword who fell into his hands; intending, by this barbarous uſage, and ſavage ferocity, to ſtrike terror into the other cities, and frighten them into ſubmiſſion. Some later writers [b] are of opinion, that on this occaſion the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, d and the miſerable remains of Aquileia, Verona, Mantua, Trevigio, and other cities deſtroyed by this barbarian, retired to the iſlands on their coaſt, and there laid the firſt foundation of the city of Venice, calling it after the name of the province. Idatius and Jorandes fix this memorable event about the end of the year 451, or the beginning of 452 of the Chriſtian æra.

Various opinions concerning it.

MOST writers date the foundation of the city thirty-one years earlier [c]. They ſay, that after the removal of the ſeat of empire by Conſtantine into the Eaſt, Italy was afflicted with a ſeries of calamities, and perpetually harraſſed with the incurſions of barbarous nations:

a that the Huns, led on by Attila, that ſcourge of humanity, after having defeated Macrinus, governor of Pannonia and Macedonia, was advancing towards Italy, deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword, leaving every where the veſtiges of a diſpoſition truly barbarous and brutal: that upon the news of his approach, the richeſt and moſt powerful families on the coaſt of the Adriatic Sea, ſtruck with the terror of his arms, retired with their moſt valuable effects into the little iſlands of the Rialto, as into a place of ſecurity: there they laid the foundations of a city which ſhould protect them againſt thoſe barbarians, and ſecure their religion, their liberty, their families, and wealth. Thus they ſuppoſe, that Attila penetrated twice into Italy; a fact that is diſputed by other writers.

b variety of ſmall iſlands on the Rialto, in the Adriatic Sea, or gulph of Venice, ſtanding in forty-five degrees, forty minutes North latitude. It is ſurrounded by lagunes or lakes communicating by ſix different paſſages with the ocean. Nor is the city more acceſſible on the ſide of the continent; ſince from all that tract of land bordering on the lagunes, only two paſſes can be entered even by ſmall boats. The waters are never frozen hard enough to ſupport the weight of cannon, carriages, and the other neceſſary appendages of an army.

THE natural advantages which Venice has in point of ſecurity, are however counterbalanced by ſome not inconſiderable inconveniences attending her ſituation. They reckon among theſe, the danger that in proceſs of time the lagunes will be filled up by the quantities of ſand carried down by the rivers, and of mud and ſlime thrown in by the tides; in c which caſe the city would become defenceleſs, if not inſupportable, on account of noxious exhalations. To this may be added the incredible charge of building and repairing houſes, the very foundations of which are laid at a greater expence than in other countries whole edifices are reared. Upon the whole, nothing can be more noble and beautiful than to ſee one of the fineſt cities in the world riſing out of the waters, and appearing to float on the ocean, which contributes equally to its ornament, conveniency, and ſecurity. Its magnificent palaces, lofty towers, and houſes waſhed by the flood, form a moſt delightful and ſtriking ſpectacle: in a word, which ever way we approach this noble city, it ſhews itſelf equally peculiar and majeſtic. Travellers differ in their eſtimate of the number of the inhabitants. Inhabitants.
Some exaggerate them to 300,000; and others, with as little reaſon, diminiſh their num-
d bers to one third of that ſum: perhaps we ſhall be nearer the truth if we calculate at a medium.

As to the territories of the republic, they are ſtill conſiderable and extenſive, notwith- Territories.
ſtanding the loſs of the Morea, Morlachia, and the chief iſlands of the Archipelago. The Venetian dominions in Italy conſiſt of the Dogado, or Venice proper, the Poleſino de Rovigo, the Pandoniano, the Veroneſe, the Cremaſco, the Bergomaſco, the Breſcian, the Treviſiana, the Belluneſe, the Vicentia, the Feltrino, part of Friuli, and the Cadorino, a large and fruitful tract of country. The dutchy of Venice and province of Padua, in particular, are rich and populous: the latter, on account of its fertility, has been called the terreſtrial paradiſe. Beſides theſe thirteen Italian provinces, they likewiſe poſſeſs Iſtria, a peninſula bounded by Carniola
e on the Weſt, and ſurrounded by the Adriatic Sea on the South, North, and Eaſt. In Morlachia they hold the dominion of a few towns; and the whole ſea-coaſt of Dalmatia, except the territories of Raguſa; to which we may add ſome valuable iſlands on the coaſts of Epirus and Dalmatia [d].

THE trade of the republic has been much reduced for near two centuries, the greater part Commerce.
of it having fallen into the hands of the Engliſh, French, and Dutch. Formerly the Venetians engroſſed the whole commerce of Aſia, Turkey in Europe, and the iſlands of the Archipelago: but the diſcovery of America, and the commerce carried on in the Eaſt Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, has done them irreparable damage, and been more prejudicial to their ſtate, than all the expenſive and bloody wars carried on againſt the infidels.

politicians. It has been affirmed by Thuanus and others [e], that, contrary to the nature of all other political and natural bodies, this republic will ever be exempted from decay and corruption, as long as ſhe adheres to her firſt and fundamental principles. The following reaſons have been aſſigned for the ſtability of the Venetian government, and the duration of liberty amidſt the many attempts of her potent neighbours and ambitious ſubjects.

HER firm attachment to her general principles; it being a maxim of the Venetian government, that innovation and change produce greater abuſes than thoſe inconveniencies they were intended to remedy. Hence her decrees are irrevocable.

THE prudent and wiſe manner in which ſhe has ballanced between the contending powers of Europe, throwing herſelf always into the lighter ſcale, in order to preſerve a juſt political ballance. a

THE knowledge, judgment, and experience of her ſenators, who are obliged to perform a kind of probation in the ſeveral inferior employments of the ſtate, before they are admitted to the higheſt council of the republic.

THE judicious and equitable diſtribution of rewards and puniſhments, as they are appointed by the laws. Here alone it is, that the ſmalleſt offence againſt the ſtate, or ſuſpicion of an attack upon the liberty of the people, is puniſhed with immediate death; while the induſtrious, uſeful, and ingenious citizen and mechanic, is ſure of being rewarded [f]. Here alone it is, that corruption and venality are crimes of as heinous a nature as treaſon; that even an attempt to purchaſe a place under the government, or a voice in the ſenate, is made capital; that the nobility, officers, and gentlemen are forbid, under the ſevereſt penalties, to accept of preſents from foreign ſtates; and even the ambaſſadors obliged to account, to the full value for any gifts and favours conferred upon them by the courts where they reſide. b

WE may add, the extraordinary ſecrecy enjoined in all ſtate affairs [g]; and the ſevere and rigid laws againſt the betrayers of public truſt, and revealers of the myſteries of the cabinet.

THE reſtraints with which the laws have clogged the prerogatives of the ſovereign, who is in fact little more than preſident of the ſupreme council of the nation, with the badges rather of rank than of power; and the bounds preſcribed to the wealth and ambition of the ſubject [h]. c

THE excluſion from all places of profit or civil power [i] of the clergy and every member of the church, and confining their authority wholly to eccleſiaſtical affairs. Among the cauſes of ſtability of this republic, we may likewiſe reckon the patriotic diſpoſition and ſincere love of their country and conſtitution, obſervable even in the Venetians of meaner rank; the addreſs and policy of her ambaſſadors; the great riches of her bank; and, in ſhort, the very model and form of the conſtitution and government; of which it may be neceſſary to give a deſcription, as far as we are aſſiſted by the imperfect accounts of writers.

THE Venetian republic is a mixed government, compounded of monarchy, ariſtocracy, and a kind of democracy. The Venetians boaſt that their conſtitution has continued above 1300 years; though from their hiſtory it appears to have undergone various changes and revolutions. Moſt hiſtorians are of opinion, that the city was originally under the government of the conſuls and magiſtrates of Padua; but as they increaſed in wealth and numbers, that a deputy from each diſtrict or iſland, in whom was lodged the legiſlative power, was elected. It does not appear at this diſtance of time, whether this change was effected by force, or by the conſent of the Paduans; all we know is, that it happened about the thirty-third year of the city. It might probably be effected when Attila entered Italy, and deſtroyed Aquileia, Verona, Mantua, and other cities, by which means Venice received a great increaſe of inhabitants. Thus the conſular power was aboliſhed, and the tribunitian eſtabliſhed; a form that remained for near three hundred years, until the city fell under deſpotic ſway [k], and the power of a ſovereign, who for many years ruled with almoſt unlimited authority. We ſhall have occaſion to remark, in the courſe of our hiſtory, the means uſed to retrench his power, to limit the prerogative of the doge, and reduce the government to that mixed nature of which it now conſiſts. At preſent we ſhall content ourſelves with deſcribing the particular members which conſtitute the republic, and regulate the ſtate. d e

Doges.

IT is obſervable, that from the time the republic was firſt governed by a ſovereign, every alteration and change of the conſtitution ſerved to limit and retrench his authority [l]. The Venetians are perfectly ſatisfied, that the liberty of the people is incompatible with the intereſts of the prince, who aſſumes a power ſuperior to the laws; he is therefore not only ſubjected without reſerve, but clogged by particular reſtrictions, which would ſeem to render his condition inferior to that of a private ſenator. Diſpatches are made in his name, and the letters of foreign courts addreſſed to him; but he delivers them unopened to the ſenate, and reports their anſwer to the ambaſſadors. To keep him in continual remembrance that his power is ſubordinate to the ſenate and council, they forbear the examination of all propoſitions made by the miniſters of other ſtates, until the doge and his counſellors have withdrawn. His anſwers to foreign miniſters muſt be general; if they ſhould prove diſpleaſing to the ſenate, he is ſure to meet with rough checks and ſenſible mortifications [m]. Nor is it in theſe audiences only the doge muſt ſquare his conduct to the narrow bounds of his authority; it is likewiſe in particulars where his paſſions, his humanity, and happineſs are concerned. He can neither marry, viſit, or ſtir out of the city without leave. f g a If he ſets foot on the continent, his authority ceaſes: and indeed, ſolitude and dependance would appear to be the diſtinguiſhing and eſſential qualities of his function. It is true, the doge is addreſſed with the reſpect paid to a ſovereign prince; he is attended with the enſigns and badges of royalty; and in ſhort, enjoys the whole pomp, pageantry, and, circumſtance of power, without the authority.

THE great council is compoſed of all the Venetian nobility, who have attained the age of twenty-five years. It frames laws, chooſes ſenators, confirms the elections of the ſenate, nominates to all public employments, the podeſtates, procurators, governors, &c. It reforms all public abuſes and errors, holds the ſupreme legiſlative power, and is the firſt tribunal, the baſis and ſupport of the government. The doge is preſident of this council; The great council.

b but its decrees and reſolves are valid without his preſence; his name, however, is uſed out of form and compliment. Upon the whole, the great council would ſeem to be a kind of mixture of the peers and commons of Great Britain. The individuals enjoy the rights and privileges of the former, while the power of the latter is lodged in the body collective [n].

THE ſenate, or pregadi, is that part of the conſtitution where the executive power reſides. All reſolutions upon peace and war, treaties and alliances, are taken here. All laws made in the great council receive the ſanction of the ſenate before they paſs into act; and it has the power of ſending ambaſſadors, and the diſpoſal of many inferior offices, civil and military. Originally it conſiſted of ſixty ſenators, called ordinary; ſince an addition of ſixty more has been made [o], theſe laſt are called extraordinary, and compoſe a junto, The ſenate.

c la guinta. The opinions are taken by ballot; and to prevent confuſion, only the members who immediately compoſe it, are ſuffered to vote, although the great council, the ſeignory, the forty judges of criminal courts, have admittance, and the liberty of ſpeaking for or againſt the opinions propoſed. As the ſixty extraordinary ſenators are annually choſen in the great council, and are either changed or continued as their conduct deſerves, it attaches them inviolably to their duty, and prevents their abuſing the authority lodged in their hands. The profound ſecrecy of an aſſembly, compoſed of ſo great a multitude, is very extraordinary: this the republic has brought about, by the inquiſition of ſtate, the excluſion of all ſtrangers, eccleſiaſtics, and even of their own relations, and neareſt connexions [p].

d THE ſeignory, or council of ten, conſiſts of the doge, ſix members of the great council, and the three chief judges of the higheſt court of judicature. Next to the inquiſition of ſtate, this is the moſt formidable tribunal of the republic [q]. The council of ten receives all accuſations and informations againſt perſons ſuſpected of deſigns againſt the government. Three of their number compoſe the inquiſition of ſtate. They impriſon, condemn, and execute arbitrarily, without hearing the priſoner's defence, either in perſon or by his advocates. They are the guardians of the public tranquility; watch over the welfare of the city; compoſe quarrels, and ſuppreſs tumults; keep a ſtrict eye over factious, turbulent, and ambitious ſpirits; regulate the coin, weights, meaſures, and markets; and are equally the terror of the nobility and commons, the prince and the ſubject, and as odious as they are formidable. The ſeignory. State inquiſition.

e The executions and judgments of the tribunal of three, or ſtate inquiſition, are equally expeditious and ſecret. To avoid public clamours againſt their ſeverity, the offender is in the night thrown into the ſea, upon the bare evidence of their ſpies, or any two witneſſes ſuborned for the purpoſe. But this injuſtice and cruelty has been ſomewhat remedied within this laſt century. An unguarded word, the moſt trifling inſinuation, or indirect reflection upon the government; the being ſeen with fire-arms, and other frivolous indiſcretions, were formerly deemed crimes againſt the ſtate, and of ſo heinous a nature as to merit immediate death or baniſhment. Yet has this formidable tribunal been one cauſe of the long duration of Venetian liberty, if a people groaning under the tyranny of ſo mercileſs and arbitrary a triumvirate, can be ſaid to enjoy liberty.

f THE council called the ſavi, or ſages, conſiſt of ſixteen perſons; ſix called the ſavi grande, take cognizance of all the affairs relative to the fleets and armies of the republic; five others confine themſelves more particularly to land affairs; and the remaining five are employed in the care of the marine, trade, and commerce. The former of theſe are called ſavi de terra firma, and the latter ſavi de gli ordini, choſen out of the moſt experienced perſons of the city [r]. Savi.

FROM theſe ariſes another order or board, conſiſting of the doge, the ſeignory, and the ſavi, in conjunction; and this college is reputed the moſt uſeful council of the ſtate. They hear all letters ſent to or received by the ſenate, read by the ſecretary [s]; they give audience to foreign miniſters and agents, and take cognizance of all foreign and domeſtic complaints. College of the ſeignory and ſavi.

g Thus all matters of ſtate, unleſs they require extraordinary ſecrecy and diſpatch, are deliberated by the savi and seignory in their several departments; by the college composed of the union of both; by the senate; and lastly, by the great council. Hence it is that the resolves of the republic are deliberate, prudent, and perpetual; and that her caution and wisdom have been the admiration of ages. It must, however, be acknowleged, that what they stile the basis of government, and prop of the constitution, the state inquisition, and its horrid train of spies, emissaries, and informers, wears an ugly aspect, and contradicts the practice of the most civilized nations, and best regulated states. It may have discovered attempts, and frustrated conspiracies against the government; but surely nothing can reconcile a man, born under the influence of liberty, and nursed in the lap of freedom, to so horrid, cruel, and arbitrary a jurisdiction. Informers have ever been esteemed the pests of society, and instruments of tyranny; and they were the detestation of Greece and Rome, as long as liberty remained. But Venice gives them the protection of her laws, and pensions from the government, upon the most infamous and pernicious footing; their informations are received in a secret manner, thrown into a stone appropriated for that purpose, and anonymous. Thus the excellencies of the Venetian constitution are weighed down by faults of so gross and enormous a nature, as one would think less tolerable than the most despotic and absolute monarchy. a b

Church. Of all the ecclesiastics in Europe, those of Venice alone are excluded the councils and public employments of the state. The republic has laid it down as a principle, that she should have an absolute sway over her subjects of every condition and degree. The interdiction of Paul V. is a noble instance of her adherence to this maxim. The pope is deemed a mere temporal prince, and the patriarch a cypher at Venice. The republic is supreme in all causes, and over all persons, ecclesiastical and civil, within her dominions. The government of the church is divided between the patriarchs of Venice and Aquileia: the province of the former is confined to the city; of the latter to the continent, who is more independent and better supported by the spiritual authority of the pope, than his brother prelate. He is appointed by the senate, who oblige him to chuse a noble Venetian for his coadjutor. As the patriarchs are not permitted to nominate to the cures or benefices of the city, or duchy of Venice, so their credit is no greater than their authority; the priests and religious decline their jurisdiction even in ecclesiastical affairs, in favour of other tribunals under the influence of the senate. In short, the severity of the republic not two centuries ago to the Jesuits, has ever since humbled the ambition of the clergy, and kept them in a servile awe and slavish dependance on the civil power. c d

SECT. II.

Of the first Establishment of Government at Venice; the abolition of the Consular, and first Institution of the Tribunitian Power; the first Wars carried on by the City; its Progress to Consequence and Grandeur; and the Alteration made in the Constitution by electing a Doge in the Room of the Tribunes.

A. D. 421. THE historians of the earlier periods of the republic seem to have supplied by fiction what was wanting upon authority; and to have filled up the chasm in annals and records from the fertility of their own invention. They are profuse of their encomiums upon the regularity, order, strict piety, and morals of this infant city, but extremely sparing of facts. If we credit them [a], the great delicacy and scrupulous exactness in the choice of members composing this little community, is beyond example: the purest religion, the most unblemished morals, rigid virtue and integrity, together with a certain degree of wealth and quality, were the indisputable qualifications of those admitted to the privileges of the city. e

CASSIODORUS [b] relates, that one would have taken this multitude of people rather for a numerous seminary of philosophers living at their ease, cultivating the duties of religion and virtue, and enjoying a perfect tranquility, than for the concourse of a distressed, clamorous, and disorderly rabble. They contended not in luxury, ostentation, and expence; but in moderation, chastity, and virtue. Riches, honours, ambition, and the train of evils which constitute the great concern of the rest of mankind, had no charms for the Venetians: rich and poor lived upon a familiar equality. Property was common to all, and entirely devoted to the occasions of the public. Merit was the only distinction; that alone was esteemed true nobility which was acquired by virtue. Industry and frugality were commended, as they were useful to the community; virtue and piety, as they ennobled the man by the practice of what became a rational creature. Upon these their conferences turned, and upon these alone their quarrels, if any, arose. Power and authority were conferred on modest merit; the voluptuous, the presuming, and worldly-minded, were excluded from f g a public truſt and credit. Such is the picture drawn by the earlieſt writers of this happy ſtate, to which perhaps we may venture to accede, under certain reſtrictions.

UNDER ſuch happy auſpices did this republic receive her firſt laws, ordinances, and regulations; in ſuch practices and ſtudies did ſhe paſs her amiable infancy. A total chaſm appears in hiſtory from the ſixth year of the city until the abolition of the conſular, and eſtabliſhment of the tribunitian power, twenty-five years after. Aquileia, Verona, and many of the cities and provinces upon or near the ſea-coaſt, having been deſtroyed about this time, Venice received a great increaſe of inhabitants. The miſerable remains who had eſcaped the rage of the conquerors, fled to it in crowds, and ſo augmented the number of citizens, that Venice was conſiderably enlarged, a great number of iſlands taken into its b compaſs, and the diſtricts and ſeveral wards multiplied [c]. Upon this a new diviſion of the city was made, each ward enjoying its own peculiar rights and immunities, at the ſame time that it compoſed one whole. Hence the conſular government was thought inconvenient. Either ſome wards muſt enjoy privileges ſuperior to the reſt, by the conſuls choſen out of them, or a conſul muſt be elected from each; which, on account of their number, as well as the dignity annexed to the function, would create an expence to the public altogether inſupportable. To obviate every difficulty, a ſcheme was propoſed for new-modelling the government. A general aſſembly of the nation was convened; and, after ſome warm debates, and keen altercations, the following propoſals were at length aſſented to, and ratified by a majority, viz. That [d] a tribune ſhould be yearly appointed by c each diſtrict or iſland compoſing the ſtate: that they ſhould have power to take cognizance in all cauſes, over all perſons, and to decide all controverſies ariſing within their ſeveral juriſdictions: that they ſhould impriſon, condemn, and acquit within the limits of their ward; but that an appeal, in dubious caſes, or where the parties complained of injuſtice, might be made to the ſuperior aſſemby of the nation: that this great aſſembly or council ſhould conſiſt of all the perſons poſſeſſing a certain property, and of a certain degree of quality within the city: that it ſhould be ſupreme in all judicial caſes: that it ſhould poſſeſs the legiſlative and executive authority, with a power of entruſting what part of the latter it thought fit, to the tribunes, or other magiſtrates by them appointed: and that it ſhould have the power of nominating to all places, offices, and public truſts, that of chuſing the tribunes alone ex-d cepted. Such was the plan of government which ſucceeded the conſular, and continued, with little variation, the ſpace of near three hundred years, until the power of the tribunes was ſunk in the authority of a duke or doge.

Change of government.

Tribunes elected.

AFTER the deſtruction of Padua by the Lombards, the Venetians were not only become a free and commercial people, but a ſtate of conſiderable importance on the continent; the maſters of a fleet, and body of land-forces. Their firſt diſputes were with the Lombards, who having ſeized upon Friuli, the province of Venetia, and almoſt all the territories of the infant republic, confined the dominion of Venice within a ſmall compaſs. We know nothing of the iſſue of this quarrel.

The firſt wars carried on by Venice.

HISTORIANS make the firſt mention of the Venetian fleet about this period [e]. The *Iſ-*e trians and Dalmatians had made ſome deſcents upon the ſkirts of the city of Venice, plundering ſeveral houſes, and uſing violence on the inhabitants. They had likewiſe diſturbed their commerce, and committed depredations upon the merchants trading to the iſlands of the Archipelago, and maritime cities of Italy. The Venetians [f] fitted out a ſmall ſquadron, and immediately ſailed in purſuit of the enemy, without any formal declaration of war. Having come up with the pirates, they attacked and defeated them, deſtroying a great number of their ſhips, obliging them to ſue for peace, to give hoſtages for their conduct, and make reparation for the damages the republic had ſuffered.

NOT long after, an inſult was offered to the republic by the Tergeſtines, the inhabitants of Trieſte, who landing ſuddenly, carried off a number of the citizens. [g] Pietro Candiano, a f leading man at that time, was appointed to revenge this unprovoked affront. His diligence was ſo great, that the ſame day two ſhips of war were equipped, and under ſail to ſeek the enemy, with whom he came up in the evening. He gave immediate orders for the attack, defeated the enemy, retook his countrymen, and carried the Tergeſtines priſoners into Venice. ——Theſe are the firſt inſtances we have of the proweſs, ſpirit, and reſolution of this republic.

A DEGREE of conſideration and eſteem among the neighbouring powers was acquired by theſe firſt exploits. Their reputation preſerved the Venetians for ſome time unmoleſted, and ſuffered them to purſue the arts of peace, to beautify their city, frame laws, eſtabliſh good order and diſcipline among the ſeveral degrees of inhabitants; to proſecute their trade, commerce,

Venice acquires eſteem and conſequence.

commerce, manufactures, and every ſpecies of induſtry; by means of which they, in a ſhort a time, attained to a high pitch of affluence and power.

About this time the republic entered into treaty with the brave Narſes, lieutenant of Juſtinian, who had been ſent to reſcue Italy from the uſurpation of the Goths. The Venetians made no ſecret of this alliance: they publicly aſſiſted him with arms, money, and ſhipping, and every thing elſe ſtipulated or required. Totila, who commanded the Goths, was encamped upon the banks of the river Adice [h]. In order to come up with him, without fatiguing his troops by a laborious, long, and difficult march, Narſes reſolved to tranſport his army by ſea to Ravenna; this the Venetian fleet executed, coaſting along the Italian ſide of the gulph, and landing the troops ſafe without the loſs of a ſingle ſhip. The ſoundings were perfectly known to them, having by this time acquired a conſiderable ſkill and b experience in maritime affairs. We are not informed what ſhare they bore in the action, or whether any of their forces were preſent; all we know is, that Narſes having gained a complete victory, expreſſed his ſenſe of the obligations he lay under to the Venetians, by ſeveral rich preſents, high marks of diſtinction, and particularly by building two fine churches, dedicated to the ſaints Theodore and Germinian; the oldeſt public buildings, beſides St. Mark's and St. Peter's, in Venice. Theſe are all the particulars with which hiſtorians have favoured us, of the public tranſactions of the Venetians for the ſpace of two hundred and ſeventy-two years. Nor have they been more particular concerning her domeſtic conduct. It is true, indeed, that a new-founded ſtate, ſtudious of raiſing herſelf by her induſtry, commerce, frugality, and prudence, little connected with other nations, ſolitary by ſituation as c
well as from inclination, and chiefly bent upon cultivating peace, and reaping the fruits of tranquility, is capable of furniſhing but few of thoſe events which are thought worthy of being tranſmitted to poſterity. They now indeed begin to be more minute; and exhibit a particular detail of that great revolution which brought the republic into the hands of one man, after having aboliſhed the power of the tribunes. We are told, that the magiſtrates uſing their power wantonly, aſſuming an authority ſuperior to the laws, puniſhing offences committed rather againſt their own perſons, than againſt the ſtate, had become odious to the people; that their private diſſentions had ſpread the ſeeds of diſcord, and excited a ferment over the whole city, ſo as wholly to alienate the minds of the public from the eſtabliſhed government; that the attempts of the Forlians, a little ſtate in the neighbourhood upon the d continent, who had endeavoured to draw ſome advantage from the civil broils of Venice, encreaſed the general diſlike to the power of the tribunes. To theſe cauſes may be added, the depredations committed by the Lombards, with many other grievances, which, on account of their domeſtic quarrels, they were unable to repel. In this ſituation a general council was demanded by the unanimons voice of the public, that the ſtate of affairs might be canvaſſed and the conſtitution new modelled.

Change of government. The aſſembly of the nation having met, the biſhop of Grada was choſen to preſide, attended by a numerous body of the ſuperior clergy; from which we may obſerve, that eccleſiaſtics had not as yet been excluded from the government. Nothing but complaints, murmurs, and revilings againſt the tribunes could be heard. They were accuſed of extor- e tion, cruelty, murder, and tyranny. It was aſſerted, that the republic muſt fall; their liberties be annihilated; their wives and children expoſed to the unbridled luſt, and their property to the rapacious avarice of thoſe mercileſs tyrants, unleſs an end was put to their authority, by introducing another form of government. After various ſpeeches, debates, and propoſals, A. D. 697. the aſſembly proceeded to buſineſs. Numberleſs defects in their preſent conſtitution were remarked. They obſerved, that a power of convoking the great council was lodged in no part of the ſtate; that the various opinions and claſhing intereſts of ſo numerous an aſſembly, without a head, was attended with diſcord and animoſity; that having no one to direct their proceedings, they were ſlow, irreſolute, and without vigour in their meaſures; that the public affairs were conducted rather according to the paſſions and intereſt of factions, f than the occaſions of the ſtate; and that the executive power was neceſſarily transfered to the tribunes, who were often ignorant, of mean extraction, and low fortune [i]. Hence aroſe the abuſe of their authority; ignorance is ever the foundation of conceit; meanneſs of inſolence; and poverty begets oppreſſion and avarice. They likewiſe remarked, that unanimity and concord could never exiſt in a ſtate, where the chief members were unconnected; that the tribunes, being excluded from a ſeat in the aſſembly, muſt of courſe be ignorant of the ſenſe and ſpirit of many of the laws committed to their care; that as they formed no regular council among themſelves, the diſtribution of juſtice muſt vary in the ſeveral diſtricts of the city; the laws be local; one part of the nation groaning under bondage, while a the other enjoyed the ſweets of liberty; and the happineſs of the people depending upon the humour, diſpoſition, or caprice of a few petty magiſtaates [l]. The reſult was, to aboliſh the tribunitian power, and in its ſtead to elect a duke or doge, in whom ſhould be veſted the ſupreme authority. He was to repreſent the honour and majeſty of the ſtate; to have reſpect and diſtinction paid him ſuperior to what the tribunes, or even the conſuls enjoyed; he was to aſſemble and preſide at the great council; to have a caſting vote in all diſputed points; to nominate to all offices, places, and preferments; and laſtly, to enjoy the ſame ſupremacy in the church as in the ſtate [m].

PAULATIO, of Heraclea, is ſuppoſed to have procured the election to fall upon himſelf, by his dexterity, addreſs, and intrigues. He was a man of fine talents, ſpecious eloquence, Paulatio, the firſt doge.
b handſome and intrepid. His generoſity had made him popular, and his experience in public buſineſs neceſſary in the aſſembly. He never countenanced thoſe factions which diſturbed the tranquility of the republic, though it is imagined that when diſcord ran high, he applied to his own purpoſes the diviſions which he could not heal. In ſhort, his cool prudence, his inſinuating manner, and artful conduct, had ſo greatly influenced the aſſembly, that he was elected ſovereign by the unanimous concurrence of the council, to the great joy of the people, who were extravagant in the demonſtrations of their ſatisfaction.

PAULATIO, Doge I.

THE new doge began his adminiſtration with reforming abuſes, inſpecting the conduct A. D. 697.
c of the late magiſtrates, framing laws with the ſanction of the general council, putting the fleets into a reſpectable condition, adorning the city, and extending commerce, encouraging induſtry, and rewarding merit; in ſhort, by every action which could render his perſon beloved, or his people happy. He formed an alliance with Luitprand duke of Forli: ſome ſay he conquered him. He extended the limits of his native city Heraclea, now under the dominion of the Venetian republic, from the river Pavia to the rivulet called Pavicola. By his mere authority and intereſt he induced the Equilines (ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Jeſulans) to acknowlege the ſovereignty of the republic [n]. To ſum up all, he made the nation happy, powerful, and wealthy. After a reign of twenty years and ſix months he died univerſally regretted and beloved. He was the firſt, and was one of the beſt princes Ve- d nice ever ſaw. His ambition terminated in the good of the public, inſomuch that he neglected the intereſts of his own family, to give his whole attention to the aggrandizement of the country over which he was ſovereign.

the dogeſhip. All that hiſtory relates of him is, that he was wiſe, prudent, and warlike. Writers have not informed us of his exploits, nor of the tranſactions of the republic during his adminiſtration. Some indeed affirm, that no ſuch perſon ever exiſted, or at leaſt acted in quality of doge; but Sanſovino [o] and Sabellicus [p] relate, that he reigned nine years, and died e with the reputation of an able politician and brave ſoldier. Indeed the writers of the firſt 400 years of the republic, are rather biographers than hiſtorians; they entirely ſlip over the affairs of the public, excepting where the doges are immediately concerned. This it is that renders every account we have hitherto ſeen of this early period lame, barren, and defective.

HYPATO, Doge III.

AT the death of Marcello, the great council met for the election of a new doge, when Hypato, doge III.
Horleo Hypato, commonly ſtiled Orſo, was preferred to the other candidates. As he was a great warrior and politician, the council looked upon him as the perſon beſt qualified to

All things being in readineſs, he landed his army, and laid ſiege to Ravenna; took and reſtored it to the former inhabitants, who immediately replaced their baniſhed exarch. What the Venetians had hitherto done was by way of retaliation, or in a ſelf-defence: with Narſes they acted as auxiliaries; but now extending their politics, they became principals, and conducted a war with which they had nothing to do, without any other aſſiſtance than the ſpiritual endeavours of the pope; which would have afforded but a ſlight protection to the exarch againſt the power of the Lombards [p].

Civil diviſions.

ABOUT this time the affairs of the republic were diſturbed by ſome diviſions in the church. Calixtus biſhop of Aquileia, diſdaining to acknowlege the ſuperiority and juriſdiction of the new ſee of Grada, raiſed a little army, and over-running the whole territory of Grada and the adjacent provinces, he every where committed devaſtations, which in a Goth, Hun, or Lombard, would have been termed ſavage; but in a catholic prieſt were thought pious, and deſerving canonization, notwithſtanding the whole diſpute turned upon a ridiculous point of precedency: however, by means of the pope's mediation, the affair was at length terminated to the ſatisfaction of all parties [q]. b

NOTWITHSTANDING the other valuable qualities of the doge, he had a fierceneſs and haughty inſolence, which not only rendered him diſagreeable, but frequently intolerable. The Heracleans having by ſome trivial fault incurred his diſpleaſure, he entered their country in a hoſtile manner, laying every place waſte in his progreſs. At length, meeting with a body of their troops, a battle was fought, in which both parties behaved with incredible valour: the field was long diſputed, and victory hovered in ſuſpence, when a random blow put an end to the doge's life, and ſecured their liberty to the Heracleans.

Inter-regnum. A. D. 737.

AFTER the death of Hypato, a kind of inter-regnum for the ſpace of a year enſued. Sabellicus relates, that warm debates, and violent heats reigned in the aſſembly; that the people were divided about a ſucceſſor; and that a majority appeared for a change of government; which was effected, contrary to the inclinations of the moſt conſiderable families. c

A new form of government.

The plan propoſed and carried into execution was, that a maſter of the horſe ſhould be choſen every year, into whoſe hands was transferred the authority of the doge: the ſhort duration of his power, would, it was thought, be a ſufficient check againſt the abuſe of it; eſpecially as his conduct underwent a ſevere ſcrutiny at the expiration of his office [r]. The firſt perſon appointed to this authority was Dominico Leo, a man of ſome ſway and intereſt in the city: he was ſucceeded by Felix Cornicula for the next year; who quitting the reins at the time appointed by law, had Deodato, ſon to Hypato, elected in his room [s]. He was d recalled from baniſhment three years after his father's death, and paſſed through nine months of his office, at which period he died, univerſally eſteemed. Juliano Cepari was next choſen, of whom we know nothing more than his having ruled for a year. Then was elected Fabritio Ciani, or, according to others, Giovanni Fabritio, the fourth and laſt maſter of the horſe, or general of the forces [t]: he was depoſed before the year expired, had his eyes put out, and was confined for life, though for what fault we are not informed.

THUS ended the authority of the new governors: an authority laid aſide with as little reaſon as it had been aſſumed, and equally ſhort in its duration, as ſudden in its eſtabliſhment.

SECT. III.

The Form of Government again changed, and the Doges reſtored; Venice engaged in divers foreign Wars, and particularly with Pepin King of France, who laid ſiege to the City, and was forced by the Bravery of the Venetians to relinquiſh the Enterprize.

THEODATO, Doge IV.

A. D. 742.

THE minds of the people were eagerly bent upon the reſtitution of the ducal government. Whether this proceeded from the natural inconſtancy peculiar to ſtates ſurrounded by the ſea, and divided by this ſtrong barrier from the reſt of the world, or whether f the inclinations of mankind diſpoſe them to obey regal authority with a chearfulneſs in proportion to the diſtance it is exalted above them, we will not determine: certain we are, that confuſion and anarchy muſt have enſued, had not the people been gratified with reſtoring that very authority they reviled as tyrannical and oppreſſive but a few years before. In ſhort,

a doge was elected, the choice falling upon Theodato, the ſecond ſon of doge Hypato, and the brother of Guiliano Hypato, maſter of the horſe [u]. Theodato was recalled from baniſhment, in which he had lived ever ſince the death of his father, to take upon him the ſupreme go-his influence and authority. Theodato next repaired the caſtle of Brundulla, ſtanding at the mouth of the bay leading to Chioggia. This fort is exceeding ſtrong, both by nature and art: what were Theodato's motives to add to the fortifications we know not; this is certain, that Galla made uſe of it as a pretext to cover his own villainous intentions. He omitted no opportunity of inſinuating the ſuſpicious, dangerous, and dark deſigns of the doge; that he intended no leſs than to render himſelf independent and abſolute; that beſides his haughty carriage to the nobility, and fawning obſequiouſneſs to the common people, beſides the ſtrong body-guard he always maintained, and the ſtate he aſſumed, this laſt action, his fortifying with all poſſible art, and keeping a ſtrong garriſon in a caſtle of no uſe to the republic, was an undeniable proof of his ambitious views. Having thus wrought upon the paſſions of the leading men, he obtained a body of troops, with which marching ſecretly to Brundulla, while the doge was there, he unexpectedly entered the caſtle, ſeized, blinded, and depoſed Theodato: then returning to Venice, he had the addreſs to procure himſelf to be elected in his ſtead. Thus ended the power of the unhappy Theodato, after he had governed the republic for thirteen years [b]. He was a man of a ſpeculative turn, much addicted to ſtudy and retirement, of few words, and a reſerved carriage: the misfortunes of the firſt part of his life had confirmed his natural propenſity to ſolitude; yet when he appeared in public, no man paid a greater attention to the magnificence, munificence, and majeſty of a prince.

GALLA, Doge V.

A. D. 755. Galla, doge V.

Some writers affirm, that Galla never was lawfully elected; but ſeizing the authority, maintained himſelf in it by his influence over the troops given him to depoſe Theodato [c]. This circumſtance is not improbable, if we conſider his character, and the ſhort duration of his power. He was maſter of deep diſſimulation, an inſinuating manner, and ſpecious appearance; he could cloak the blackeſt vices under the appearance of virtue, and maſk his ambition with the direct ſemblance of patriotiſm. But when his cunning was inſufficient to effect his purpoſes, he was equally vigorous in his public, as he had been artful in his ſecret practices, ſacrificing honour, honeſty, and reputation, to his intereſt and the love of power. After a reign of one year and two months, he was depoſed and blinded (a piece of policy the Venetians would ſeem to have borrowed from the Eaſtern nations) leaving behind him the character of a bad man, an ambitious, turbulent, and tyrannical prince.

DOMENCO MONEGARIO, Doge VI.

A. D. 756. Domenco Monegario, doge VI. Tribunes oppoſe him.

After the expulſion of Galla the general council appointed Domenco Monegario his ſucceſſor. What could induce them to this choice is not eaſily imagined, as we are told that his judgment [d] was ſo weak, and his temper ſo impetuous, as to render it neceſſary to direct the one and controul the other by the authority of certain tribunes. This was his known character before he was elected to govern the republic; upon his acceſſion he ſhewed himſelf a monſter of iniquity [e]. He was cruel, covetous, and lewd beyond example; inſomuch that the republic, finding the virtues of the tribunes an unequal balance to his vices, inflicted the ſame puniſhment on him as they had done on his predeceſſor (A).

MAURITIO GALBAIO, Doge VII.

A. D. 764. Mauritio, doge VII.

The cruelty of the late adminiſtration did not deter the council from electing Mauritio Galbaio, who was permitted to aſſociate his ſon Giovanni with him in the government. About the beginning of Mauritio's dogeſhip, the Heracleans and Jeſulans abandoned their dwellings, and ſought protection of Charlemagne, who ſettled them in Malamoc until their affairs could be reinſtated [f]: the occaſion of their flight proceeded from the diſcovery of ſome conſpiracies which Fortunato, biſhop of Grada, had formed againſt the republic. The Heracleans and Jeſulans were deeply concerned in the plot, and fearing the reſentment of the doge whom they intended to depoſe, thought to ſcreen themſelves under the ſanction of Charlemagne's power; the Venetians, however, bravely attacked them, driving them out of Malamoc, without regarding the emperor's protection. Charlemagne was ſo incenſed, that he ordered Pepin to declare war againſt the republic. Pepin immediately publiſhed a declaration againſt the Venetians; but he had not entered their territories when news was brought to him, that Aſtulphus, king of the Lombards, was committing the moſt horrid cruelties in the pope's dominions, and deſtroying every thing with fire and ſword; this for a while ſuſpended, but did not altogether divert the blow intended. Pepin was no ſooner at liberty to

(A) According to Sabellicus, Bonitentius, Blondus Flavius, and ſome other writers, Domenco Monegario continued but five years in the dogeſhip; but Sanſovino, in his chronological tables, has prolonged his power to the eighth year.

turn his arms againſt the republic, than he purſued the war ſo ſucceſsfully, as to deprive a them of almoſt all their dominions upon the continent: he deſtroyed Heraclea, and laid waſte the country of the Jeſulans; an extraordinary method of aſſiſting thoſe who had demanded his ſuccour. We are for this reaſon inclined to diſtruſt this account of the origin of the war; and the more, as ſome anachroniſms in it render the whole improbable: the moſt ſpecious cauſe is, that the Venetians had incurred the diſpleaſure of Pepin, by the aſſiſtance they lent Aſtulphus, with whom they were in alliance. Bonitentius relates, that Pepin's ſucceſs was not great, and the impreſſion he made on the frontiers, which Mauritio bravely defended, inconſiderable. We are farther told, that before he came to a deciſive engagement with the Venetians, he was called off from the war by the revolt of Aſtulphus:

certain it is, that the Venetians had about this time declared themſelves a free, independent b ſtate, neither acknowleging the ſuperiority of the Eaſtern or Weſtern empires, nor even the ſpiritual juriſdiction of the pope, but under certain reſtrictions [g]. This circumſtance then might be an additional cauſe of Pepin's reſentment, and have drawn upon the Venetians the war. Soon after the concluſion of this affair Mauritio died; and with him was extinct for a time, the happineſs of the republic: his wiſdom had conducted them ſafely through the moſt perilous and critical conjucture the ſtate ever beheld, and his valour gained him the eſteem of Pepin, then the greateſt potentate of the Weſt [h]. He was humane, affable, and courteous; he poſſeſſed all thoſe talents and qualities which could gain him the eſteem or love of the people (B).

GIOVANNI, Doge VIII. c

A. D. 773. Giovanni, doge VIII. ſucceeds.

THE republic had reaſon to lament the loſs of this amiable prince: his ſon Giovanni, the very reverſe of the father's character, ſucceeded. Giovanni had been his father Mauritio's colleague; and now ſucceeding to the whole authority, he begun his adminiſtration with harraſſing Giovanni de Trieſte, biſhop of Grada, a prelate of virtue and piety. We are left in the dark in relation to the cauſe of this cruel uſage; probably whim, caprice, and his diſlike to a man of fair reputation, might be the ſole occaſion-----Invidia virtus plectatur [i]. Whatever it was, the biſhop met with the moſt barbarous and inhuman uſage; he was taken, and, after a ſhort confinement, thrown headlong from a high tower. The ſucceeding biſhop formed a ſtrong party in Venice againſt the doge, either to depoſe or to murder him; but the plot was diſcovered juſt as it was on the point of execution, and the biſhop and other conſpirators d forced to ſave themſelves by flight. The leading men in this plot were Demetrio Marmani, Foſcaro de Georges, and Obelerio, at that time tribunes [k]: they concealed themſelves in Treviſo, but the biſhop went directly to the court of Pepin, and threw himſelf upon that prince's protection. Pepin had been ſtiled king of Italy by the pope; in conſequence of which he always eſpouſed the cauſe of the church, without enquiring into its merit. He reſolved to ſupport the biſhop; but before hoſtilities were commenced, Giovanni and his ſon Mauritio, whom he had made his colleague, were depoſed for their barbarity and inſolence; and Obelerio Antenoreo, one of the tribunes, elected doge. In this period it was that Olivula was erected into an epiſcopal ſee, (the firſt we have any mention of in Venice) having the iſlands Lupria and Dorſedura within its juriſdiction; the antient family of the Scapari at this time e built the church of Moſes, the fineſt piece of architecture Venice had ſeen; Sergius a private ſtranger, who had been ſuddenly and miraculouſly cured of an inveterate diſeaſe, founded and adorned the building called St. Michael's church, in gratitude to that ſaint for his recovery. Theſe, and ſuch other important facts, do the hiſtorians of early ages relate [l].

OBELERIO, Doge IX.

A. D. 804. Obelerio, doge IX.

OBELERIO was one of the tribunes who conſpired againſt Giovanni: he had taken refuge in Treviſo, where he reſided till the expulſion of the doge and his ſon. Upon his acceſſion he requeſted the permiſſion of the aſſembly to devolve ſome part of the govern- f ment upon his brother Beato, modeſtly declaring, that he was unable to ſupport the whole burden [m]. Beato was ſent to Conſtantinople, probably to ſtrengthen the republic againſt the approaching ſtorm from Pepin, by the friendſhip of Nicephorus: he was kindly received by the Greek emperor, and treated with the reſpect due to a crowned head. During his abſence Valentin, the youngeſt brother, was appointed to aſſiſt Obelerio: but here we find ſo many contradictions as it would be impoſſible to reconcile; ſuch a variety of diſcording opinions among authors, that we are at a loſs which of them to follow. Sabellicus relates, that Obelerio being depoſed by his brother Beato, fled to Charlemagne for protection; that the emperor ſent orders to Pepin to march immediately into Italy againſt the Venetians and Beato, who had uſurped the whole authority [b]: others ſay, that Pepin had entered the frontiers of the republic before the emperor's commands arrived, in order to reſtore the biſhop of Grada. Sabellicus farther relates, that Pepin having ſeized all the dominions of the republic upon the continent, was preparing to lay ſiege to Venice, when his fleet was entirely diſperſed and ruined by a ſtorm.

In a war that broke out between Pepin and the Greek emperor Nicephorus, the doge undertook to mediate a peace; but ſhewing a biaſs to the intereſt of Nicephorus, the treaty was abruptly broke off [c]. Pepin was ſo incenſed at Obelerio's partiality, that he determined to carry the war into the Venetian dominions, and deſtroy the very being of the republic.

After having laid waſte the province of Venetia, he led his army directly to Venice, blocking the city up at the ſame time by his fleet. The Venetians were not diſheartened at the number of their enemies, the reputation of Pepin, or the civil diviſions among themſelves; their animoſities were laid aſide, and a ſtrict union formed againſt the common enemy: the chief command was given to Valentin [d], as Obelerio was ſuppoſed too nearly allied to Pepin, to fight with that good-will and chearfulneſs the ſervice of his country required. The Venetians, notwithſtanding the moſt obſtinate defence, the moſt vigorous ſallies, and their ſelling every inch of ground at an incredible expence of blood, were at length reduced to that part of the city ſouth of the Rialto; this ſtream, and their own bravery, being now their only defence. While Pepin was preparing to lay a bridge over the canal, they reſolved, as a laſt effort, to attack Pepin's fleet, and to vanquiſh or die in defence of their liberty. Embarking all the troops they could ſpare, they bore down, with the advantage of the wind and tide, upon the enemy, and began the attack with ſuch fury, as obliged the French admiral to give way. The lightneſs of their ſhips, and their knowledge of the ſoundings, gave the Venetians every advantage they could wiſh: the enemy's fleet was run aground, and the greater part of their troops periſhed in attempting to eſcape; the ſhips were all, to a few, either taken or deſtroyed. During this action at ſea, Pepin reſolved to aſſault the city by land, not doubting but the garriſon was ſo weakened by the number of forces they had ſent on board the fleet, as to be able to make but a ſlight reſiſtance. Having for this purpoſe thrown a bridge over the Rialto, he was marching his troops acroſs it when he found himſelf attacked on every ſide by the Venetians from their boats, and others who had poſted themſelves on the bridge. The battle was long, bloody, and doubtful, until the Venetians employed all their power to break down the bridge; which at laſt yielding to their obſtinate endeavours, a prodigious ſlaughter of the French enſued: however, they fought like men in deſpair, ſeeing no hopes of ſafety but in victory; but all communication being cut off with the troops on ſhore, they were to a man either killed or drowned. The number of ſlain was ſo great, that the ſpace between the Rialto and Malamoc was covered with dead bodies, and has ever ſince gone by a name expreſſive of the prodigious ſlaughter [e]. Pepin was ſo ſtruck with the intrepidity of the Venetians, that he raiſed the ſiege, abandoned the enterprize, and concluded a peace with the republic: he afterwards came to Venice to intercede for Obelerio, that he might be reſtored, which the Venetians granted, more out of reſpect to the requeſt of ſo great a prince, than love to the unhappy Obelerio [f]. The people had a notion that Obelerio had encouraged Pepin to declare war upon the republic, and that a correſpondence between them was carried on during the ſiege; Pepin was therefore no ſooner withdrawn, than the populace ſeizing upon Obelerio, tore his body in pieces, and ſcattered his limbs and bowels about the city. His wife ſhared the ſame fate; for as ſhe was the ſiſter of Pepin, it was not doubted but her influence was the cauſe of her huſband's perfidy. Thus ended the bloody war with Pepin, which coſt the doge his life, after he had governed jointly with his brothers for the ſpace of five years. Obelerio had ſome excellent qualities; his heart was tender and humane; his averſion to blood made him heſitate and tamper in ſuch a manner, as drew upon him the imputation of treachery [g]: it is poſſible too that the eaſineſs of his temper, his affection for his wife, and even ſubjection to her violent paſſions, might have led him into an unjuſtifiable correſpondence with Pepin; but we have no proof that he ever betrayed his country, or committed any other crime deſerving the rigour of his puniſhment.

The doge put to death.

ANGELO PARTICIPATIO, Doge X.

OBELERIO was ſucceeded by Angelo Participatio, the tenth doge; if we include Valentin, who commanded during the ſiege, the eleventh. Sanſovino omits him in his table [a]: we have followed this writer's authority, as his chronology is the moſt regular, beſt connected, and consistent with facts. Participatio was descended from an ancient family of Heraclea, as appears by an inscription upon a monument erected to commemorate his having repaired, beautified, and adorned the place of his nativity, hence called Villa-nova. In his administration the city of Venice was enlarged by an addition of sixty of the surrounding islands, connected with bridges, and taken into the liberties of the capital [b]; the Rialto was assigned for the constant residence of the princes; and a palace of elegant structure reared for the abode of the doge. a

ANGELO having associated Giovanni, his eldest son, with him in the government, he sent Justiniano, the younger, upon an ambassy to Leo emperor of the East; where he acquitted himself with great dexterity and address, distinguishing himself by his sound judgment, and accurate knowlege of mankind. He was so incensed at the preference shewn Giovanni, b that he obstinately refused to visit his father upon his return; and persisted in his resolution, until Giovanni was deposed and banished: after which Justiniano was appointed his father's colleague [c].

About this time a plot formed against the doge was discovered: Giovanni Tolonico, Bono Bragadino, and other chiefs of the conspiracy were put to death; some of inferior rank banished, and slight corporal punishments inflicted upon several others. This affair being terminated, the Venetians found themselves involved in a quarrel with Ulric bishop of Aquileia, assisted by the Forlians. Ulric had relented the see of Aquileia's being subjected to the jurisdiction of the bishop of Grada: in order to revenge himself, he raised an army, entered into treaty with the Forlians, and marched into the bishopric of Grada in a hostile manner. He c likewise fitted out a fleet to molest his brother prelate by sea; but the Venetians coming up with the latter, burnt, sunk, and destroyed the squadron, taking Ulric and all his principal officers prisoners: then landing their forces, they not only dispersed the bishop's army, but took several towns upon the coast, and laid waste the whole province of Friuli. At their return they set Ulric and the other prisoners at liberty, on condition he would annually send to Venice twelve wild boars, a bull, and twelve loaves, in acknowlegement of his subjection [d]: we are told that a festival, in commemoration of this victory and tribute, is still observed. These are all the transactions, public and private, which occur during the government of Angelo Participatio.

JUSTINIANO, Doge XI. d

Justiniano, doge XI.

JUSTINIANO, at his father's death, came into possession of the whole government. His first public act was to send a fleet to the assistance of the emperor Michael [e], against the Saracens, who were by this time become a formidable and dangerous people to the Christian powers. Thus we see, that the Venetians were among the first Christians who endeavoured to give a check to the progress of the infidels: we shall soon find them taking the lead, and fighting the most spirited and dreadful battles.

All that historians farther relate of Justiniano and the republic, during his government, consists of miracles, legends, and fables of superstition and ignorance: this indeed may be collected from them, that he was a wise prince, who pursued peace and the happiness of his e people; cherished trade and industry, and cultivated the duties of religion, virtue, and humanity. He died two years after he had taken upon him the supreme authority, being succeeded by his brother Giovanni.

GIOVANNI I, Doge XII.

A. D. 829. Giovanni Participatio, doge XII.

GIOVANNI was hardly established in his authority when an impostor started up, who personated Obelerio, and pretended he had been unjustly deposed. Arriving in the island of Carlia (now Voggio) he was well received by many of the principal inhabitants, who espoused his cause, either from a persuasion that he was the real Obelerio, or from private motives. In a little time he mustered a considerable army, and contracting an alliance with the Narentines, a piratical state, was preparing to attack the city, when Giovanni surprised him with a f powerful fleet, and obliged him to fly to Malamoc. The inhabitants of this island, in attempting to screen the pretended Obelerio, brought ruin upon themselves; for Giovanni attacked and defeated them, burnt the city, seized upon the impostor, and cut off his head: before he returned with his fleet, he punished the Narentines for the assistance they afforded the pretended Obelerio, the disturbances given the republic, and for several depredations committed on the Venetian merchants [f].

Soon after, Giovanni was forced to quit the city by a powerful faction, headed by Carosio, who on the doge's departure seized upon the palace, and usurped the supreme authority; but his sway was of short duration; he was deposed by some of the chiefs of his own faction, a and Giovanni recalled by thoſe very perſons who had conſpired againſt him but a few weeks before. His whole life was checquered with a variety of good and bad fortune: firſt he was appointed his father's colleague, then depoſed by his brother; ſoon after recalled by the people; next obliged to fly from a faction; ſuddenly again recalled by the ſame faction; and laſtly depoſed, his hair ſhaved, and himſelf conſtrained to end his days in a monaſtery.

PIERO TRADONICO, Doge XIII.

PIERO TRADONICO, a native of the ancient city Pola, was elected doge in the room of Giovanni Participatio, and was ſcarce eſtabliſhed in his authority, when Theodoſius (perhaps Theophilus) lieutenant to the emperor Michael, came in perſon to Venice, to conclude an alli- A. b ance offenſive and defenſive againſt the Saracens, who had ſeized ſome of the iſlands of the Archipelago, and were then ravaging Italy [g]. The Venetians readily acceded to his propoſals, and immediately equipped a fleet of ſixty gallies, with orders to join the Grecian fleet with all expedition, and ſeek the enemy. Sala, the Saracen general, was then beſieging Tarentum, which he quitted on advice that the combined fleet was approaching, and retired to Crotona; here he made a ſtand, and was ſoon attacked by the Grecian admiral. The battle was long and bloody; but juſt as the Venetians had broke the enemy's line, and victory was inclining to the confederates, the Grecian admiral bore away with all the ſail he could make, leaving the Venetians to ſhift for themſelves. They were ſoon ſurrounded and oppreſſed by the ſuperior number [h] of the Saracen fleet; but preferring death to an inglorious flight, they fought
c until ſcarce a ſhip remained to carry the report of their misfortunes to Venice. The news of this defeat threw the republic into the utmoſt conſternation and perplexity; they doubted not but the Saracens would immediately lay ſiege to the city, for which it was but badly prepared, having loſt the braveſt of their forces in the late unfortunate engagement: however, the fears of the republic were ſoon happily removed, by certain intelligence that the Saracens were gone to Ancona, which place they pillaged and deſtroyed.

THE piratical Narentines were elated with the misfortunes of the republic; and thinking her low condition a proper opportunity for revenging the late diſgrace, they begun to rob, plunder, and lay waſte the coaſt of Dalmatia, carrying their incurſions to the gates of the city Caorli [i]. The Venetians were little diſpoſed to enter upon a new war; yet thinking it
d beneath the dignity of the republic tamely to bear with the inſolence of thoſe robbers, they fitted out a fleet, which ſoon reduced the Narentines to ſubmiſſion, and obliged them to repair the damage. Before the Venetians had recovered the great loſs ſuſtained by the defeat from A. D. 849.
the Saracens, civil commotions aroſe to complete their miſery: the whole ſtate was divided into two violent factions, each ſupported by the nobleſt and moſt powerful families in Venice. On the one ſide were the Juſtiniani, the Polani, and the Baſſei; on the other, the Selioni, the Sevoli, and the Barbolani; who carried their animoſity ſo far, that not a day paſſed without frays, bloodſhed, and murder: at laſt the Barbolani were driven out of the city, which in ſome meaſure appeaſed the fury of the combatants. They were ſoon after reſtored, at the interceſſion of Lodovico II. and then again the tumults were renewed, in one
e of which the doge was murdered. Sabellicus relates, that he was for a long time bravely defended by his ſervants, who, after he was killed, retreated into the palace, and ſtood a ſiege for thirty days, until famine at length compelled them to ſurrender [k]. It was death to ſeize upon the palace, deemed the property of the republic; yet in conſideration of their brave zeal for ſo good a maſter, they were pardoned and rewarded. A ſtrict ſcrutiny was then made into the occaſion of the doge's murder: ſome of the conſpirators were hanged, others drowned, and a great number baniſhed. Thus died Piero Tradonico, after he had governed the republic with great reputation for the ſpace of twenty nine years. All the hiſtorians agree in giving him the higheſt praiſes; they call him temperate, pious, juſt, a warrior, and a ſtateſman: the misfortunes of the city they attribute to the pride, wealth, and ambi-
f tion of the nobility. A tribunal was appointed to inquire into the cauſes of the civil diviſions; it conſiſted of the biſhop of Equiline, the dean of Grada, and Domincio Baſſoni, men of great prudence and caution. Their impartiality and integrity were ſo univerſally acknowleged, that both parties acquieſcing in their judgment, peace, concord, and happineſs, were in a little time reſtored.

ORSO PARTICIPATIO, Doge XIV.

THE aſſembly then proceeded to the election of a new doge, when the majority declared A. D. 864. Orſo Participatio, doge XIV.
in favour of Orſo Participatio. He begun his adminiſtration with endeavouring to preſerve the public tranquility; but the ambition and warlike diſpoſition of the Saracens fruſtrated his
g deſign. They made a ſudden incurſion into Dalmatia, plundered and deſtroyed the country; then ravaging the coaſt of Iſtria, they laid ſiege to Grada with a powerful fleet and army.

The republic saw, that spirit and resolution must be exerted. A fleet was equipped, and a the doge came so suddenly upon the enemy, that breaking up the siege, they retired precipitately with the loss of a great number of men and vessels: we are told that, upon this occasion, Giovanni, the doge's son, gave so many proofs of his courage, conduct, and other military qualities, that he was raised to the dignity of colleague to his father. Bonitentius mentions another defeat sustained by the Saracens before Tarentum; likewise a victory obtained over the Narentines, who had broke through the former peace, and laid waste the country of Istria. Sabellicus passes over the former, as not deserving credit; but it seems to be incontestably proved by an inscription quoted by Sansovino (A). Orso now turned his attention to domestic affairs; he made up the quarrel between the prelates of Grada and Tourcelles; he assigned that part of the city called dorse dura, which was naked and desolate, b for the residence of his squires; he composed all differences subsisting between the republic
A. D. 881. and the Forlians, or people of Friuli; he brought about a perfect harmony between the sees of Aquileia and Grada. After a happy, wise, and prosperous reign of seventeen years, Orso died, the darling of the people, the terror of the Saracens, and scourge of the Narentines. He found the republic low, he left it flourishing; divided into factions, filled with tumults and civil broils, he restored tranquility, peace, and harmony; the treasury exhausted, the marine ruined, and the public commerce destroyed, he rendered the state rich, powerful, and respected by all its neighbours.

Giovanni Participatio, doge XV.

ORSO was succeeded by his son Giovanni; Sabellicus calls him his brother. The new doge, at the request of the assembly, sent his brother Badoario to pope John, to solicit the investiture of Commachio, and that it might for ever be annexed to the Venetian dominions. Marini, the earl of Commachio, having notice of this ambassy, lay in wait for Badoario, wounded and made him prisoner, obliging him to purchase his liberty by a promise, in the name of the republic, that the design should be relinquished [m]. Badoario dying soon after his return to Venice, the republic declared war against the earl, besieged Commachio, and used with the utmost severity the persons concerned in the conspiracy against the ambassador. Giovanni falling dangerously ill, he devolved the government upon his brother Orso, who soon voluntarily resigned the trust: upon this Giovanni, having recovered his health, again re- d sumed the management of the state; but soon after, being seized with a slow lingering malady, formally abdicated his authority (B). Giovanni Participatio was both a soldier and politician; but he had an insolence and pride of disposition, which rendered his government odious to the people.

PIETRO CANDIANO, Doge XVI.

A. D. 887. Pietro Candiano, doge XVI.

PIETRO CANDIANO was appointed doge by the universal consent of the assembly: to him Giovanni resigned the trust, coming publicly with the state of a doge to the council, and returning to his own house as a private person [n]. The people were so taken with the modesty, and yet dignity of his manner, and the grace with which he divested himself of e power, that, forgetting their former dislike to his government, they all cried out, that no one but Giovanni was worthy to rule: however, he persisted in his resolution, and Candiano was confirmed in the supreme magistracy. The incursions of the Narentines, who had been so lately chastised, rendered it necessary to equip a fleet. Candiano taking upon himself the command of a small squadron of seven gallies, came up with the pirates, and maintained a hot engagement for several hours, notwithstanding their great superiority: at last the enemy, finding that victory depended upon the doge's life, who was every where present animating his men, bore down with their stoutest ships upon Candiano's galley. The dispute was obstinate; but the doge being slain, the men surrendered themselves to the Narentines [b]. The f assembly was inconsolable at this loss, and the people tumultuous; nor could any thing appease them besides a promise from Giovanni that he would resume the government, if a doge was not immediately elected to their satisfaction [c]. The council nominated Pietro Tribuno, a person equally esteemed for his public and private virtues: the people were contented, and

(B) Sansovino relates this fact of Candiano; but all the historians besides attribute it to Giovanni. What confirms their authority is, that Sansovino himself allows of Candiano's being slain in the field, which is improbable if he resigned the dogeship.

PIETRO TRIBUNO, Doge XVII.

Soon after Tribuno's acceſſion, the republic was thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by a report that a powerful army of Hunns, who had broke into Italy, was marching towards Venice. The Hunns, having defeated Berengarius, entered Italy, putting every Roman they met to the ſword, burning the villages, deſtroying the harveſts and vintages, ſlaughtering the cattle; in ſhort, laying every place waſte and deſolate, without remorſe or humanity. Induced by the wealth of the Venetian republic, they reſolved to ſack and pillage the city. Marching through the maritime provinces, they burnt Villa Nova, Jeſuloa, and Chioggio: after deſtroying every thing upon the coaſt, they prepared boats to attack the b Rialto, which they imagined muſt yield to their prodigious numbers [d]. Pietro Tribnno omitted nothing which became a great general and a ſoldier: he placed ſtrong guards round the city, fortified the places moſt expoſed, equipped a fleet with incredible diſpatch, and diſturbed and harraſſed the enemy by perpetual ſallies. His activity, penetration, skill, and preſence of mind, were the aſtoniſhment of every one. He animated the troops by his example; was the foremoſt in every attack: in a word, was the life and ſoul of the whole ſtate.

Pietro Tribuno, doge XVII. A. D. 903.

The Hunns were preparing to make a general aſſault; and Pietro, after a ſhort and animating ſpeech, ordered the ſoldiers to be embarked, and immediately bore down upon the enemy near Albiola. The battle began with fury, and continued with obſtinacy for ſeveral days, neither ſide diſcovering any ſigns of wearineſs; the fleets ſeparated at night, the com-
c batants returning next day to the charge with freſh vigour: the Venetians every where oppoſed courage to numbers, and the doge performed prodigies of valour. At laſt Tribuno, fearing that the ſpirits of his men might ſink under the obſtinacy and multitude of the enemy, collected all his force, reſolving either to die or make an impreſſion upon their line. He was ſo bravely ſeconded by his troops, that the barbarians were broken and defeated, and nothing but ſlaughter and a general carnage enſued. The ſea was covered with dead bodies, and the Venetians fought, ſays the florid Blondus, upon heaps of the ſlain barbarians as upon dry land; the ſiege was raiſed, the Hunns driven out of Italy, and the reputation of Venice for arms became famous all over the world [e]. In this manner do their hiſtorians ſpeak; and truly we muſt allow, that never were valour, conduct, and perſeverance, more conſpicuous
d than upon this occaſion. The city was ill prepared for a ſiege when it was inveſted. Beſides the ſcarcity of proviſions, the weakneſs of the marine, and the low ſtate of the finances, which had been greatly exhauſted in the late wars againſt the Saracens and Narentines, a general languor, deſpondency, and depreſſion of ſpirits, prevailed among all degrees of the inhabitants, owing to the late loſſes and miſcarriages: but neceſſity, and the animating example of their valiant doge, overcame all difficulties, and inſpired every Venetian with ſentiments worthy of the freedom of their conſtitution, and wiſdom of their government. As ſoon as they were delivered from the barbarians, the doge applied himſelf to reward thoſe who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſiege; to relieve thoſe who had ſuffered by the death of their fathers, huſbands, or ſons; to repair the buildings that had been pulled down, or e otherways damaged, by the barbarians; and to eſtabliſh, peace, order, and tranquility, through every part of the republic. While he was thus employed, an acute diſeaſe ſuddenly deprived the republic of her greateſt commander, her wiſeſt ſtateſman, and beſt governor.

URSO BODOAIRIO, Doge XVIII.

The council of ſtate proceeded to the election of a ſucceſſor; their choice fell upon Urſo Bodoairio, commonly called Urſo Particípatio the ſecond, a man of ſtrict morals, great piety, prudence, and juſtice; of a peaceable and quiet diſpoſition, equally ſtudious of his own eaſe and of the public tranquility. The republic ſent Pietro, the doge's ſon, on an ambaſſy to Conſtantinople, where he was well received, loaded with rich preſents, and honoured with the f title of protoſpater of the empire: on his return he was attacked, plundered, and made priſoner by Michael, a petty prince of Dalmatia [f]. Some time after Pietro made his eſcape, and returned in great diſtreſs: but neither the hardſhips he ſuffered, the inſult upon the republic, nor the entreaties of his ſon, could prevail on the pacific temper of Urſo to declare war againſt the Dalmatians. After governing the ſtate for the ſpace of twenty years, with great moderation, Bodoairio reſigned his authority and retired to a monaſtery, where he finiſhed his days in the auſtere practice of the moſt rigid virtue [g].

PIETRO CANDIANO II. Doge XIX.

PIETRO CANDIANO the ſecond, was elected doge in the room of the abdicated prince. About this time the republic declared war againſt the Commachians, who had broke through the laſt treaty: it was carried on with ſo much vigour and ſucceſs, that the Commachians, finding they were unable to cope with ſo powerful an enemy, ſurrendered priſoners at diſ- a cretion. The Venetians uſed their power with great moderation; they ſet the enemy at liberty, and reſtored them to all their former privileges. In this dogeſhip, Iſtria likewiſe was conquered and annexed to the dominions of the republic; ſoon after Candiano died, having governed the republic for ſeven years. He is ranked among the middling princes, having neither virtues nor vices in his character ſo diſtinguiſhing, as to merit particular regard.

PIETRO PARTICIPATIO, Doge XX.

Pietro Participatio, doge XX.

THE adminiſtration of the ſucceeding prince, Pietro Participatio, was pacific. Nothing is recorded either of him or of the republic, but that he obtained from the emperor the privilege of coining money in his own name, with the arms of the ſtate on the reverſe [h]. Some b hiſtorians affirm, that the republic aſſumed the right of coining money long before this æra, which indeed is probable, as they had declared themſelves a free people in the beginning of Charlemagne's reign [i].

PIETRO CANDIANO III. Doge XXI.

A. D. 942. Pietro Candiano, doge XXI.

PARTICIPATIO was ſucceeded by his ſon Pietro Candiano, the third of that name. He had been colleague to his father for the firſt year of his dogeſhip, but was baniſhed the city for his intolerable cruelty, pride, and inſolence. Experience and misfortune, however, reclaiming him, he was recalled and ſubſtituted by the common conſent in his father's room, of which the people had never cauſe to repent.

CANDIANO was ſcarce eſtabliſhed in his authority, when the peculations, frauds, and c robberies of the Narentines obliged the republic to declare war againſt this people. They had in a manner blocked up Venice, ſo that a merchantman had no ſafety in going in or out of the harbour; nor in any part of the Adriatic, which was crowded with the ſhips of piratical ſtates [k]. Shame and revenge took poſſeſſion of every breaſt: a fleet was manned with all expedition, and ſent in queſt of the pirates; who, being diſtributed in ſingle ſhips, or ſmall ſquadrons, were unable to reſiſt ſo ſtrong an armament. they therefore ſubmitted themſelves to the clemency of the republic, and were pardoned on condition they would repair all the damage ſuſtained by the Venetians, pay an annual tribute, and give ſecurity for
A. D. 943. their future behaviour [l]. In the mean time violent tumults and ſeditions prevailed all over d the city. The doge had taken for his colleague Pietro, his ſecond ſon, a young man of a factious, turbulent, and impetuous ſpirit [m]. Not ſatisfied with the preference to his elder brother given him, he was ambitious of governing alone; he animated the people to ſeditions, excited tumults, and encouraged inſolence and contempt of his father's authority: in ſhort, the profligate, the robber, and aſſaſſin, were not only protected, but encouraged by Pietro. The ſenate, dreading the conſequences of ſuch tumultuous riots, did all in their power to ſupport the old doge's authority, to quell ſeditions, and compoſe the minds of the people. At laſt in perſon, followed by the ſenate, Candiano addreſſed the multitude in terms ſo feeling and pathetic, that their rage was ſuddenly turned againſt Pietro and the other in-Pietro baniſhed. cendiaries, who, at their remonſtrance, were baniſhed the city [n]. The clergy and people e bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath never to recall them: an oath which we ſhall ſoon ſee was broke through. Pietro, after wandering about for ſome time, at length went to Guido, ſon and ſucceſſor of Berengarius; to him he applied himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully, that Guido furniſhed him with ſix large armed gallies to make war upon his father and country. Without remorſe or feeling he commenced hoſtilities, took, plundered, and deſtroyed all the Venetian ſhipping; and committed ſuch enormities as broke his good old father's heart. The miſ-Candiano dies. fortunes of Candiano's adminiſtration may be aſcribed ſolely to his parental affection, and particular fondneſs for the leaſt deſerving of his children.

PIETRO CANDIANO IV. Doge XXII.

Pietro Candiano, doge XXII.

CANDIANO was ſcarce dead, when the affections of the people, ever inconſtant, were as f violently bent upon recalling Pietro, as before they were on puniſhing him with death or baniſhment. He was at this time in arms againſt the republic; yet the people, unmindful of the oath they had voluntarily taken but a year before, diſpatched meſſengers to him, and conferred upon him the whole ſupreme authority, from a ſhare in which he had lately and deſervedly been depoſed. Not ſatisfied with the common honours beſtowed upon doges, they ſent three hundred ſhips and barges, filled with the nobility and chief citizens, to meet him [o]: but they ſoon received the juſt reward of their folly and perjury; nor did he long enjoy a dignity he owed more to the caprice of the people, than to his own merit.

a CANDIANO was not long poſſeſſed of the ſupreme authority, before he broke out into the moſt profligate, abandoned, and wanton wickedneſs: he was now an aſſemblage of every vice which can have place in the human heart; his cruelty, luſt, avarice, and brutality, were not to be equalled. The miſery of the republic was augmented by a dreadful fire which broke out, and, in the ſpace of a few hours, conſumed above three hundred houſes, an incredible number of inhabitants, and a prodigious quantity of effects of great value. A. D. 967.

BEFORE this accident the doge had levied an army, and marched againſt the inhabitants of Uderza, on pretence of their witholding certain lands belonging to his wife. He firſt plundered and laid waſte their country, then attacked their city, took and levelled it with the ground, uſing the citizens with the utmoſt inhumanity [p]: from thence he paſſed to Fer-
b rara; aſſaulted and took a city on the confines, treating it in the ſame manner he did Uderza. Upon his return to Venice his views roſe in proportion to his ſucceſs: he practiſed every exceſs of an abſolute and barbarous tyrant. That he might be able to proceed with impunity, he was conſtantly attended by a ſtrong body-guard, and a numerous garriſon in the palace: but no defence is ſufficient to protect a tyrant againſt the reſentment of an injured people. The Venetians, calling to mind their ancient liberty, ſuddenly fell upon the guard, diſperſed them, and ſacrificed the doge to their reſentment. Other hiſtorians relate (for they differ in particular circumſtances in every period), that the doge retreating to his palace, defended himſelf with great valour: that upon this the aſſailants ſet fire to the houſes neareſt the palace, not being able to approach it, which in a little time conſumed them, c the palace, doge, and garriſon. This is probably the ſame fire which other hiſtorians affirm to have happened in the beginning of Candiano's dogeſhip; but the accounts of this tranſaction are ſo various, that we muſt leave the reader to determine for himſelf. Upon this calamitous occaſion periſhed the beautiful churches of St. Mark, St. Theodore, and St. Mary Jubenica. Put to death. A. D. 976.

THE republic, ſays Sabellicus, having recovered her liberty, it was difficult to judge whether her joy at finding herſelf rid of a cruel tyrant, or ſorrow to ſee the ravages committed by the fire, were the greateſt: nothing but feaſting, mirth, and feſtivity, were to be ſeen on the one hand; while on the other, complaints, lamentations, and wailings, were poured forth. The council, fearing the conſequences of this diſtracted ſituation of things, haſtened to the election of a new doge. After their late ſufferings, it is not to be doubted but they
d uſed the utmoſt caution and circumſpection in the choice of a prince: they were happy in their endeavours, the election having been declared in favour of Pietro Urſeolo, a man equally diſtinguiſhed by his birth, his public and private virtues.

PIETRO URSEOLO, Doge XXIII.

URSEOLO was with the utmoſt difficulty prevailed upon to accept the honours aſſigned him by the voice of the nation [q]: he pleaded conſcience, inability, and his diſlike to grandeur and buſineſs; but the more his modeſty declined the offers made him, the more earneſt were the people in their intreaties. At length, out of love and compaſſion for the public, he accepted that authority of which the leſs deſerving were ambitious from views of ſelf-ine tereſt. He begun his government with rebuilding the palace and St. Mark's church at his own expence; he made large donations to the ſufferers by the late fire, and omitted nothing which could reſtore the city to its former ſplendor, or the citizens to their happineſs [r]. While he was thus employed, the Saracens broke into Italy, took and deſtroyed Capua, and were beſieging Barri, a town in the Bergamaſco. The inhabitants were greatly diſtreſſed by famine, when Urſeolo ſeaſonably arrived with a fleet to their relief: he contented himſelf with ſupplying the town with proviſions, and reinforcing the garriſon, until the arrival of the Grecian fleet. As ſoon as they had joined him, he fell upon the Saracens with ſuch reſolu-
f tion and conduct, that he ſoon defeated and compelled them to raiſe the ſiege: it deſerves notice, that the emperor's lieutenant ſerved under Urſeolo. In the mean time the doge's conduct was ſo moderate, his manner ſo affable, his vigilance ſo ſtrict, and his juſtice ſo impartial, that every unprejudiced perſon acknowleged the wiſdom of his conduct: factions, however, were formed againſt him by the adherents and miniſters of the late unhappy Candiano. The biſhop of Grada had likewiſe nearly engaged the republic in a war with the emperor Otho; but the wiſdom of Urſeolo triumphed over every difficulty, and ſecured tranquility, peace, and happineſs to his people [s]. After a ſhort reign of two years, he reſigned the truſt he had managed with ſo much integrity, and ſet out on a pilgrimage to Aquitaine (C); after having with the utmoſt care regulated the affairs of the public in ſuch a manner, Pietro Urſeolo, doge XXIII. The Saracens come into Italy. (C) The doge had undertaken this pilgrimage at the inſtigation of one Gueria, a monk, who reſided for ſome time at Venice; he lived for ſome years in Aquitaine in a courſe of rigid devotion, quite unmindful of his former dignity. In ſuch acts of auſterity did the religion of thoſe days conſiſt; as if one of the firſt duties of a reaſonable creature was not to contribute all in his power to the good of ſociety.

VITALIS, Doge XXIV.

Vitalis, doge XXIV.

THE aſſembly met to appoint a ſucceſſor; Vitalis, ſon of Candiano, was the perſon fixed upon. Of him, or of the republic during the year he governed, we find nothing recorded, beſides his having obtained leave for his brother the biſhop of Grada to return to the city. About the end of the year he fell dangerouſly ill, and imagining he ſhould not recover, he vowed to live a monaſtic life the remainder of his days, which he unwillingly performed after the terrors of death were removed [u]. b

TRIBUNO MEMIO, Doge XXV.

A. D. 979. Tribuno Memio, doge XXV.

A NEW election became neceſſary by the reſignation of Vitalis; accordingly the great council choſe Tribuno Memio, a man of profound wiſdom and experience. Civil diſcords aroſe in the very beginning of Tribuno's government, which miſerably diſtracted the republic. The powerful families of Moroſini and Caloprini had carried their animoſity ſo high, that every day produced tumults, riots, and bloodſhed [x]. Moroſini was at length murdered by an oppoſite faction; and Caloprini forced to fly the city to avoid juſtice. He went directly to the court of the emperor Otho, and promiſed to deliver the city into his hands, if he would declare war againſt the republic: the emperor bearing a grudge to the Venetians, would willingly have complied with Caloprini's propoſal, had he not found it inconvenient. In ſome meaſure he gratified this fugitive, by ſtrictly prohibiting all the ſubjects of the empire to carry on any ſort of trade, commerce, or intercourſe with the Venetians. As Venice was wholly ſupplied in corn, beef, and the other neceſſaries of life from Italy and the empire, this injunction ſoon produced a famine: however, the republic would not deſcend from its dignity by making conceſſions to the emperor; on the contrary, they razed to the ground the houſe of Caloprini, and baniſhed his whole family. Juſt as their neceſſities became extremely preſſing, they were happily relieved by the death of Otho [y], the ſucceeding emperor not chuſing to ſupport Caloprini againſt his country. Plenty and peace were hardly reſtored to Venice when Tribuno Memio died, or, as ſome hiſtorians affirm, was depoſed [z]: certain it is, that his government was not univerſally approved. A prince who takes part in factions muſt neceſſarily incur the diſlike of many of his ſubjects, and govern with a partiality that will infallibly render him odious, and his people unhappy. c d

PIETRO URSEOLO II. Doge XXVI.

A. D. 991. Pietro Urſeolo, doge XXVI.

PIETRO URSEOLO the ſecond, was declared ſucceſſor to Tribuno by the council and people, a dignity which is ſaid to have been foretold him by his father. Under Urſeolo the republic aſcended rapidly to a high degree of wealth, power, and grandeur. The Venetians obtained liberty for their merchants to trade freely without duty or impoſt to all the ports of Greece, Italy, the empire, Egypt, Syria: the Narentines were again ſuppreſſed, Nola reduced, and with ſeveral cities of Dalmatia and Iſtria, annexed to the Venetian dominions: Leſſina, the rendezvous of pirates, was taken; Spalatro ſubdued and ſubjected to St. Mark's. Thence the doge ſailed to Corfou, which he attacked and deſtroyed: he then ſteered for Pharos, (now Leſnia) and deſtroyed a ſtrong fort at the mouth of the haven, the town ſharing the ſame fate, after a gallant defence. The duke having cleared the ſeas of pirates, ſubjected Iſtria, Dalmatia, Liburnia, and the iſlands upon the coaſts, to the ſtate, returning triumphant, ſurrounded by the acclamations of his joyful people: upon this occaſion it was that the title of dukes of Venice and Dalmatia was conferred upon the doges [a]. Magiſtrates were immediately appointed to govern the conquered cities, and every other meaſure taken that could eſtabliſh their tranquility. Soon after Urſeolo died, having by will divided his eſtate into three parts; one he bequeathed to his relations, the other to the exchequer, and the third to the poor. He deſervedly bore the reputation of a great warrior and ſtateſman; but what particularly endeared him to the people was the goodneſs of his heart, which made him the friend, the father, and protector of indigent merit [b]. e f

OTHO URSEOLO, Doge XXVII..

A. D 1009: Otho Urſeolo, doge XXVII.

To repair in the beſt manner poſſible the loſs ſuſtained by the death of ſo valuable a prince, the council raiſed his ſon Otho to the ſupreme dignity. Otho ſo exactly followed the ſteps of his father, that the republic was ſcarce ſenſible of the change.

Two years after he had been created doge, he found it neceſſary to engage the republic in a war. The inhabitants of Atri had made incurſions into the Venetian territories, plun- g a dering and deſtroying the frontier towns, and cruelly robbing the inhabitants of Loretto of their juſt rights and privileges. The Venetians endeavoured to obtain juſtice by negociation; but this being denied, they marched an army againſt the enemy, defeated them in a pitched battle near the town of Loretto, diſperſed their forces, and compelled them to ſue for peace, and make reſtitution [c]. War with the Atrians.

Soon after the republic had finiſhed this affair, ſhe found herſelf involved in another, and no leſs troubleſome quarrel. Marcimirus, prince of Croatia, had infeſted the boundaries of Zara, ſeized ſeveral towns, detaining the inhabitants priſoners, until they had ſworn allegiance to him, contrary to an expreſs treaty concluded a few years before with the republic. The inhabitants of Zara applying to the Venetians for aſſiſtance, were ſupported by a powerful b armament, commanded by the doge in perſon. Marcimirus gave him battle, and was eaſily broken and defeated [d]. Hiſtorians do not inform us whether this war was carried on by ſea or land; they only relate, that Otho having vanquiſhed the enemy, ſcoured the coaſts of Dalmatia, Liburnia, and Iſtria, which his father had brought under the dominion of the republic. Soon after his return, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him, headed by Dominico Flabenico: he was ſeized, his beard ſhaved, depoſed, and baniſhed, fifteen years after he had aſſumed the ſupreme authority; Sabellicus ſays five, admitting which there muſt have been an inter-regnum of ten years; a conjecture ſupported by no authority. Otho was poſſeſſed of great abilities in the ſenate, the cabinet, and the field. He had a particular talent in watching incidents and turning them to the advantage of the ſtate; he was naturally inclined to c war, but the general plan of his politics aimed at peace, and promoting arts, induſtry, and commerce: however, his character was not without blemiſh; he was vindictive, cruel, and jealous, except when his good ſenſe found it neceſſary to ſuppreſs his natural diſpoſition [e]. PIETRO CENTRANIGO, Doge XXVIII.

No ſooner was Otho depoſed, than Pietro Centranigo elected doge. Pietro applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to compoſe the tumults occaſioned by the late conſpiracy; to eſtabliſh order, regularity, and peace through every part of the republic. When Otho was baniſhed, his brother Urſo, fearing he might fall a ſacrifice to the ſame faction, fled precipitately from his dioceſe of Grada, and concealed himſelf in Venice [f]. Pepin, patriarch of Aquileia, taking ad- d vantage of his flight, and of the public diſturbances, ſeized upon Grada, pretending that he held it for Urſo, and appropriated the public money to his own uſe. Centranigo was preparing to force him to make reſtitution, when he was depoſed and confined to a monaſtery by a faction, after having governed with great humanity and prudence, for the ſpace of five years [g]. Pietro Centranigo, doge XXVIII. Depoſed.

DOMINICO FLABENICO, Doge XXIX.

After various tumults and diſorders in the ſtate, during an inter-regnum of one year, Dominico Flabenico was raiſed to the ſupreme authority with the univerſal aſſent of the people. He ſet out on his adminiſtration with a moſt vindictive, unjuſt, and unpopular action; e aſſembling the people, he propoſed expelling the family of Urſeolo as perſons diſaffected to the free conſtitution of the republic, and ambitious of ruling arbitrarily. The multitude, unmindful of the juſt government, wiſe conduct, and great bravery of Otho and his father, determined to oblige the doge and ſecure their liberties, by which means one of the moſt noble, ancient, and worthy families in Venice received a wound, of which it never afterwards recovered [h]. In Dominico's reign it was ordained, that no future prince ſhould aſſociate a colleague in the ſupreme power; a rule ever ſince unaltered [i]. Without performing one ſingle action he died of old age, and was ſucceeded by Dominico Contorini, called to the government by the general voice of the nation. Dominico Flabenico, doge XXIX.

DOMINICO CONTARINI, Doge XXX.

f The confuſions of the laſt reign had prevented the republic from puniſhing the perfidy of the prince of Croatia, who was not to be reſtrained by treaties, or the moſt ſolemn engagements, whenever his intereſt and ambition were concerned: he had now abſolutely ſubdued Zara, and over-run a great part of the country; many cities had likewiſe revolted to him, either out of ficklenеſs, or diſlike to the Venetian government. To put a ſtop to theſe evils, the doge with a powerful fleet, ſet ſail to the coaſt of Dalmatia, landed his army, and inveſted Zara by ſea and land; the city did not hold out long; and the terror with which the ſurrender of this important place ſtruck the other cities, kept them faſt in their obedience and fidelity [k]. Sanſovino relates, that Zara had revolted to the king of Hungary, whoſe troops compoſed the garriſon at the time it was reduced by Contarini. DOMINICO SELVO, Doge XXXI.

AFTER a happy reign of twenty-nine years, Contarini died, greatly admired for his wiſdom, valour, and conduct; and no leſs beloved on account of his courteſy, humanity, benevolence, and clemency [1]. His body was interred with great pomp; during which ceremony Dominico Selvo, who attended, was proclaimed doge, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

Dominico Selvo, doge XXXI.

This doge had the honour of giving the firſt check to the Norman power, at that time very formidable: they were attacked before Durazzo by the Venetian fleet, defeated, and forced to relinquiſh the ſiege. They returned ſoon after, and were a ſecond time attacked by Selvo, but with different fortune; he was now defeated in his turn, and his whole fleet taken and deſtroyed: although the doge had exhibited very extraordinary proofs of courage and conduct, he no ſooner arrived in Venice, than the people exaſperated at the loſs, depoſed him b without ever enquiring into his conduct.

VITALIS FALIERO, Doge XXXII.

Vitalis Faliero, doge XXXII. A. D. 1084.

VITALIS FALIERO was choſen to ſucceed Selvo: his firſt propoſal in council was, that ambaſſadors ſhould be diſpatched to the emperor Alexis, to ſolicit the inveſtiture of Dalmatia and Croatia, countries which the republic held by the right of conqueſt. Dominico Dandalo, Ciani Vitalis, and Andrea Michaeli, were the perſons fixed upon to negociate this important affair: the emperor received them as they had reaſon, from the ſervices of the republic, to expect, granted their requeſt, by which thoſe provinces were inſeparably annexed to the Venetian dominions. Faliero died after a long reign diſtinguiſhed only by miracles c and fables, the offſpring of ſuperſtition and ignorance.

VITALIS MICHAELI, Doge XXXIII.

Vitalis Michaeli, doge XXXIII.

HE was ſucceeded by Vitalis Michaeli, who greatly augmented the maritime power of Venice. In his time the croiſade was preached up in Europe: the republic was not proof againſt the contagion of enthuſiaſm; ſhe took part in the holy league, and equipped a fleet of two hundred veſſels. Before this armament put to ſea, a rupture with the republic of Piſa happened, owing to the mutual jealouſy of the rival ſtates: the Venetians firſt attacked and defeated the Piſans in a bloody ſea-action; after which the fleet ſteered for Smyrna, and from thence directed their courſe to Aſcalon, then beſieged by the chriſtians. To the intrepidity d of the Venetians may be attributed the conqueſt not only of Aſcalon, but of Caipha, and Tiberias: it is probable the doge would have purſued his good fortune, had he not been recalled to repel an invaſion of the Normans into Dalmatia. Here he was equally ſucceſsful; the Normans were every where defeated, and the doge returned loaded with booty and glory to Venice; ſoon after which he died, much eſteemed and regretted.

Ordelapho Faliero, doge XXXIV.

ORDELAPHO FALIERO was elected to ſucceed Vitalis: he was ſcarce fixed in his authority when a great fleet was again ſent to the coaſt of Africa; Sabellicus calls the number ſixty, but Blondus makes it up one hundred. The Venetians aſſiſted Baldwin in the ſiege of e Ptolemais, or Acon, and were the chief inſtruments of its ſurrender; afterwards they laid ſiege to Sydon and Faronica, both which places they carried by aſſault. Baldwin, in recompence of her ſervices, preſented the republic with the city of Acon, which he endowed with extraordinary immunities and privileges; upon which the fleet returned home, doing nothing more for the remainder of the ſeaſon [a].

War with the Paduans.

THE beginning of the following year a controverſy aroſe between the republic and the Paduans, which terminated in a war: the latter, aſſiſted by ſome of the neighbouring ſtates, ventured a battle; but were defeated with the loſs of ſix hundred of their men. This affair happened at Bebia, juſt upon their confines, and ſo terrified the Paduans, that they ſolicited protection from the emperor Henry the fourth [b]. The emperor generouſly uſed his f influence to reconcile them and ſucceeded.

Fire in Venice.

THIS year two dreadful fires happened, which deſtroyed a great number of houſes, conſumed whole ſtreets, and laid waſte ſixteen of the iſlands on which the city ſtood: ſeveral of the moſt beautiful churches, and other buildings periſhed in the flames; but ſo great was the induſtry, wealth, and number of the inhabitants, that in a few months hardly any remains of the late deſolation were viſible. The city received new luſtre by the fire; and the churches, houſes, and buildings, ſeemed to riſe with additional grandeur and elegance out of their aſhes [c].

SCARCE had the republic recovered this calamity, when news arrived of the revolt of Zara: the citizens expelled their governor, and put themſelves under the protection of the king g a of Hungary. This prince, puffed up with his late ſucceſs againſt the Normans, which by the way he chiefly owed to the Venetians, was ſo ungrateful and perfidious, as to ſeize upon ſeveral towns in Dalmatia, contrary to a ſolemn treaty; other cities, and among theſe Zara, voluntarily acknowledged his dominion, throwing off their allegiance to the republic [d]. The doge paſſed with a ſtrong ſquadron to Dalmatia, beſieged Zara, and ſoon obliged it to ſurrender. Ordelapho likewiſe defeated an army that had been ſent to the relief of the place, ſlew a great number, and took ſome hundreds priſoners. From hence he marched to Siegua, which had likewiſe revolted, drove out the Hungarian garriſon, and ſeverely chaſtiſed the inhabitants: the other towns ſubmitted of courſe, and once more acknowleged the juriſ-

b diction of the republic. The doge, not ſatisfied with recovering Dalmatia, croſſed the mountains into Croatia, and wholly ſubdued it; whence the republic aſſumed the title of lords of Croatia [e]. War with the prince of Croatia.

ORDELAPHO having ſettled the provinces, and left garriſons in the cities, returned to Venice, attended by a great number of priſoners of condition and rank, where he was joyfully received by the people. His ſtay was but ſhort; for another great army of Hungarians entering Dalmatia, made a rapid progreſs in the conqueſt of the province. The doge knowing the Dalmatians to be of an inconſtant fickle diſpoſition, thought that no time was to be loſt in oppoſing the enemy: fitting out, therefore, a fleet with the utmoſt expedition, he landed his troops and engaged the enemy. The conflict was violent, victory for a long
c time declaring for neither ſide: at laſt the doge, incenſed at the reſiſtance of an enemy ſo often conquered by the Venetians, broke in upon their ranks with a choſen body of troops, which would have certainly determined the battle favourably, had he not unhappily been mortally wounded. His death ſo diſpirited the Venetians, that diſperſing themſelves they quitted they field, leaving the wounded to the mercy of the Hungarians, who cruelly butchered all the priſoners, and ſo ſucceſsfully purſued the rear of the flying army, that a prodigious ſlaughter enſued. The whole city was greatly afflicted at the defeat of their army, and death of their prince, who ſo bravely aſſerted the rights of the republic: the people were clamorous for a peace, and the council irreſolute. It was at length determined to ſend ambaſſadors to the king of Hungary, to obtain a truce at leaſt upon the beſt terms poſſible: in the d mean time the body of Ordelapho was brought to Venice, and honourably interred, being attended with all the nobility in deep mourning, and the reſt of the people, who loved his perſon as much as they admired his courage [f]. A. D. 689.

DOMENICO MICHELI, Doge XXXV.

DOMENICO MICHELI ſucceeded to the government. Immediately after his acceſſion, the pope's nuncio arrived in Venice, and excited ſuch a ſpirit of enthuſiaſm in the people, that it was unanimouſly reſolved to ſend a fleet to aſſiſt the chriſtians in Africa. Such was the eagerneſs of the citizens to embark in this expedition, that they ſtrove whoſe names ſhould be firſt enrolled, and in a few days a fleet of ſixty gallies put to ſea, ſteering its courſe
e to Dalmatia. The doge having victualled the fleet, ſailed from thence to Cyprus, where hearing that the Saracens were beſieging Joppa he made the beſt ſail he could thither. The garriſon was reduced to the laſt extremity when the doge arrived, ſurpriſed, and defeated the enemy, made a prodigious ſlaughter, and obliged the Saracens precipitately to raiſe the ſiege [g]: the booty which the Venetians took upon this occaſion was immenſe, and ſufficiently reimburſed the expence of the expedition. After this victory the doge went to Jeruſalem, where he was kindly received, and complimented upon his conduct and late ſucceſs. Domenico Micheli, doge XXXV.

TYRE was next beſieged by the united forces of the republic and Varimond biſhop of Jeruſalem. It had been agreed, that when the cities of Tyre and Aſcalon were reduced, the Venetians ſhould ſhare two-thirds of the ſpoils and property taken. Accordingly the city
f was inveſted by ſea and land for two months: the garriſon made no overtures towards a capitulation; and feuds, jealouſies, and ſuſpicions, began to diſtract the councils of the beſiegers. The troops on ſhore complained, that all the fatigue, dangers, and hardſhips of the ſiege fell upon them, while the Venetians lying at eaſe in their ſhips, were to reap the chief advantages from their ſucceſs: theſe and other complaints being either redreſſed or ſilenced by the doge, peace and harmony were re-eſtabliſhed, and the ſiege proſecuted with ſo much vigour, that the garriſon was forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. The ſhare agreed upon was, without any diſpute, aſſigned to the Venetians, whoſe moderation as well as courage gained them great reputation. Tyre beſieged.

WHILE the Venetians were gathering laurels in Syria, Caloiane Commenius, ſon of the em-
g peror Alexis, jealous of the great reputation of the republic, reſolved to attack her, weakened by the abſence of the fleet and doge; but the Venetians having timely notice of his A. D. 1124.

intentions, recalled the doge. Stopping at Rhodes on his way home to refresh and water the fleet, the inhabitants refused to furnish him with the necessaries he demanded: incensed at this denial, he attacked the city, took and levelled it with the ground. From thence he sailed to Chios, which he likewise laid waste and destroyed, carrying off the body of St. Isidore, in those days reputed a treasure of inestimable value: then he seized upon Samos, Lesbos, Andros, and all the other islands of the Archipelago, belonging to the emperor. Setting sail to Dalmatia, he recovered Zara, Spolatra, and Trabu, places which had revolted in the preceding administration: this glorious campaign ended, he conducted his fleet back to Venice, where he was joyfully received by the people [h]. From this time to his death, Domenico pursued pacific measures, and cultivated the arts, commerce, and industry. The republic had acquired great honour and wealth under him, and was advancing by large strides, to that high pitch of glory, grandeur, and power, she soon after attained. a b

PIETRO POLANI, Doge XXXVI.

Pietro Polani, doge XXXVI.

War with Padua.

DOMENICO MICHELI was succeeded by Pietro Polani, his son-in-law. Soon after Polani's accession, the Paduans, unmindful of the conditions of the late peace, began to encroach upon the frontiers of the republic. The Venetian general on the continent highly resented their perfidy, and, without consulting his superiors, attacked and defeated the Paduan army: the slaughter was great on both sides, but the honour of the field remained to the Venetians. This single battle disposed both parties to peace, which accordingly was concluded, on condition that the Paduans banished from their city the promoters of the war. Tranquility had no sooner been restored to the republic, than it was again disturbed by a request from the emperor Emanuel, that the Venetian fleet might be sent against Roger king of Sicily, and son of Guiscard prince of the Normans. A powerful armament was equipped to assist the emperor, and Polani embarked in person in the expedition; but meeting with a terrible storm that damaged the fleet, he put into Caorli to refit. Here the doge fell dangerously ill, and despairing of recovering soon enough to come up with the Normans, he committed the fleet to his brother Giovanni, with orders to proceed against the enemy. Giovanni taking and destroying several of Roger's ships he met with in his cruize, sailed to Corfu, which he reduced by force. On his way from thence he met the whole Norman fleet coming to the relief of the place. Immediately an action began: Giovanni attacked with great fury, and was received with equal valour; but the Venetians proving the more skilful mariners, got the windward of the enemy, soon broke the line, sunk, took, and destroyed a number of their ships, and at last gained a complete victory with an inconsiderable loss [i]. The empire being thus relieved, Giovanni returned with the fleet to Venice, a prodigious booty, and a great number of prisoners: but the doge's death, which happened a few days before, prevented the general expressions of joy for so glorious a victory. At the death of Roger king of Sicily, the republic entered into an alliance with William his successor, who granted a variety of valuable privileges and immunities to the Venetian merchants trading to his dominions. Six ships of war were this year sent out to clear the gulph of pirates, in which they were so successful, that a boat loaded with gold, says Blondus, might easily pass from one end of the Adriatic to the other. c d e

DOMENICO MOROSINI, Doge XXXVII.

In the room of the late doge was elected Domenico Morosini: in the beginning of his government a terrible fire broke out, which some ascribe to chance, others to design, that consumed a great part of the city. The republic spared no pains to discover the cause of this misfortune, but all their endeavours were to no purpose; the incendiaries, if any there were, could never be brought to justice [k].

About this time the Polani, and other inhabitants of Istria were committing several depredations and robberies on the high seas, which the republic thought it her duty to repress. Having for this purpose sent the duke's son, attended by Marino Gradonico, the fleet besieged Pola, and in a short time took it by storm, putting the chief pirates in irons, and pardoning the other inhabitants on their promising to send yearly to Venice two thousand weight of oil for the use of St. Mark's church [l]. Little besides happened under this doge, who employed himself chiefly in religious and ecclesiastical affairs, building churches, founding monasteries, removing the bodies of saints and martyrs, and other such acts of what was then denominated piety. f

Vitalis Michaeli, doge XXXVIII. A. D. 1156.

MOROSINI was succeeded by Vitalis Michaeli the second, a man of prudence, valour, and experience: he persuaded the republic to join France and England, in supporting the a claim of Alexander the third to the ſee of Rome, in oppoſition to Octavian, backed by the emperor Frederic. The emperor was incenſed at the proceedings of the republic, and gave orders to the ſtates bordering upon the Venetian dominions to make incurſions, to plunder, deſtroy, and lay waſte every place belonging to the Venetians[m]. In conſequence, a number of petty ſtates, who envied her greatneſs, joined in a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Venice. Verona, Padua, and Ferrara, each of which had before felt the weight of her arms, now combined to deſtroy the republic: they joined forces, and began with attacking the frontier towns; among the reſt La Mothe, a place of ſome conſideration, which they diſmantled, after plundering and making priſoners the inhabitants: a new enemy likewiſe ſtarted up. Ulric, biſhop of Aquileia, laying hold of the troubles of the ſtate, had raiſed an army b of Forlians and ſeized upon Grada, not with intention to keep it, but only to enrich and beautify his own cathedral with the ſpoi's of this ſee: however, the Venetians coming upon him, not only retook the plunder, but ſent the prelate and ſeveral of his inferior clergy priſoners to Venice[n].

It would ſeem, that the ſucceſs of this republic was become the object of envy and hatred of all the other powers; for Emanuel, emperor of Greece, uſed his utmoſt addreſs to embroil the Venetians with their ally William king of Sicily; but the ſenate kept clear of this ſnare, and made ſpirited anſwers to the emperor's ambaſſadors. This enraged Emanuel: he made it a pretence for declaring war againſt the Venetians, and ſeizing upon the cities of Spalatra, Trahu, and Raguſa[o]. Soon after he ſent ambaſſadors to the Venetians, to aſſure c them that his intention was not to detain thoſe places, which in the firſt heat of paſſion he had ſeized; that he had the greateſt affection for the republic, as well as gratitude for the many ſervices they had done his predeceſſors and the empire; that their merchants might trade without fear of moleſtation in all his ports; and that the Venetians might always rely upon his friendſhip, notwithſtanding the late differences. The Venetian merchants made themſelves happy with this inſtance of the emperor's generoſity; they fitted out large fleets, in order to repair the loſs ſuſtained by the late ſtop to their commerce; but they ſoon received the reward of their credulity: their ſhips no ſooner put into the ports of Greece than they were ſeized, the crews impriſoned, and the cargoes ſent to the emperor's warehouſes. A few who made their eſcape ſoon informed the republic of the perfidy of the Greek mond arch[p]. A ſpirit of revenge fired every breaſt, and a fleet was equipped to retaliate the injury, and puniſh the treachery: this naval armament conſiſted of an hundred gallies and twenty ſhips of war, well manned and victualled, who were ſoon joined by twenty ſhips and gallies from Iſtria and Dalmatia, the whole commanded by the doge in perſon. His firſt exploit was againſt Trahu, which he beſieged, took, and demoliſhed, in order to ſtrike terror into the other towns that had thrown off the Venetian yoke, and acknowleged the dominion of Emanuel. Having ſubdued the rebellious cities of Dalmatia, he ſet ſail for Negropont: as he was preparing to enter upon hoſtilities, the governor demanded a truce; a conference enſued, in which the governor aſſured him that the emperor would prefer a diſadvantageous peace to a ſucceſsful war[q]: but his intention was only to gain time, as appeared e by the reſult. The biſhop of Equiline, and Manaſſes Bodoairio, were diſpatched to Emanuel, from whom they could obtain nothing but fair ſpeeches and ſpecious promiſes, upon which they could have no dependance after the late violation of the moſt ſolemn oaths: ſometimes he would approve of their demands; again he would refer them to his council; then he would ſend ambaſſadors to Vitalis, with different terms: in ſhort, it was obvious that he intended nothing more than to protract the time; the biſhop and Bodoairio, therefore, took their leave and returned to the doge, whom they found at Chios, which iſland he had reduced during their abſence[r]. The emperor's intrigues ſucceeded ſo well, that the ſeaſon was ſpent in negociations, which terminated where they began: the doge, therefore, reſolved to winter at Chios, in order to be ready the following campaign; but a contagious diſtemper appearf ing among his troops, carried them off in great numbers. The report was, that the ſprings and wells in the iſland had been poiſoned by the emperor's order; and indeed ſo violent was the diſorder, and ſo great the havock among the troops, that there ſeemed room for ſuſpicion[s].

The doge perceiving the contagion to encreaſe among his men, thought proper to return home; by which means the infection was received, and ſoon ſpread over Venice, ſweeping off daily incredible numbers of all ages, ſexes, and degrees. The people began to murmur and complain of the doge's conduct, which they aſcribed to deſign and treachery, rather than imprudence or inattention[t]. This was the temper of the city when the great council met: here it broke out with the utmoſt violence; nothing but upbraidings and revilings could be heard: the prince was called a monſter, traitor, and parricide; a wretch that had ſold his country to the blackeſt and moſt perfidious of all enemies, and who had even dipt his hands in the blood of that people he was bound by every law, human and divine, to protect. He was not permitted to make his defence; they ſuppoſed him guilty, and the cleareſt proofs and ſtrongeſt conviction could not alter their ſentiments, In ſhort, he fell a ſacrifice to the ſtrong paſſions, furious zeal, and blind prejudices of an incenſed multitude: his body was inſtantly mangled and torn in pieces, his name ſtigmatized with infamy, his houſe razed to the ground, and his innocent family baniſhed the city [u]. Thus, by an extraordinary fatality, periſhed Vitalis Michaeli, after he had governed for the ſpace of ſeventeen years, with moderation, prudence, courage, and conduct. His misfortunes would ſeem to ariſe from his own intregity and the treachery of his enemy. a

VITALIS was ſcarcely dead when the paſſions of the people ſubſided from rage into compaſſion; from reſentment into pity [w]. The edict which had baniſhed his family was revoked, and the favours which he was incapable of receiving liberally conferred on his wife, children, and domeſtics. Upon this occaſion was erected the ſeignory, or council of ten, to take cognizance of all tumults, riots, ſeditions, high crimes, and miſdemeanours [x]. b

SEBASTIANO ZIANI, Doge XXXIX.

A. D. 1173. Sebaſtiano Ziani, doge XXXIX.

SEBASTIANO ZIANI, the ſucceeding doge, was no ſooner elected than he was involved in a war with Frederic Barbaroſſa. Pope Alexander had taken ſanctuary in Venice, to avoid the perſecution of Barbaroſſa, who had profeſſed an implacable hatred to him, for having refuſed to ſtand by the judgment the emperor gave in favour of Octavian his rival. The Venetians diſpatched ambaſſadors to the emperor, who anſwered them in a rage, "Go and tell "your prince and people, that Frederic the Roman emperor demands his enemy, who is pro- "tected by them. If they ſend him not inſtantly, bound hand and foot, he will overturn every "law, human and divine, to accompliſh his revenge: he will bring his army before their "city, and fix his victorious ſtandards in the market-place, which ſhall float in the blood "of its citizens [y]." The ambaſſadors returning with this terrible menace, it was agreed to equip a fleet with all expedition, and prepare for repelling the emperor's meditated vengeance. While the Venetians were thus employed, Otho, the emperor's ſon, entered the gulph with a ſtrong ſquadron of ſeventy-five gallies, and was making ſail to the city. The doge reſolved to oppoſe him with the few ſhips which were fit to put to ſea: the fleets met off the coaſt of Iſtria, and a dreadful battle enſued, the event of which was, that the doge conquered his enemy, took, ſunk, and deſtroyed forty-eight of his ſhips, and returned in triumph to Venice. From this time was continued the ceremony of marrying the ſea: the pope going out to meet the victorious doge, preſented him with a ring, ſaying, "Take, Ziani, this "ring, and give it to the ſea, as a teſtimony of your dominion over it. Let your ſucceſſors "annually perform the ſame ceremony, that poſterity may know your valour has pur- "chaſed this prerogative, and ſubjected this element to you even as a huſband ſubjecteth "his wife [z]." c d

OTHO was taken priſoner in this battle; but he was permitted, on his parole, to viſit the imperial court of his father. This young prince had conceived the higheſt friendſhip for the republic, and eſteem for Ziani: he determined to ſerve them, by putting an end to a war which the ſtates could not long ſupport againſt the power of the emperor. On his arrival at court, he urged ſuch arguments as not only prevailed on Barbaroſſa to conclude peace with the republic, but to viſit a city ſo famed for commerce and naval power. His arrival at Venice was equally unexpected and agreeable: he was treated with all poſſible reſpect; and on his departure attended to Ancona by the doge, the whole ſenate, and body of nobility. At Venice he was reconciled to the pope, both agreeing to confer the higheſt honours and privileges on the doge and the republic. It was ſoon after this event that Ziani, on account of his age, reſigned the ducal diadem, retiring to ſpend his life in a monaſtery, after he had governed the republic with great reputation, ſpirit, prudence, and juſtice, for the ſpace of eight years (A). e f

He ſettled this endowment with a ſimplicity, modeſty, and reſerve becoming the true nature of charitable inſtitutions: here was no pomp, parade, or oſtentation; every thing was conducted with the utmoſt delicacy and ſecrecy; nor was the perſon relieved hurt by the manner of conferring the obligation. a ORIO MASTROPIETRO, Doge XL.

ORIO MASTROPIETRO was now raiſed to the ducal dignity. Sabellicus relates, that a council of four perſons was appointed to chuſe another council of forty, in which ſhould reſide the power of electing a doge; but no other hiſtorian takes notice of this regulation: it is probable therefore that Sabellicus means by this council the firſt riſe of the pregadi, or ſenate, or of the forty judges in criminal caſes; for we do not find one inſtance in hiſtory where a general aſſembly of the nobility was not called at the death or reſignation of a doge. Orio Maſtropietro, doge XL. Origin of the pregadi, or ſenate.

MASTROPIETRO was no ſooner fixed in the ſovereign authority than he ſtruck up a treaty with the Piſans, and ſettled all the differences between the ſtates, that he might be at b liberty to puniſh the treacherous city of Zara, which had a fourth time revolted, and received a Hungarian garriſon [a]. The inhabitants of this place had, at different times, put the republic to great charges to keep them in obedience; ſhe was now therefore determined to give them a deciſive blow: for this purpoſe a ſtrong ſquadron was equipped, many of the citizens contributing out of their private fortunes to the expence, and embarking themſelves in the expedition. The fleet ſoon arrived upon the coaſt of Dalmatia, reduced all the rebellious iſlands, and was preparing to lay ſiege to Zara, when the pope's nuncio arrived [b]. His buſineſs was to requeſt the Venetians to defer the puniſhment of the Zaratins, that they might once more be at liberty to embark in the holy war, and aſſiſt in ſtemming the conqueſts of Saladine, which, like a torrent, overwhelmed Syria and Paleſtine. The pope demands a fleet to be ſent to Syria.

c THE Venetians, unwilling to be wanting either in reſpect to his holineſs, or zeal for the church, raiſed the ſiege, and returned to Venice with the fleet, to victual it for a longer voyage, and receive a reinforcement of men and ſhips. The expedition uſed was ſo great, A. D. 1188. that, in conjunction with the Piſan fleet, they were beſieging Acon long before the arrival of the other Chriſtian princes; which city, after a tedious and bloody ſiege, they ſubdued. The fleet was ſcarce arrived when the doge reſigned his authority, having reigned fourteen years; during which he maintained that character of wiſdom, integrity, and virtue, for which he had been diſtinguiſhed in a private ſtation [c]. HENRICO DANDOLO, Doge XLI.

d THE aſſembly met (the council of forty, ſays Sabellicus) for the election of a new doge, A. D. 1192. when their choice fell upon Henrico Dandolo, under whom the republic arrived at a high Henrico Dandolo, doge XLI. pitch of reputation, power, and grandeur. The Piſans, who envied the riſing dignity of Venice, ſeized every occaſion of coming to a rupture. While they jointly carried on the ſiege of Acon, numberleſs little feuds, jealouſies, and differences had ariſen among the ſoldiers. The Piſan fleet returning home from Syria, ſurpriſed, took, and plundered the city Pola, then tributary to the Venetians, leaving in it a garriſon. The republic, not caring to put up with an affront ſo flagrant, fitted out ſix ſhips of war and ſix gallies, which were immediately ſent to retake Pola: in this they not only ſucceeded, but in the deſtruction of a great number of Piſan ſhips lying in the harbour [d]. Soon after the Venetians intercepted, ſunk, War with the Piſans.

e took, and deſtroyed a rich homeward-bound Turkey fleet. About this time it was the doge A. D. 1193. prohibited the merchants of Verona to enter the ports of the Venetian dominions, or to carry on any kind of trade, intercourſe, or commerce, with the republic. The Veroneſe had plundered ſome Venetian traders in the river Adice; and though the violence received no countenance from the government, yet as no compenſation was made to the ſufferers, the doge thought this breach of the law of nations deſerved to be reſented. His ſpirited conduct ſoon brought the Veroneſe to make acknowlegements and ſatisfaction for the injury done; upon which their merchants were reſtored to their uſual immunities [e]. Trade with Verona prohibited.

THE republic at the ſame time ſent a ſtrong ſquadron againſt the combined fleets of Piſa and Brunduſium. It was commanded by Giovanni Baſilio, and Thomaſo Phalerio, two off ficers of experience and valour: they ſoon humbled the pride of the confederates, having not only deſtroyed all their ſhipping at ſea, but ſtruck terror into the whole coaſt of Brunduſium, and even into the city. The Brunduſians made a ſeparate peace, which ſoon reduced the Piſans, unable to carry on the war alone, to the neceſſity of accepting ſuch terms as the republic choſe to impoſe [f]. Peace with the Piſans.

trians. So heartily did the republic engage in this enterprize, that the doge, notwithſtanding a defect in his ſight almoſt to blindneſs, embarked with a choice body of troops [g]. The enemy, confounded with ſo formidable an armament, ſent to demand peace upon any terms, and to acknowlege the ſovereignty of the republic: the revolted cities likewiſe returned to their duty, Zara alone remaining obſtinate: this place, therefore, the fleet attacked, though the city was defended by ſtrong walls and a numerous Hungarian garriſon, well provided. In the end, the perſeverance of the beſieged was forced to yield to the bravery of the Venetians; the city was diſmantled, deprived of its privileges, the Hungarians made priſoners, and many of the principal inhabitants put to death [h].

THE ſeaſon in the mean while was ſpent without any thing effected for the relief of the old emperor, the original purport of the treaty. The princes propoſed wintering in Dalmatia, and deferring the expedition to Greece until the following ſummer: but their intention was altered by the tears, intreaty, and eloquence of young Alexis: he pathetically lamented his father's blindneſs, impriſonment, ſlavery, and his own baniſhment, by the cruelty of his uncle: he called upon the friendſhip his father inviolably preſerved for the republic; their faith, alliance, and compaſſion. His eloquence was ſo moving, his judgment ſo ripe, and his promiſes ſo large, that the princes determined upon affording him immediate aſſiſtance, and accordingly ſailed for Greece. Conſtantinople was inveſted and taken, the uſurper forced to fly, the old Alexis reſtored, and tranquility ſeemingly eſtabliſhed: but Alexis ſoon dying, his ſon was elected in his room, who was a few days after depoſed and murdered by his own ſubjects, Myrtillus, a man of obſcure birth, raiſed by the favour of old Alexis, aſſuming the imperial dignity [i]. The French and Venetians were encamped without the city. Myrtillus's firſt care, therefore, was to drive them out of his dominions: for this purpoſe he attempted to ſurprize the camp; but being repulſed, ſhut himſelf up in Conſtantinople, determined to ſtand a ſiege. The allies aſſaulted it with ſo much vigour, ſpirit, and intrepidity, that the uſurper, unable to withſtand them, made his eſcape, leaving the city to the mercy of the conquerors: however, the citizens defended it for ſome time after his flight; but, after a ſiege of eighty days, were forced to ſurrender.

Conſtantinople taken by the French and Venetians.

A. D. 1203.

UPON this Baldwin was elected emperor, and all the chief offices of the empire filled up with Venetians, as a recompence for their ſervices: Thomaſo Moroſini, in particular, was appointed patriarch of Conſtantinople, the doge protoſpater, and many other favours were conferred upon the republic [k]. The allies entered Thrace early in the ſpring, and ſubdued it; then followed the conqueſt of Candia, and other iſlands in the Archipelago, which were given to the Venetians: in ſhort, before the end of the campaign, the whole empire was ſubjected to Baldwin, and very conſiderable acquiſitions made by the republic.

Baldwin made emperor.

DURING this expedition to Greece, the Zaratines again revolted, made inroads and incurſions into the Venetian territories, drawing off ſeveral other cities from their allegiance. Rayniero Dandolo, the doge's ſon, was ſent with a fleet againſt them: after divers battles and ſieges they were conquered. Dandolo took ſeveral children of diſtinction as hoſtages, raiſed a heavy contribution, and obliged them to pay a yearly tribute to the republic. About the ſame time the doge and his ſon returned to Venice, loaded with rich booty, and dignified by laurels and victories [l]. Old Dandolo ſoon after died, having acquired the reputation of a wiſe, active, and brave prince: he raiſed the republic to a degree of ſplendor and conſequence to which it had never before arrived, and laid the foundation of that greatneſs to which the Venetians ſoon attained [m]. He was ſucceeded by Pietro Ziani, ſon to the doge of that name.

PIETRO ZIANI, Doge XLII.

A. D. 1205. Pietro Ziani, doge XLII.

IN the beginning of Ziani's government ambaſſadors came from Conſtantinople to ſolicit the doge and ſenate, that the Venetians reſiding in Greece might be allowed to chuſe a prætor, ſubordinate to the republic, but with a ſupreme power over the Venetians reſiding upon the Eaſtern continent. The ſubjects of the republic were ſo numerous and powerful in Conſtantinople, and all the other parts of the empire, that it was thought neceſſary to grant their requeſt, finding it would be inconvenient either to ſubject them to the laws of the empire, or remit every judicial caſe to Venice. In order to form a chain of territory, they were permitted to conquer all the iſlands of the Archipelago, which had not yet acknowleged the ſovereignty of the republic, and to include them in their own juriſdiction, under certain limitations and reſtrictions. For this purpoſe the Greek Venetians fitted out a fleet, every man of a certain property ſupporting the expence of one or more ſhips, and reaping a proportionable ſhare of the conqueſts. They ſoon reduced Naxos, Pharos, Molos, Herma, and Andros, with ſeveral other iſlands; afterwards they attacked and took Negropont, Euripa, Tenos, Micona, Sciros, Philocotion, and Lemnos, leaving colonies in each [n].

a WHILST private adventurers were acquiring wealth, and extending the dominion of the republic, the doge and great fleet were not idle. He was scarce got out of the gulph when he met with Leo Vitrano, a famous Genoese pirate, who had infested the seas, making plunder of ships of whatever nation fell in his way: him the doge fought, defeated, carried prisoner to Corfu, where he was hanged in terrorem. After recovering Corfu, he directed his course first to Modona, and then to Corona, two cities famous for harbouring robbers, thieves, and pirates: these he entirely demolished, rooting out the infernal nest [o]. Leo Vitrano put to death.

SOON after another small squadron of the republic fell in with the grand Genoese fleet, at that time scouring the seas, and committing depredations unbecoming a civilized state and regularly planned government. Giovanni Trevisano, who commanded the Venetian fleet, b consisting of nine gallies, attacked the Genoese, and, after a bloody and obstinate engagement, obliged them to sheer off, with the loss of twelve of their ships [p]. A. D. 1206. Genoese defeated.

THE following year a dissention arose with the Paduans, at certain games instituted by the Trevisans, to which the gentry of all the neighbouring states assembled: the quarrel, which arose from a trifling accident, soon produced serious consequences, and ended in a war, in which the Paduans were worsted, and obliged to sue for peace. This the Venetians granted at the interceſſion of the patriarch of Aquileia; but it was of short duration: for another war soon broke out, which terminated equally to the ignominy of the Paduans and the glory of the Venetians [q].

THE island of Candia became now a bone of contention between the rival republics of c Venice and Genoa. It had not been well settled under the Venetian government, when the Genoese, envying the prosperity of their sister commonwealth, began to excite the Candians to revolt, and shake off the dominion of the republic: to this the Greeks were well disposed; and, upon the promise of powerful succours from Genoa, some of their chief men appeared in arms. They began with attacking the forts defended by Venetian garrisons, forming magazines, and equipping a fleet: but, tho' the rebels were powerfully supported, they could not long withstand the force of the Venetians, the island was wholly subdued, and divided among the nobility, on condition that they should maintain it at their own expence, acknowlege the sovereignty of the mother country, pay a yearly tribute, and, when called upon, fit out a certain number of ships to join the Venetian admiral [r]. First war in Candia. A. D. 1207.

d THIS tranquility did not last long; for the Venetian governor was murdered, and the very person he had called in to his assistance, gone over to the rebels, and now at the head of their forces: his name was Marco Sanuto, a man of considerable property in the neighbouring islands. His intention was no less than to become sovereign of Candia, independent of his country; though Sabellicus says, that he carried his rebellion no farther than the death of the governor, his inveterate enemy, which seems improbable from the continuance of the war longer. After various marches, counter-marches, feints, skirmishes, and sieges on both sides, at last Gritti, the Venetian general, was surprised and defeated by the rebels: he made his escape from the battle, and died a few days after of grief and shame, for having been vanquished by a handful of irregular undisciplined militia [s]. Second war in Candia. A. D. 1209.

e THE engagement produced a truce, and that a treaty, which lasted during the dogeship of Ziani, who resigned his authority, after having governed for twenty-four years. Ziani's character differed widely from that of his father, who defeated Otho: he was reserved and close in his conversation; parsimonious, and even penurious in his conduct; cautious to timidity in his disposition, at a time when the republic required spirit and intrepidity in her prince: yet he died with the reputation of a good, mild, and even successful governor, tho' we find the state engaged in quelling rebellions, composing tumults, and quieting civil broils for the greater part of his administration [t].

f JIACOMO THIEPOLO, governor of Candia, was elected doge in his room: he gave his first attention to the affairs of this island, where new insurrections appeared. The disaffected Greeks, not thinking themselves able to cope with the republic, sent to John Vattasus, governor of Lesbos, proprietor of considerable territories on the continent, and of several islands in the Archipelago, offering him the dominion of Candia, if he would expel the Venetians. Vattasus, induced by those promises, arrived at Candia with thirty gallies, and a considerable body of forces: he besieged two or three towns, which he took after an obstinate defence, and great slaughter of his troops. He was preparing to sit down before the capital, when Gradonico, the governor, surprised his camp, and forced him to retreat with precipitation. Finding greater difficulties in the conquest of the island than the rebels had represented, he resolved to abandon the enterprize, and leave them to the punishment of their rashness. on this the chiefs of the malcontents ſent propoſals to Gradonico, which being accepted, a they returned to their allegiance: one of the conditions was, that they ſhould pay yearly five hundred pounds weight of fine wax for the uſe of St. Mark's church [u].

GRADONICO dying, the provedatori took upon them the government, until another governor ſhould be appointed: his death produced another rebellion, fomented by Vattaſus, and ſupported by a fleet he ſent with ammunition, ſtores, and a body of troops. The rebels had not made any conſiderable progreſs when the new governor arrived, and reſolved to give them battle before their numbers were encreaſed. He landed his troops at ſome diſtance from the enemy's camp, with directions to attack it as ſoon as they perceived his fleet engaged, thus propoſing to make the action general and deciſive. After they had fought all day, the governor, having received a wound, ordered a retreat to be ſounded, that his troops b might return next morning with freſh vigour to the charge; but the rebels, and Vattaſus's admiral, not caring to engage a ſecond time, with troops who had ſhewn a reſolution of either conquering or dying, removed before day-light to a more advantageous ſtation, in order to make propoſals of accommodation. The terms offered were accepted conditionally, that they either ſurrendered or put to death Emanuel Dracentopolus, and his brother Conſtantine, two perſons of the firſt rank in the iſland, and the promoters of the rebellion [w].

Revolt of Candia.

VATTASUS, and ſome other neighbouring princes, having entered into an alliance againſt the Eaſtern empire, at that time in a declining condition, John king of Jeruſalem, governor of Conſtantinople, applied for aſſiſtance to the Venetians, by means of their prætor, or conſul, at Conſtantinople. Zeno the prætor gave immediate notice to the doge and council of the c danger with which the empire was threatened, of its weak ſituation, the low condition of its finances, the power of the enemy, and the dependance it had upon the republic for protection and ſhelter againſt the impending ſtorm. Orders for levying an army, and equipping a fleet, were immediately iſſued; but, in deſpite of the expedition uſed, the enemy were before the walls of Conſtantinople, laying cloſe ſiege, before the arrival of the Venetians. Leonardo Quirini, and Marco Guſſoni, captain-general and admiral of the Venetian armament, made all the ſail poſſible to ſuccour the city: their arrival was ſeaſonable, the beſieged were reduced to the laſt extremity. The ſignal was given for attacking the enemy's fleet, and executed with ſuch courage and conduct, that in a few hours it was totally defeated, with a prodigious loſs and ſlaughter: then the victorious Venetians entered the city, where they d were received with the utmoſt joy and gladneſs: the ſpirits of the citizens were raiſed, and the utmoſt confidence inſpired into every breaſt. Their ſtay was but ſhort; for as ſoon as the troops, had refreſhed themſelves, they were ordered to embark and return to Venice (A).

A. D. 1234. Conſtantinople beſieged.

POPE Gregory was at this time oppreſſed by Frederic, who committed the moſt ſhocking and inhuman barbarities in the eccleſiaſtical territories: he requeſted aſſiſtance of the Venetians againſt that mercileſs tyrant, and had a fleet, conſiſting of forty ſail, and a body of troops ſent to his aſſiſtance, under the ſame Quirini and Guſſoni. Before they ſailed news arrived that the doge's ſon, who ſerved in the pope's army, was taken priſoner and put to death by Frederic. This inflamed the troops with a violent deſire of revenge: however, no general action happened, until the Genoeſe demanded their aſſiſtance againſt Frederic and the e Piſans, who had an hundred gallies at ſea [x].

Treaty with the Genoeſe.

THE alliance of the two republics was brought about by pope Gregory the ninth, who was ſenſible that he could not keep too ſtrict an union among the Italian powers, to ſtrengthen him againſt his ſworn enemy the emperor. In this treaty it was ſtipulated, that neither republic ſhould form an alliance, declare war, or furniſh aid or ſupport to any other power whatever, without conſent of the contracting parties; and that the whole force and power of either ſhould be ready to aſſiſt and ſuccour which ever of the parties was attacked. Excommunications and dreadful anathemas were thundered by the pope againſt the breach of this league, ſo uſeful to the ſupport of the holy ſee againſt the emperor [y]. The Venetian fleet was immediately diſpatched to the ſuccour of their allies; but ſoon recalled to the re- f lief of Conſtantinople, beſieged a ſecond time by Vattaſus: before their arrival the ſiege was raiſed, and the enemy defeated by a brisk ſally which Giovanni the prætor made at the head of the Venetian inhabitants. The fleet then returned to join the Genoeſe; but neither were hearty in the alliance: a jealouſy and rivalſhip reigned between thoſe proud republics, which ſoon afterwards terminated in a bloody war, in ſpite of the pope's endeavours to maintain the alliance. Their feuds prevented any thing being carried on with vigour againſt the Piſans: however, the junction of the fleets had this good effect, that neither the Piſans nor a the emperor durſt attempt an attack upon ſo formidable an armament. While Jiacomo was carrying on the war on the continent againſt the emperor's lieutenant, Padua had been cruelly enſlaved by the imperialiſts, who committed the moſt inhuman barbarities wherever they paſſed. The Venetian did all in his power to bring them to a general action; but for ſeveral campaigns nothing happened beſides plundering, burning, and deſtroying towns and villages: at laſt the doge died before a deciſive ſtroke was ſtruck; and the breach with the Genoeſe grew ſo wide, that the Venetians found it neceſſary to drop the pope's quarrel, to attend to their own affairs [z]. A. D. 1249.

SANSOVINO mentions an inſcription upon his tomb, which would ſeem to point out ſome reformation of the laws, and change of the conſtitution under him (B): but no other b writer countenances this ſuggeſtion. Hiſtory indeed is ſilent as to the conduct of Thiepolo; yet we may collect that he was a mild, good, and pacific prince, though the numerous and extended connections of the republic engaged her in frequent wars during his adminiſtration.

MARINO MOROSINI, Doge XLIV.

MARINO MOROSINI was the next doge elected: his government was ſhort, but warlike. This year Philippo Fontano, biſhop of Ravenna, came to Venice in quality of legate from pope Alexander, preaching up eternal felicity to thoſe who would take arms againſt the emperor's lieutenant in Italy [a]. An implicit faith in the pope's word compoſed the religion of thoſe times; we need not therefore doubt of the legate's ſucceſs in raiſing recruits by means of ſo c large a premium. Many of the nobility and chief citizens entered into the legate's ſervice, who was no leſs a temporal than a ſpiritual ſoldier: the republic furniſhed Fontano not only with troops, but with arms, money, and proviſions; ſo careful were the Venetians of their ſalvation. The legate was pretty ſucceſsful againſt the emperor's lieutenant; he took Padua, and ſeveral other cities, when his army was greatly weakened by the departure of the Venetians, recalled on account of the war which had now broke out with great fury with the Genoeſe [b]. Marino Moroſini, doge XLIV.

RELIGION likewiſe was the cauſe of this rupture, and of much bloodſhed. The Venetians and Genoeſe both pretended an excluſive right to a certain church in the city of Acon, taken from the Saracens; the former founded their claim upon the compact with Baldwin, d the latter on the deciſion of Philip of Montfort, governor of the city: both were obſtinate, and the diſpute ſoon came to blows. It was now to be finally decided by the ſword: the pope laboured all in his power to reconcile them; but their animoſity was carried ſo high, that nothing but the ruin of one of the parties could prove ſatisfactory. They entered upon hoſtilities with that rancour, virulence, and malice, peculiar to all wars carried on upon account of religion. The fleets met near Ptolemais; both were powerful, and they engaged with great fury: the battle was bloody and long, until by a ſtroke of military ſkill in the Venetian admiral, the Genoeſe were broke and diſperſed, many of their ſhips, and about two thouſand priſoners taken. Nor did this victory ſatiate the revenge of the Venetians; they expelled all the Genoeſe from Acon, demoliſhed their houſes and churches, leaving not the e ſmalleſt veſtige remaining of their having ever inhabited the city: they likewiſe employed as ſlaves in their gallies all the priſoners taken in the late battle, nor could the influence of the pope procure their releaſe, until he began to thunder out dreadful maledictions. This war is mentioned by Sabellicus under the dogeſhip of Moroſini; but Sanſovino and Blondus place it under his ſucceſſor. It is probable that as Moroſini's ſway was ſhort, that it might have begun with him, and continued during the firſt years of Zeno: certain it is, that Moroſini died ſoon after the departure of the legate Fontano from Venice; but whether before or after this engagement in Syria, we cannot poſitively affirm. All authors allow that he governed between three and four years; that the republic was happy and flouriſhing under A. D. 1252. him; that he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his private capacity, when a young man, no leſs f in the field, than he did afterwards in his old age, in the cabinet; and that the qualities of his head could only be ſurpaſſed by thoſe of his heart. War with Genoa. Genoeſe defeated.

RINIERO ZENO, Doge XLV.

AT the acceſſion of Riniero Zeno, elected ſucceſſor to Moroſini, the republic ſent Gilberto Dandolo with a ſquadron of thirty gallies to Greece: he ſoon had the good fortune to fall in with the combined fleets of Greece and Genoa, which he attacked with ſo much reſolution, that the Greeks ſoon gave way, and the Genoeſe being left alone, ſurrendered, few or none of them having been able to eſcape [c]. They however, ſoon replaced this loſs by another ſquadron, more powerful than the former, and the Venetian admiral had likewiſe received an Riniero Zeno, doge XLV.

addition of fifteen gallies: the Genoeſe, commanded by the famous Michael Doria, ſought out the Venetian admiral Dandolo, who was no leſs eager to come to an engagement. They ſoon met, and a battle was fought with the utmoſt reſolution, conduct, and obſtinacy: hatred, revenge, and glory animated both; a rivalſhip ſubſiſted between the commanders as well as the ſtates. The honour of each country depending upon the ability and courage of thoſe two admirals, nothing was omitted, nothing left undone, which great and skilful officers ought to direct, or ſoldiers perform: but fortune did not ſecond the great qualities and merit of Doria. After one of the bloodieſt actions related in hiſtory, his line was broke, but not his courage: he continued to defend himſelf with infinite intrepidity after the greateſt part of his fleet was taken, ſunk, or burnt: at laſt, overpowered with numbers, he fell into the hands of the Venetians, which gave them juſter cauſe of triumph than all their other conqueſts. This victory coſt the republic many of her beſt officers, with an incredible number of private men; but the public joy at having humbled a proud rival, ſuppreſſed all reflections on the loſs ſuſtained. It was the firſt fair trial of valour and skill the two republics had ever made, the event of which gave the Venetians that ſuperiority at ſea which they maintained for a ſeries of years. The conduct of the admirals was no leſs to be admired after than during the battle: the one bore his adverſity with that greatneſs of ſoul, that invincible ſpirit and reſolution, which made even the enemy acknowlege he deſerved victory: the other, his proſperity with a moderation, calmneſs, and generoſity, which obliged Doria to confeſs that he ought to conquer: in ſhort, thoſe two great men, who were inveterate enemies before fortune had declared herſelf, became the warmeſt friends as ſoon as their almoſt equal merit had proved to each how deſerving he was of the other's eſteem [d].

PALEOLOGUS imagining that the Genoeſe would not be able to recover this ſevere blow at Trepani, ſtruck up a ſeparate peace with the Venetians; like a true politician he regarded his own intereſt only, holding as nothing the moſt ſolemn treaties and engagements [e].

ALTHOUGH the war was conducted with great prudence, conduct, and ſucceſs, yet the people murmured: the vaſt fleets and armies became inſupportable; every thing was taxed high, even the neceſſaries of life; trade was at a ſtand, and induſtry entirely ſuppreſſed, on account of the number of citizens employed in the public ſervice, as well as the high price of proviſions and ſcarcity of money. The government finding it neceſſary to reinforce Dandolo with troops and ſhips to oppoſe a new fleet, equipped by the Genoeſe, had recourſe to a new tax upon the markets, which ſo incenſed the common people, that they aſſembled in a riotous manner about the palace, breathing vengeance againſt the doge and ſenate. Riniero Zeno thinking to awe them by his authority, or quiet them by his moderation, came out to harangue the people; but no ſooner had he appeared than the mob inſulted him with ſtones and dirt, and obliged him to retire: however, the nobility exerted themſelves with ſo much reſolution, vigour, and ſpirit, that the tumult was at laſt diſperſed, and the ringleaders impriſoned [f]. The impoſition was laid upon the markets, the reinforcement ſent to Dandolo, and the people ſoon ſatisfied of the neceſſity of this meaſure; for it had ſcarce joined the main fleet when they were attacked near Rhodes by the Genoeſe, impatient to revenge the late affront, and wipe off the diſgrace: but it was apparent that Doria did not command; the Genoeſe were broke and put in confuſion after the firſt charge, a complete victory was gained, and a great number of ſhips taken.

A. D. 1263. A ſedition in Venice.

The Genoeſe again defeated.

A SHORT time after Dandolo met with a fleet of the enemy's merchantmen returning home, richly laden; of theſe he made prize, ſending them home to Venice, to the great joy of the people, who now began to forget the oppreſſion with which they purchaſed ſo many victories, and ſo much glory [g]. Nor was the republic leſs ſucceſsful in Syria, from whence they had driven the Genoeſe, making themſelves maſters of Ptolemais, as well as of the ſea-coaſt: but Riniero did not long enjoy the fruits of theſe uninterrupted ſucceſſes; he was carried off by a ſudden illneſs, after governing the ſtate, with a rapid tide of proſperity for ſeventeen years. During his dogeſhip the republic attained to a very high pitch of power, conſequence, and reputation abroad, though not equally proſperous at home: the finances were low and exhauſted; induſtry and commerce gave way to martial atchievements, and public glory ſeemed to be eagerly deſired, while private œconomy and happineſs were univerſally neglected.

LORENZO THIEPOLO, Doge XLVI.

A. D. 1268. Lorenzo Thiepolo, doge XLVI.

ZENO was no ſooner dead than the council met for the election of a new doge, when a majority of voices declared for Lorenzo Thiepolo, ſon to doge Jiacomo [h]. The Chriſtians in Syria being in the utmoſt diſtreſs, and daily loſing ground to the infidels, the pope and the kings of France and Sicily offered their mediation to accommodate matters between the Vene-

a tians and Genoese: Clement the pope desired, that if a peace could not be settled, that at least the two republics would suspend their animosity, conclude a truce, and turn their arms against the Infidels. As Venice and Genoa were then the most powerful maritime states in Europe, it was not possible for the other potentates to make any progress in the holy war without their assistance. After the conferences had been twice broken off, at length a truce was concluded at the intercession of Philip king of France, who was bent upon sending assist- Peace with Genoa.
ance to the adventurers in Syria. Thus ended this war, after it had been carried on with the utmost heat, enmity, and rancour, for the space of eleven years.

But the Venetians had scarcely breathed after this war, when they found themselves engaged in another with some of their neighbours. An impost had been laid by the republic
b upon all merchandize and shipping passing between the gulph of Fana and the mouth of the Po: this the Venetians had done with a view of filling their exhausted treasury, and likewise out of pique to some of the bordering states, who had refused to send corn to the city during a late famine [i]. The Bolognians, who at that time possessed the extensive province of Romagnia, began to grumble at this proceeding as an infringement of their liberties, and a prejudice to their commerce. Not caring to declare war before they had made every necessary preparation, they raised troops, and equipped a fleet in the most secret manner. As soon as their armaments were in forwardness they sent ambassadors to Venice, to solicit at least a mitigation of the duty imposed upon the commerce passing through certain streights, with orders that in case of refusal they should immediately come away and denounce war [k].
c The doge, however, readily penetrated their intention, and to counterplot them, ordered a certain number of gallies to go and seize upon the mouth of the Po, a station of great importance. War with the Bolognians.

At last, after skirmishing for near two years, both armies came to a general engagement: the Venetians, commanded by Marco Gradonico, were inferior in number to the enemy; but that deficiency they compensated by discipline, courage, and a general: the battle was warm for the space it lasted; but the Venetians, pushing on with boldness, soon broke and routed the enemy, made great havock of the rear of the flying Bolognians, and took some thousands of prisoners, which obliged them to sue for peace [l]. Their proposals were accepted, on condition that they destroyed the fort erected at the mouth of the Po, made reparation for the damages they sustained by the war, and submitted to the impost. Bolognians defeated.

d For a series of years the Venetians had been engaged in continual wars, no intermission, no rest or breathing; whence we may justly infer, that the power of the republic had excited the jealousy of her neighbours. Peace was but just established with the Bolognians, when another little state, the inhabitants of Ancona, had taken arms against her, in order to open to themselves a free navigation. To preserve the appearance of moderation, they first sent ambassadors to the pope, requesting his mediation and interest with the Venetians to remit the late impost: the pope, glad to be thought of consequence, ordered the Venetians to send ambassadors to Viterbo, to hold a conference upon this subject. The ambassadors went, and managed the conference with so much address, that his holiness was entirely gained, and the complaints of the Anconitans left unredressed. So heartily did he espouse the republic, that e he procured the truce with Genoa to be prolonged for two years, to prevent her being embarrassed with two wars at the same time [m]. During these negociations Thiepolo died, after he had been doge about six years, and was succeeded by Jacomo Contarini. A. D. 12[illegible] Dispute with the Anconitans.

JACOMO CONTARINI, Doge XLVII.

The new doge was but just elected when an accident had almost broke the truce with Genoa: a Venetian merchantman was seized by two gallies belonging to the Genoese; and as it was not doubted but it was done by the orders of the government, the doge and the republic began to prepare for war; however, they resolved before hostilities commenced, to demand restitution by their envoy; and if this was refused, to retaliate. The envoy had no
f sooner presented his memorial, than the Genoese ordered the ship and cargo to be restored, and compensation to be made for the loss sustained by the detention, together with every thing else the Venetians required [n]. Jacomo Contarini, doge XLVII.

In the mean time some disturbances arose within the dominions of the republic. The Istrians, who had always been the most faithful of all the conquered provinces, were now suddenly in rebellion, and supported by the patriarch of Aquileia; but the patriarch and rebels were soon conquered by Andrea Bassejo the Venetian admiral, and reduced to their obedience. Istrians revolt.

The war with Ancona was for some time suppressed, but not extinguished. It now broke out with great violence: the Anconitans took the opportunity of the republic's being engaged in Istria, to redress their grievances, by committing violence on the Venetian shipping, and refusing to pay the duty required in the gulph of Fana [o]. was ſent by the doge to lay ſiege to Ancona: the Venetian admiral attacked the harbour; but being repulſed, the fleet was ſoon after diſperſed by a ſtorm, ſix gallies were loſt, and the reſt ſo damaged as to be unfit for ſervice until they were refitted. The Venetians, not diſpirited, ſent another fleet upon the ſame enterprize, which, by a ſtratagem of the enemy, proved equally unſucceſsful. Thus, in a ſhort ſpace, the Venetians had been twice defeated in their attempts, either by unforeſeen accidents or miſconduct: nothing, however, could make them lay aſide their deſign of humbling the Anconitans. Another fleet, more formidable than either of the former, was ordered to lay immediate ſiege to Ancona, which ſo terrified the inhabitants, that they diſpatched ſome of the chief citizens to pope Nicholas, juſt then elected, to requeſt his aſſiſtance againſt the oppreſſion of the Venetians [p]. At the ſame time the Venetian ambaſſadors came to Rome, to congratulate the pope upon his acceſſion, but were denied audience: the republic reſented the affront by recalling her ambaſſadors; but they had ſcarce quitted the city, when they were ſeized, and brought back by order of his holineſs, who again diſmiſſed them with a ſevere reprimand. The Venetians, however, paid very little regard to the pope's indignation; for the day after their ambaſſadors returned, a reinforcement was ſent to their fleet at Ancona, with expreſs orders to proceed in the ſiege with all poſſible vigour. When the Anconitans perceived that neither the pope's authority nor their own forces were ſufficient for their defence, they ſupplicated peace; which the republic obliged them to purchaſe at a very conſiderable price, to indemnify the expences of the war [q]. a b

GIOVANNI DANDOLO, Doge XLVIII. c

Giovanni Dandolo, doge XLVIII.

Two years after, the doge being unable, by reaſon of his great age, to attend public buſineſs reſigned his authority, and had for his ſucceſſor Giovanni Dandolo. The government of this prince began inauſpiciouſly, the city having been greatly damaged by the overflowing of the ſea, and a dreadful earthquake. A new war likewiſe broke out with the patriarch of Aquileia and the Iſtrians, which occaſioned a good deal of trouble to the Venetians: on the firſt arrival of the Venetian forces in Iſtria, the patriarch, finding himſelf too weak, and imagining it would be difficult to effect a junction with the Iſtrians, pretended to ſubmit upon the terms granted by the republic. Having thus deceived the Venetians, he ſoon found means to join count Goritian the Iſtrian general, and to draw over ſeveral cities which had hitherto remained firm in their duty: their numbers were in a little time encreaſed to an army of thirty thouſand men, a force which required all the vigour, caution, and ſtrength the republic was able to exert. A ſtrong armament was prepared with all poſſible diſpatch, which in a ſhort time beſieged Trieſte; but the vigour and numbers of the garriſon obliged the Venetians to relinquiſh the enterprize. d

A. D. 1280.

For the ſpace of two years hardly any thing, beſides fruitleſs attacks upon Trieſte, encampments, marches, and feints, occurred in Iſtria. The affairs of the republic in Syria ſucceeded little better; for Tyre, Sydon, and Baruth, were taken by the Infidels: not long after the Venetians were driven out of Acon, and all the chriſtians out of Syria. Dandolo was ſo affected with all theſe misfortunes, that he fell ſick, and died a ſacrifice to the public misfortunes, which, however, could not be charged to his miſconduct. e

A. D. 1286.

PIETRO GRADONICO, Doge XLIX.

Pietro Gradonico, doge XLIX.

Upon the death of Dandolo, Pietro Gradonico was promoted to the dogeſhip: in the beginning of his reign the republic put an end to the war with the patriarch and the Iſtrians, with a view of employing all her power againſt the Genoeſe. We are not told by Sanſovino, the only hiſtorian who mentions it, the particular terms of this peace, or whether the Iſtrians ſubmitted to the Venetian government: we imagine, therefore, that a truce only was agreed upon, ſince we find hoſtilities again renewed in Iſtria a few years after.

A. D. 1289.

The truce between the republics of Venice and Genoa being ſome time expired, neither made overtures it ſhould be renewed: the dominion of the ſea would ſeem to be the only cauſe of recommencing hoſtilities, ſince the city of Acon, the former bone of contention, was now out of the queſtion, both Venetians and Genoeſe being driven from thence by the Infidels. The Venetian fleet, conſiſting of ſixty gallies, commanded by Rogero Moroſini, firſt began to enter upon action: this admiral ſailed directly to Pera, a port much frequented by the Genoeſe merchants trading to Greece. This little fort he inveſted, took, and deſtroyed; afterwards doing the ſame to ſeveral ſmall ſettlements belonging to the enemy upon the ſame coaſts [r]. All this ſeaſon the Genoeſe conſumed in making preparations for the war, and in convoying their merchants to their different deſtinations. Early in the ſpring the Venetians ſent another ſquadron, under the command of Giovanni Souranza, to f a the city of Capha in the Cherſoneſe, which, after a tedious ſiege, he took and demoliſhed; but winter coming on before he could return, his fleet was blocked up by the froſt, and many of his crew periſhed with the cold and want of neceſſaries; a loſs which more than overbalanced the advantages ariſing from the plunder and deſtruction of Capha.

THE following year the Genoeſe fleet at length put to ſea, under Lampadio Doria, of the ſame family with the famous admiral of that name, conquered by Dandolo: it conſiſted of ſeventy gallies and ſhips of war, well manned and appointed, all fired with ſentiments of revenge, and determined to periſh or wipe away the diſgrace ſuſtained in the laſt great engagement. Doria ſteered his courſe to the gulph of Venice, with intention to lay ſiege to the city; but meeting the Venetian fleet, under Andrea Dandolo, at Corfu, an engage- A. b ment enſued: the battle commenced with great fury, and was for ſeveral hours maintained with equal courage, and without any apparent advantage. Nothing beſides the dreadful ſhouts of the combatants, the ſhrieks of the dying, or complaints of the wounded, could be heard; nothing ſeen but dead and mangled bodies, ſhips burning, ſinking or broke to pieces; thus the fight continued with prodigious ſlaughter; both puſhed on by hatred, encouraged by the hope of victory, and animated by the conduct and harangues of their admirals. At laſt the Venetians were defeated, if that can be called a defeat where ſcarce a number of the conquerors remained ſufficient to report the news of their victory: Dandolo was made priſoner, and not a ſhip belonging to the republic but was taken or deſtroyed. Sabellicus ſays, that four thouſand Venetians were made priſoners; but from the accounts of other hiſtorians
c not half that number remained alive on both ſides [s]. Andrea Dandolo was ſo much affected with the diſgrace of having yielded up that honour acquired in the laſt war, that in the agony of deſpair he daſhed out his brains againſt the ſide of the cabin where he was confined [t]: a conduct very different from Doria's, but equally indicative of greatneſs of mind, delicacy of ſentiment, and public ſpirit.

RICOALDO of Ferrara relates, that the miſconduct of thirty Venetian gallies, who kept A. D. 1292.
aloof, and ſlackened ſail during the engagement, occaſioned this defeat; and that upon returning home the chief officers met with that death in an ignominious way, which they ſo carefully avoided in a manner honourable to themſelves, and ſerviceable to their country. Certain it is, that the joy at Genoa for a victory ſo dearly purchaſed was not great, hardly d a family in the city having eſcaped the loſs of a father, ſon, or brother. The grief at Venice was ſtill greater; for to the loſs of their fleet and army, they had the additional affliction of having been vanquiſhed: however, the Venetians did not deſpond; they fitted out another fleet, no leſs powerful than the former, every man in the city chearfully contributing towards the expence. Part of this armament was kept for the defence of the city and commerce; another part, conſiſting of twenty-five gallies, under the conduct of Marco Baſſeio, was ſent to protect the iſlands and towns in the Ionian and Ægean ſeas [u]. Baſſeio ſoon fell in with the Genoeſe fleet, who, elated with their late victory, bore down and engaged him. The Venetians, though inferior in number, fought bravely for ſome time, but were at laſt defeated, with the loſs of ſixteen gallies.

e THOUGH this calamity was much leſs than the former, the affliction of the republic was augmented: already oppreſſed with ſhame and misfortune, freſh diſgrace would have proved intolerable, if the intrepidity of the doge, who alone appeared undaunted and reſolute, had not ſtemmed the torrent of deſpair [w].

ALTHOUGH the victorious Genoeſe triumphed along the coaſts, made deſcents upon ſeveral of the Venetian maritime towns, and even took, plundered, and deſtroyed Cidonia, a city in Candia, yet the doge was determined once more to try the fortune of the republic. Another fleet was fitted out, and ſeveral battles fought with various ſucceſs, until both ſides exhauſted, ſpent, and unable longer to continue ſo ruinous a war, laid down their arms by mutual conſent. The want of ability, not of inclination to proſecute their animoſity, ended A. D. 1294.
f a quarrel which had brought both the republics to the brink of ruin [x].

BUT this bloody war was not the only danger with which Venice was environed: ſeditions, tumults, and conſpiracies at home equally threatened her deſtruction. One Marino Buco- A conſpiracy.
nio, a man of no rank or power, but of a bold, enterpriſing, and ſeditious ſpirit, formed a deſign of murdering the doge, and ſeveral ſenators of the firſt merit and diſtinction: for this purpoſe he engaged a party of all the diſcontented, violent, factious, and deſperate men about the city. The plot was conducted with great ſecrecy and conduct; but juſt as it was ripe for execution, one of the conſpirators, from remorſe of conſcience, diſcovered it to the doge, who ordered Buconio to be ſeized and put to death: ſeveral of his accomplices ſhared the ſame fate, which ſtruck ſuch terror into the reſt, that they fled out of the city to avoid

THIS plot was hardly ſuppreſſed when another more dangerous, not only to the perſon a of the doge but to public liberty, was formed by Baimonti Thiepolo and others of the nobility: the ſcheme was laid to enter the palace, murder the doge, council, and ſenate; to aſſume the reins of authority; divide among the conſpirators the property and power of the deceaſed; and to rule with an arbitrary ſway, without reſtriction of oaths, or controul of councils and ſenates [z]. A multitude of the common people, either from the love of novelty, or the ſpeciouſneſs of their reaſoning, and force of money and promiſes, were gained. Upon the day fixed for the execution of their wicked purpoſe, ſecret notice of it was ſent by an unknown hand to the doge, who immediately communicated it to ſome of the ſenators in whom he could moſt confide. The ſenators were ſcarce aſſembled, with ſuch of their friends as the ſhort notice would ſuffer them to collect, when the conſpirators aſſaulted the b palace: the alarm inſtantly ſpread over the city, and brought every man attached to the conſtitution to the aſſiſtance of the doge and ſenate. In the mean time the conſpirators had filled the ſpacious market place of St. Mark's with their armed aſſociates. Here a furious battle began: on one ſide ſtood Baimonti and the conſpirators, endeavouring to deſtroy liberty, property, and the common rights of humanity; on the other, the doge and ſenate, bravely reſolved to periſh with their freedom. Gradonico animated his party by his ſpeech and example: they preſſed forward upon the conſpirators, who finding themſelves inferior in number, and diſappointed in their hopes of taking them unprepared, began to give way. Juſtiniano ſeaſonably coming up, with a freſh body of men he had collected together, attacked the conſpirators vigorouſly in the rear, broke them, and made prodigious ſlaughter [a]. c

A. D. 1299. Baimonti perceiving his party giving way, was the firſt to deſert, as he had been the foremoſt in promoting the villainous deſign: he endeavoured to eſcape, but was knocked down by a large ſtone a woman let fall upon his head from her window, and, before he could recover himſelf, was taken and cut in pieces by ſome of the doge's friends who purſued him: the reſt were almoſt all either taken or killed. The arms of Baimonti and his accomplices were erazed out of the public records, their houſes pulled down, eſtates confiſcated, and families for ever baniſhed the city and dominions of the republic. This happy delivery from oppreſſion, bondage, and death, is to this day yearly commemorated at Venice [b].

BUT the troubles of the republic did not end here; for the Zaratines, embracing the opportunity of her diſtreſſed condition, revolted and expelled Moroſini their governor. The d doge equipped a fleet to reduce them to obedience, but died before any progreſs was made in the war. The adminiſtration of this excellent prince was one of the moſt unfortunate to the republic: it was indeed the ambition and martial turn of the Venetians which had at this time occaſioned their misfortunes, not accident or miſconduct.

MORINI GEORGI, Doge L.

A. D. 1305. Morini Georgi, doge L.

MORINI GEORGI, ſurnamed Santo, or the Holy, was for his wiſdom appointed in the room of Gradonico. The ſenate wiſely preferred a governor of experience and prudence, to one poſſeſſed of more ſhining but leſs ſolid qualities; one whoſe age and temper would diſpoſe him to cultivate peace, induſtry, and commerce, which of late had been much neglect- e ed: but though Georgi's inclination led him to purſue pacific meaſures, the neceſſity of the ſtate obliged him to proſecute the war with the Zaratines.

BELETTO was ſent to Dalmatia in the laſt year of Gradonico's dogeſhip; but the ſummer was ſpent before the walls of Zara, and no memorable action performed. Georgi ſent

A. D. 1307. Dalmaſio, a Spaniard, with a thouſand horſe to ſupport Beletto, to cut off convoys, and ſcour the country; but the Zaratines found means to tamper with this officer: however, Zara, diſtreſſed for proviſions, ſurrendered upon gentle and eaſy conditions. Dalmaſio made his eſcape to Italy in a ſmall bark he had hired, to prevent falling into the hands of the Venetians, and was ſhipwrecked in his paſſage.

BEFORE the news of the ſurrender of the city arrived at Venice the doge died, after hav- f ing performed many acts of piety and charity, a year and eleven months after his election [c]. He was ſucceeded by Giovanni Souranza, choſen by the unanimous aſſent of the people.

GIOVANNI SOURANZA, Doge LI.

A. D. 1310. Giovanni Souranza, doge LI.

UNDER Souranza's dogeſhip a magiſtrate was appointed to preſide over trade and commerce: in few years the number was increaſed to three, which was the firſt riſe of a commercial board or council [d]. Nothing memorable happened during his government: ſome little diſputes indeed aroſe with the Genoeſe, but they were ſoon terminated without bloodſhed: a rebellion in Candia appeared, but was inſtantly ſuppreſſed; and the Paduans, by the aſſiſtance of the republic, were reſtored to their liberty, Maſtin, the tyrant, being driven g out of the city.

FRANCISCO DANDOLO, Doge LII.

a FRANCISCO DANDOLO became ſo popular by his ſubmiſſion to the pope in a late ambaſſy, in which he was mean enough to appeaſe the pontiff's reſentment by ſuffering himſelf to be chained down to the foot of his table, that he was unanimouſly elected in the room of the deceaſed prince; and indeed his firm conduct and reſolution in quality of doge, would ſeem to wipe off the diſgrace he incurred by his ſervile tameneſs when ambaſſador. Two Venetian merchantmen were taken about this time by the Genoeſe; but the doge being otherwiſe employed, deferred his vengeance to a more convenient opportunity [e]. Franciſco Dandolo, doge LII.

THIS year the infidels, not ſatisfied with having driven the Chriſtians out of Syria, moleſted the coaſts of Cyprus, Candia, and Rhodes, and ſo infeſted the ſeas, that there was no ſecurity for merchants to trade in the Levant. This induced the republic to enter into an al- A. D. 1330.
b liance with the pope and the French king, to repel the attempts of the Turks in Europe, and recover Syria. It was ſtipulated, that the republic ſhould ſupply a hundred ſhips of war and gallies, beſides tranſports and ſtore-ſhips; but the French failing in their engagement, this mighty enterprize ended with the treaty [f]. The Turks, taking advantage of the irreſolution of the Chriſtians, made themſelves maſters of the ſea, putting an entire ſtop to every kind of commerce, which obliged the Venetians to ſend a fleet againſt them for the protection of their trade and iſlands. Pietro Zeno was appointed admiral: he purſued the infidels with ſo much ſucceſs, that he not only drove them out of the Levant, but defrayed the A. charges of the expedition by the captures.

THE power of the people of Eſcalla, as hiſtorians call them, was become ſo great, that all
c the ſurrounding ſtates apprehended being over-run by that treacherous and ambitious people: beſides Verona, Vicenza, and Breſcia, which they poſſeſſed for ſome time, they had lately ſeized upon Parma, after having by fraud driven thence the family of the Roſſi. Treviſo likewiſe, according to Sabellicus, fell into their hands. About a century before they were no more than a ſingle family that had ſettled in Lombardy, which in time, by their ſtrong connexions, ambition, and intrigues, formed this powerful ſtate, that became an object of the jealouſy of all its neighbours [g]. Maſtin, the chief, thirſting to be revenged on the Venetians for driving him out of Padua, annoyed the commerce of the city. Thus the ſeeds of a war were laid, to prepare for which the Venetians raiſed forces, and made alliances
d with the Roſſi, and other princes of Italy, who dreaded and had ſuffered from the power of Maſtin. The Venetians never entered upon a war with greater alacrity: they really were not immediately concerned with Maſtin, having nothing to fear from him while they applied themſelves to commerce and maritime affairs: but they began early to give their attention to the ballance of power; a maxim in politics which has ſince proved the occaſion of numberleſs wars in Chriſtendom, and in no part of it more than in Italy.

THE league being concluded with the Italian ſtates, the doge and ſenate gave orders, that the name of every perſon in the city fit to bear arms ſhould be enrolled: the liſt A. D. 1335.
amounted to 80,000 [h] from twenty to ſixty years of age. Stimulated by an earneſt deſire to extinguiſh and root out tyranny, the action, ſays Blondus, was its own reward. Voluntiers
e flocked from France, Germany, and England, to ſerve in this war; inſomuch that the Venetians could have raiſed an army, which, with one blow, would have deſtroyed the tyrant; but it was not their policy to leave the event to the fate of one battle: they choſe to try the power and courage of their enemy firſt by ſlight ſkirmiſhes, both to accuſtom their troops to an enemy, and try their fortune. The republic choſe Pietro Roſſi, an implacable enemy to the tyrant Maſtin, to command their army. He was at this time cloſely beſieged by Maſtin in a little fort to which he eſcaped from Parma: but he ventured in diſguiſe through the enemy's camp, and arrived ſafe at Florence, where reſting but two days, his impatience to be in the field made him haſten, with a few troops of horſe, to the camp. The enemy, hearing of his arrival near Lucca, placed a ſtrong body in ambuſh to attack his rear, while he was
f oppoſed in front by another corps. Roſſi's rear was ſoon put into diſorder, and the troops gave all up for loſt, when he arrived ſeaſonably to animate, rally, and ſupport them: he was every where preſent, giving his directions with a compoſure that inſpired his own men with irreſiſtible courage, and wholly diſcomfited the enemy. They were defeated, and purſued to the gates of Lucca, a great number of priſoners made, and a carnage and ſlaughter, which aſtoniſhed even thoſe acquainted with his valour.

IN the mean while the Venetians were not idle: Gerrard Caminenſis had with a detachment ſeized upon the city of Uderza; upon information of which Maſtin marched againſt him, attacked the garriſon left by Gerrard, but was repulſed. Next day, however, he found means to draw the beſieged into an ambuſcade, which ſucceeding, the city fell into his hands.

ROSSI had ſcarce joined the army when the count of Colalta, with a ſtrong corps, deſerted a the enemy and came over to him; an example that was followed by the Forlians, ſome of the inhabitants of the Alps, and a great number of Germans [i]. Maſtin finding the ſtrength of the confederates, having experienced the valour of their leader, and knowing they were immediately to enter upon action, ſent ambaſſadors to Venice with terms of peace, which were rejected. Breaking up his camp he put ſtrong garriſons in Lucca and Padua, which laſt his brother Albert had taken by ſurprize, ſince the commencement of the war: then he ordered Thomaſino, governor of Meſtra, to tamper with the Venetians, as if he was willing to deliver up the town to them upon certain conditions. The ſum agreed upon was delivered, The treachery of Maſtin. and hoſtages given to Roſſi for the ſurrender of the town upon a certain day. Maſtin took care to diſpoſe a ſtrong body of horſe and foot in the city, in ſuch a manner as to be able b to ſeize upon the confederates as ſoon as they entered, which accordingly was executed, and about three hundred priſoners made [k]. Roſſi then immediately marched againſt the enemy, determined to revenge this treachery. Before he broke up his camp he made a ſhort ſpeech to the ſoldiers, informed them of the baſe arts of the enemy and the captivity of their comrades, aſſured them of victory, recommended ſtrict diſcipline and obedience to their officers, and laſtly reminded them that ſafety as well as honour depended upon courage. He was ad-viſed to beſiege Treviſo, but declared his firſt purpoſe was to fight the enemy; if they were defeated, towns might be taken at leiſure. The confederates arrived upon the banks of the river Brente before Albert, Maſtin's brother, had intelligence of their motions: his army was equal in number to theirs, and his camp fortified on the left by the town of Padua, on the c right by the marſhes and fenny grounds, and in front by the river; yet he did not care to hazard the event of a battle, but decamped with great precipitation and joined his brother [l].
Roſſi continued to advance, and when he came ſufficiently near offered battle to Maſtin:
upon his declining it he ſent a herald to bid him defiance; but Maſtin was too well acquainted with the reputation of the general and valour of his troops to accept the challenge: he even retired farther, and encamped in a more advantageous and ſtrong ſituation. Roſſi
A fort built at Bevolento. finding it impoſſible to bring him to a deciſive action, employed his army in building a fort at Bevolento, a ſituation extremely commodious for harraſſing and checking the garriſon in Padua [m]. The remainder of the campaign was conſumed in negociations and treaties, which ended in nothing. d

DURING theſe tranſactions Meſtra was ſurrendered to Roſſi; many other towns revolted from the enemy; Viſconti duke of Milan, and Philip Gonzaga, had already taken the field againſt Maſtin. In ſhort, he was environed by falſe friends and profeſſed enemies, yet he was not deſerted by his courage, deſerving of a better cauſe. He every where oppoſed cunning, fraud, and intrigue, to the generous and open enmity of Roſſi: one while he laid the country waſte through which the confederates muſt paſs; another time he advanced as if with intention to fight; then again he would decamp precipitately, and leave a body of troops in ambuſh: ſometimes he would endeavour to ſtarve Roſſi, by cutting off his convoys of forage and proviſions; then by forced marches would he attack his rear. In ſhort, nothing was omitted which could annoy or harraſs; but he had to do with a general, vigilant, e active, and experienced, perfectly acquainted with all his wiles and ſtratagems. At laſt Maſtin was reduced to thoſe difficulties into which he endeavoured to bring the enemy: he had ſo ruined and impoveriſhed the country, that it was unable to ſupport his army, and the neighbouring princes being all in the oppoſite intereſt refuſed to ſupply him. Now he ſought battle with the ſame eagerneſs with which before he avoided it, which Roſſi prudently declined, knowing that victory would certainly attend his protracting the war. To heighten his misfortunes the cities of Feltre, Breſcia, and Bergamo, fell into the hands of the confederates; Padua revolted, and Maſtin's army was daily diminiſhed by deſertion [n].

BUT the thread of ſucceſs which had hitherto attended the allies was interrupted by the death of their general. The brave Pietro Roſſi was killed by an accidental ſhot: he was f greatly lamented on account of his virtues and abilities. In honour of his memory his brother Orlando Roſſi, at that time beſieging Lucca, a brave and experienced officer, was choſen in his room. As ſoon as he arrived at the camp he made an incurſion into the Veroneſe, de-Maſtin defeated. ſtroying every thing with fire and ſword to the gates of Verona. Maſtin was at this time be-ſieging Montichia, and, when he leaſt expected it, was ſurpriſed and defeated by Orlando, who drove him from the ſiege, and made prodigious ſlaughter in his camp. Maſtin was equally unſucceſsful in an attempt he ſoon after made upon the iſland Longara, which he attacked with ſea and land forces: the garriſon ſallying out vigorouſly repulſed him with great loſs, took ſeveral of his ſhips, and obliged him to abandon the enterprize. Orlando in the mean time inveſted Vicenza, and ſo cloſely blocked it up, that the garriſon was ſtarved to g a capitulation.

TIRED

a TIRED out with losses the tyrant sued for peace upon any terms the republic would grant: the conditions imposed were, that Feltre, Belluna, and Coneda should remain to Charles of Bohemia; Bergamo and Brescia, to Visconti; Trevisa, with the castles and villages of the Trevisan, be for ever annexed to the Venetian dominions, together with those of Bulde and Bassan, with a free navigation on the river Adice; and lastly, that four cities, specified in the articles of peace, should be yielded up to the Florentines [o]. Thus was the ambition of Mastin curbed, his insolence subdued, his tyranny suppressed, and those cities and territories which he had acquired by rapine, fraud, and oppression, torn from the usurper and restored to the just proprietors. Treaty concluded.

DANDOLO, after governing the republic with great reputation at home and abroad for b the space of ten years, died of a fever [p], greatly regretted and esteemed for his prudence, wisdom, and good fortune, which was in some measure the result of those qualities.

BARTOLOMEO GRADONICO, Doge LIII.

BARTOLOMEO GRADONICO was next raised to the ducal throne by the general voice of the council, on account of his moderation, piety, and virtue. In the beginning of his dogeship the great hall, where the different councils have their departments, and sit upon their respective affairs, was built. Travellers inform us, that it remains to this day without any considerable alteration, or symptoms of decay [q]. Little occurs in this pacific reign besides prodigies, omens, and apparitions, a long detail of which is given us by Blondus and c Sabellicus. This only they tell us, that Edward the third of England demanded the assistance of the republic against Philip of France, supported by the Genoese; but was refused, although he condescended to make this request in person: that a rebellion began to appear in Candia, which was nipt in the bud, and the ringleaders delivered up to punishment, by the force of the rewards offered to the betrayers; and that a famine prevailed in the city: but no particulars are we favoured with of any of these transactions. A. D. 1338. Bartolomeo Gradonico, doge LIII.

ANDREA DANDOLO, Doge LIV.

GRADONICO was succeeded in his authority by Andrea Dandolo, a prince of a more active, vigilant, and warlike disposition; and at the same time penetrating, eloquent, open, d liberal, and generous, insomuch that he was commonly called by a name expressive of those qualities [r]. A. D. 1343. Andrea Dandolo, doge LIV.

IN the beginning of his dogeship the republic, in consequence of a league formed by the Christian powers against the infidels, sent sixteen gallies under Pietro Zeno to Greece. Zeno had the good fortune to meet with a number of Turkish vessels, which he sunk and burnt; afterwards he took Smyrna by assault, put the garrison to the sword, and fortified it with some addition to the walls, leaving a strong body of forces for its defence. He afterwards, in conjunction with the fleets of Rhodes and Cyprus, fought several bloody and successful battles with the enemy: at last the Venetians, with their allies, received a signal dee feat, most of them being taken, killed, or drowned; but whether this fatal accident happened while Zeno commanded, we are left to conjecture. Venetians defeated by the Turks.

IN the second year of Dandolo's government it was that the Venetians opened a commerce with the infidels at Alexandria and the other ports. Souranza and Justiniano, two rich citizens, by virtue of a dispensation from the pope, were the first who traded to the Asiatic dominions [s].

ZARA, ever inconstant, revolted a seventh time, and sent to Lewis, king of Hungary, to demand his protection, and to offer him the sovereignty of the city. Simon Dandolo, brother to the doge, and Andrea Morosini, were appointed to reduce it; but it cost the Venetians dear, their troops having been often defeated. Lewis of Hungary arrived with sixty thou-
f sand men to the relief of the city; but he was defeated, driven out of Dalmatia, and the city at last taken. Sabellicus informs us, that the slaughter of the king's troops was so great, that, by infecting the air with the putrid exhalations, it produced a pestilence. No other punishment was inflicted upon the rebellious city besides the perpetual banishment of the promoters of this revolt. Zara revolts.

VENICE was now so much increased, and her causes of litigation so great, that the government erected a court of six auditors, or judges. This was the original of the council of the savii, according to some historians. By order of the doge and senate, their first business was to digest and abridge the laws, which, it seems, were swelled to an enormous bulk: all the decrees of the senate were likewise compiled in one volume, and divided, for the sake of perspicuity, into chapters, books, and sections, with a general index, and table of contents. The prince added to this a volume of judicial acts and decrees of the great A. D. 1344.

council, which he had compiled and digeſted with his own hand while he was procurator of St. Mark's [t]. Thus Dandolo was no leſs attentive to the domeſtic and civil than to the foreign and military policy of the republic. a

ABOUT this time Venice was afflicted with a ſeries of unavoidable calamities; a terrible ſtorm deſtroyed great part of their fleet and merchant ſhips; an earthquake and high tide threw down and damaged a prodigious number of houſes and bridges in the city; and a plague ſwept off incredible numbers of the inhabitants. In conſequence, a decree of the
A. D. 1345. great council paſſed to naturalize all foreigners who would come and reſide in the city, which ſoon produced a happy effect, multitudes of people flocking from every quarter to enjoy the freedom and liberty of the Venetian conſtitution [u].

AMIDST all theſe misfortunes the Iſtrians revolted; but were ſoon ſubdued by the authority and ſpirit of Parnatio Juſtiniano. The authors of the revolt were ſent to Venice, from whence they were enjoined not to ſtir under pain of death. b

BEFORE the Venetians were well recovered from the late civil misfortunes and wars, new differences aroſe with the Genoeſe. Theſe laſt poſſeſſed ſeveral ſettlements in Greece from the time that Paleologus ſeized upon Conſtantinople, conſequently they carried on a conſiderable trade, with which they were apprehenſive the Venetians would interfere; they left no means

The doge and ſenate of Venice ſent to demand ſatisfaction; and upon its being refuſed, equipped a fleet, and prepared for war: an embargo was laid upon all their ſhipping; gallies were ſent for to Dalmatia, Candia, and Negropont; and Moroſini, their admiral, recalled from Raguſa. c

IN a ſhort time a ſquadron of thirty-five ſhips and gallies was ready to put to ſea, under the conduct of Marco Ruſino. He had not been long in queſt of the enemy, when, by ſtreſs of weather, he was forced to put into Cariſte, where fourteen Genoeſe gallies rode at anchor, filled with rich merchandize, ammunition, proviſion, and every neceſſary for a fort they

In the mean time, the Genoeſe fleet, com-

THE republic had now entered into an alliance with the king of Arragon, who agreed to join them in perſon with a fleet againſt the Genoeſe. Some authors affirm, that Dandolo formed a treaty offenſive and defenſive with the Greek empire, from whom he received a conſiderable reinforcement [y]. Piſani, the Venetian admiral, ſoon came to an engagement with the Genoeſe ſtationed in the Boſphorus: the fight began in the evening, and continued with great fury for the whole night, without any apparent advantage or wearineſs on either ſide. All the horrors which the darkneſs of the night, the claſhing of ſhips, the clattering of arms, the ſhouts of combatants, and ſhrieks of the wounded could inſpire, contributed to render this action dreadful. Next day the battle ceaſed, rather from inability than want e of inclination to purſue it, each admiral claiming the victory. Giovanni Delfino, who was preſent, ſays, that the Venetians gained a complete victory, having taken twenty-eight of the enemy's gallies, with the loſs only of four: but the Genoeſe and other hiſtorians deny the aſſertion [z]. Piſani was blamed for attacking the enemy in ſo ſtrong a ſituation, for the diſpoſition of his attack, and for continuing it with obſtinacy through the night.

FROM this time forward a council of four experienced officers were appointed to attend, direct, and adviſe the admiral, in order to prevent any raſh reſolutions, which might prove
A. D. 1347. deſtructive of the fleet, and ruinous of the republic [z]. The command of the grand fleet was now given to Ruſino, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the beginning of the war. He firſt ſteered his courſe with a ſquadron of thirty gallies to Sardinia; there he f joined the Arragonian fleet of forty ſail, commanded by Barnardo Caſnari; and immediately went to ſeek Grimaldi, the Genoeſe admiral, who was no leſs eager to engage. The two fleets met on the Sardinian coaſt: Ruſino ordered his ſhips to grapple with the enemy, and then had them chained to each other in ſuch a manner that he muſt conquer or die, it being impoſſible to eſcape. Thus a kind of land battle was fought upon the ſea, in which there Genoeſe defeated. was no room for diſputing the victory, the whole Genoeſe fleet having been either taken or deſtroyed, Grimaldi's ſhip alone eſcaping. When the news of this defeat arrived at Genoa, the whole city was in the greateſt conſternation, and the affliction was equal to what might be expected had Genoa itſelf fallen into the enemy's hands. In their deſpair the Genoeſe diſpatched ambaſſadors to Viſconti, duke of Milan, requeſting his protection and acceptance g a of the ſovereignty of the Genoeſe dominions. Viſconti accepted the propoſal; and thus we ſee this potent republic, in conſequence of one ſevere ſtroke of fortune, ſurrendering up that power, wealth, reputation, and liberty, which ſhe acquired by induſtry, and for a ſeries of years maintained with courage, conduct, and her blood. A. D. 1348. The Genoeſe put themſelves under the protection of Viſconti.

THIS news ſoon arrived at Venice, and put the republic upon forming alliances able to ballance the great power of Viſconti: treaties were made with Maſtin, the Carrarians, and the Florentines, the Venetian cities, forts, and towns, on the continent, were ſtrongly fortified, garriſoned and put in a poſture of defence; their fleet was increaſed, and their forces augmented: we are likewiſe told, that the Venetians formed an alliance with Charles king of Bohemia. In ſhort, they omitted nothing which could enable them to cope with ſo power-
b ful an enemy [a]. Viſconti, perceiving the vigilance and ſpirit of the republic, endeavoured to accommodate the difference: his propoſals were ſuch as he thought the Venetians would gladly embrace, when they conſidered the late addition of ſtrength the Genoeſe had ac- A. D. 1304. quired from his alliance; but he was miſtaken. They were haughtily rejected, and his ambaſſadors told that it was the cuſtom with the Venetians to decide by the ſword, not by negociation [b].

DURING this interval eight Genoeſe gallies entered the gulph and deſtroyed Corfu, and certain iſlands on the coaſt of Dalmatia. The republic diſpatched Nicholas Piſani, with fourteen gallies, in purſuit of them, who ſoon drove them out of the gulph. Next Pagano Doria entered the gulph with a ſtrong ſquadron, took a great number of Venetian ſhips, ſteered c his courſe to Iſtria, deſtroyed Parenſa, and laid waſte the whole coaſt. Piſani being rein- Genoeſe defeated. forced with twenty gallies, came up with him, engaged and defeated the Genoeſe, taking, A. D. 1352. ſinking, and burning a great number of his ſhips; but not before Doria had thrown the city of Venice into great terror and confuſion at his near approach [c].

NOTHING memorable occurred the following year beſides Dandolo's death, which happened in the beginning of the year one thouſand three hundred and fifty-four. He was deſervedly reputed the greateſt ſtateſman, the greateſt ſcholar, the greateſt orator, and the fineſt gentleman of his time: he was likewiſe pious, juſt, and generous, qualities which particularly gained him the love and eſteem of the people [d]. Marino Faliero was now raiſed to the ducal chair.

HIS reign was productive of foreign and domeſtic evils: defeats, famine, and peſtilence, Marino Faliero, doge LV. all conſpiring to humble the pride of this towering republic. While the aſſembly was buſied in chuſing a doge, three Genoeſe gallies were taken by the Venetians upon the coaſt of Greece; the laſt inſtance of the republic's good fortune in the war [e]. Soon after the Venetian fleet, commanded by Piſani, was defeated by Doria: Piſani rode at anchor at the iſland Sapientia, on the coaſt of the Morea, waiting for Doria. Some authors affirm that the Genoeſe came ſome days ſooner than they were expected, and took Piſani with the whole fleet by ſurprize; a circumſtance hardly credible [f]. Others are equally poſitive, that a long and bloody The Venetians e battle was fought, in which at length Piſani with five thouſand of his men were made pri- defeated. ſoners, and above twenty gallies ſunk [g]. All authors agree, that the Venetians ſuſtained, upon this occaſion, an almoſt irreparable loſs; they differ only in the manner. The city would probably have been undone, if the victorious Doria had known as well how to purſue as to gain a victory. The Venetians were equally ſurpriſed and rejoiced when the news arrived that he was returned to Genoa, at a time they every hour expected him before their gates. It is probable that Doria's weakneſs from the loſs he ſuſtained in the action, prevented his laying ſiege to Venice: he knew the bravery of the Venetians, and what they were capable of doing in defence of their wives, children, property, and liberty, againſt an enemy they implacably hated: theſe are the probable motives which actuated Doria's conduct.

f THE Venetians ever ſhewed an admirable conſtancy in adverſity: they now levied troops, equipped a fleet, and, to prevent Viſconti's ſending aſſiſtance to the Genoeſe, they engaged him in a war at home, having prevailed upon Charles of Bohemia, to march with a powerful army Truce with into the duke's dominions [h]; in the mean while they made a truce for four months with Viſ- Viſconti. conti, and exchanged priſoners with the Genoeſe.

FALIERO, who had been doge little more than nine months, was ſeized with a violent deſire of governing the republic abſolutely, without council, ſenate, or ſeignory, and of ſubverting the eſtabliſhed conſtitution [i]. He began his deſign by acts of popularity, and forming a ſtrong faction among the lower rank of people: he even went ſo far as to make entertainments for them, at which himſelf would preſide, taking occaſion to hint how improper a popular government was where vigour and unanimity were required; how unfit to retrieve the desperate affairs of the state, which only could be done by entrusting the power in the hands of one man, equally attached to his country and capable of directing it. When he perceived that the people listened to him with attention, he began to drop hints of his intention to deliver them from the tyranny of the senate, to retrieve the honour and power of the state, and to assume a greater latitude of power and authority, than he now enjoyed, until he had restored their liberty; after which it should be left to their choice to continue him or not, as they found he deserved. His proposal was to murder the chief persons of the assembly, senate, and seignory, who had raised him to the dignity he possessed: this he laid before the people, after he had first provided his party with arms, and upon some pretence got a sufficient number together in the palace [k]. The first day of April was appointed for the execution of this infamous plot; a rumour was to be propagated that the enemy were at the walls, the great bell, the usual alarm, was to be tolled as a signal to the conspirators to join and begin the massacre. On the very day fixed for the performance of this dreadful tragedy, Beltrand, a conspirator, either through disgust or remorse, went to the house of Nicholao Leon, and made an ample discovery. Leon was so confounded with the horror of the action, that for some time he was unable to reply; at last, ordering Beltrand to be confined, he dispatched messengers to the chief senators, the seignory, and officers of the city, to come instantly to him. A resolution was taken to secure the doge and heads of the conspiracy, which was happily executed [l]. They were all put to death, and the doge's memory branded with particular marks of infamy: a veil was put over his picture (A), the senate having ordered that it should rank among the rest with this infamous distinction. A pension of one thousand ducats was settled upon the discoverer; and thus ended the reign of the ambitious, mad, and wicked Marino Faliero [m].

SECT. III.

Containing the Origin of the Inquisition of State; the Peace with Genoa; War with the King of Hungary; Revolt of Candia, and other Particulars.

State inquisition.

WE have reason to suppose the inquisition of state owed its origin to this attempt to subvert the established plan of government, destroy liberty, and introduce tyranny. Some authors imagine its rise to be of a later date; but as they neither specify the time, nor particularize the manner, we are at liberty to form conjectures. It is probable that so bold an attempt would have made the senate extremely circumspect, jealous, and watchful of the conduct of their doges, embracing every probable method of retrenching their authority, and limiting their ambition. Certain we are, that the first intention of the inquisition was solely to guard against the encroachments of the prince, and protect the privileges of the people, although its authority has since been extended.

DURING the inter-regnum Bernardo Justiniano was sent with a squadron to scour the seas, and convoy a fleet of merchantmen from Greece: he was so diligent that he took a great number of Genoese ships, and if he had not been prevented by peace, would probably have recovered the late disgraces sustained by the republic. But this object, equally the interest and wish of both parties, was at last obtained, after the war had raged with the utmost violence for the space of five years. The prisoners on both sides were set at liberty, and nothing but rejoicings, mirth, and gladness filled the hearts of every Venetian and Genoese; not that their animosity was satiated, but their power was exhausted [n].

Peace with Genoa.

GIOVANNI GRADONICO, Doge LVI.

A. D. 1355. Giovanni Gradonico, doge LVI.

GIOVANNIGRADONICO was chosen to succeed Faliero, after the republic had been for two months in the hands of a vice-doge. Of this prince nothing is recorded, his reign being short, and the republic blessed with profound tranquility. Some differences arose between Lewis king of Hungary and the republic, but they did not break out into open war during the life of this doge. Lewis complained of injustice in the last treaty concerning Dalmatia, and renewed his claim to cities he had then formally ceded: he demanded that the republic would at least acknowlege by a small tribute his superiority; but the Venetian ambassador refused to give any answer until he had received instructions from his master and the senate;

(A) The inscriptions which Sansovino reports to be placed upon the monuments of the doges, we are apt to think were rather put under their pictures and busts: it was customary at Venice to erect these in the great hall, in compliment to their memory. These words, which he mentions to have been inscribed on Marin's tomb, were far more probably wrote under his picture, busto, or statue.---Temeritatis meæ pœnas lui.

during which interval the doge died, after having reigned one year and two months, including the regency of Cornaro [b].

GIOVANNI DELFINO, Doge LVII.

GIOVANNI DELFINO, his ſucceſſor, poſitively rejected the king's propoſal, preferring war to ſervitude. Upon which Lewis marched an army into Dalmatia, ſo great that he at the ſame time beſieged Zara, Scia, Spalatra, Nona, and Trabu. The Venetians, amazed at his expedition, raiſed forces, and equipped a fleet with all poſſible diſpatch, with which they found means to reinforce the garriſons, and ſupply the cities with every neceſſary. Giovanni Delfino, doge LVII.

Lewis, finding that the war would be protracted by this method of proceeding, raiſed
b the ſieges, and ſent an army of ſixty thouſand men to ſupport Franciſco Carrario in Italy, with whom he had contracted an alliance [c]; knowing that the republic was not to be brought to terms while the war was carried on at ſo great a diſtance. He had beſides conſiderable A. D. 1356. reinforcements from the duke of Auſtria, the patriarch of Aquileia, who ſeized every opportunity of diſtreſſing the Venetians, and from the earl of Colalta. With this numerous army Coniglian, Sacilla, and ſome other places were inveſted, and no ſooner beſieged than taken [d].

THE Hungarians afterwards ſate down before Treviſo, and laid cloſe ſiege to the city. The Venetians had provided for this by ſupplying the garriſon with large ſtore of ammunition, proviſion, and every other neceſſary: ſeveral aſſaults were made, and the enemy as often repulſed; nor had the king's menaces, that he would put the whole garriſon to the c ſword if they did not ſurrender, any other effect than to animate the beſieged, and encreaſe their hatred to Lewis: at laſt, tired out with their obſtinacy, he turned the ſiege into a blockade, and retired into Hungary [e]. The Venetians were in the mean while buſy levying Lewis retires into Hungary. forces in Germany and in the city: as theſe auxiliaries were encamped upon the river Brente, near Vicenza, they were ſurpriſed and cut off before the Venetians could come to their relief [f]. Soon after a truce for five months was agreed upon, during which time peace was negociating.

THE negociations producing no effect, hoſtilities recommenced at the expiration of the truce. Spalatra and Trabu fell into the king's hands, the republic being unable to Several cities taken from the republic. raiſe the ſieges, as their chief ſtrength was neceſſarily employed in Italy. Zara was taken d by ſurprize; and of all the cities in Dalmatia, Emona alone remained to the Venetians: it had been for ſome months bravely and obſtinately defended by Giovanni Juſtiniano, one of A. D. 1356. the beſt officers of his age. The king loſt four times the number of the garriſon before the town, and was no nearer being maſter of it than when he made his firſt approaches [g]: however, the republic finding that Dalmatia muſt inevitably be loſt if they did not conclude peace, ſent ambaſſadors to Lewis with terms rather convenient than honourable. Their propoſals were accepted, by which the Venetian territories, from the gulph of Fana to Durazzo, the intire claim to Dalmatia, and ſome other diſtricts, were ceded to Lewis; he, on Peace with the other hand, giving up his conqueſts in Iſtria, Italy, and laying himſelf under an obli- Lewis. gation to prevent the Dalmatians from practiſing piracy, their common vocation [h].

e NOT long after the concluſion of the peace Delfino died, from which it appears that this war continued above four years; a circumſtance which ſhews the immenſe wealth and commerce of the republic, that for a ſeries of years was engaged in continual wars. He reigned for five years, and was reputed a good, wiſe, and not unfortunate prince.

LORENZO CELSO, Doge LVIII.

DELFINO no ſooner expired than twelve ſenators were diſpatched to congratulate Lo- A. D. 1361. renzo Celſo, elected by the aſſembly, on his acceſſion to the dogeſhip. Celſo was at that Lorenzo Celſo, d. LVIII. time in Germany, on his return from an embaſſy to the emperor Charles IV. His father declined complimenting him after his arrival, to prevent his ſtanding uncovered in his ſon's
f preſence, thinking it an indignity to the paternal authority to be ſubjected to the ducal [i]. The duke of Auſtria and king of Cyprus made him a viſit of congratulation; for in his ambaſſies Lorenzo had acquired the eſteem of a great number of foreign princes.

DURING their reſidence in Venice great commotions broke out in Candia. The ſenate, to Candia revolts. defray the expences of the late war, taxed all the natives of Venice, of a certain property in the iſland, and impoſed a ſtill heavier tax upon the original inhabitants. The Venetians were the firſt to take up arms againſt their country, which ſo encouraged the natives, that the rebellion became general, the governor, provedatori, and all the ſhips of the republic being ſeized.

THE rebels choſe Marco Gradonico, ſurnamed Bayardo, for their general, an officer of experience and valour: they began with fortifying the moſt advantageous ſituations, laying A. D. 1363.

up magazines, equipping a fleet, and keeping ſtrict diſcipline among the troops: every thing was done which the duty of a good officer required, and that could ſecure the iſland in the independency it affected. The news ſoon arrived at Venice, which greatly embarraſſed the doge and ſenate, as the authors of the inſurrection were Venetians of diſtinction and family. After various debates and opinions, it was reſolved to ſend three of the ſenators to ſound the intentions of the rebels, offer propoſals, and if poſſible perſuade them to reaſon. The ambaſſadors uſed every argument which could ſoothe the paſſions, determine the judgment, or work upon the heart, but all to no purpoſe; they reſolved to be an independent free people [k]. Finding all their endeavours to no purpoſe, the ſenators went on board certain gallies that waited for them, the captains of which, juſt as they were getting under ſail, ſeized about three hundred of the crowd upon the ſhore, and carried them priſoners to Venice. a b

WAR was now determined upon by the republic, and the Candians declared enemies to their country. Ambaſſadors were ſent to the emperors of the Eaſt and Weſt, to the kings of France, Hungary, and to other potentates, to demand aid and aſſiſtance againſt this rebellious colony, or at leaſt to obtain an aſſurance that no protection or ſuccour ſhould be afforded them againſt their mother country. Their ambaſſadors were kindly received, and the moſt liberal and ſolemn aſſurances every where given not only of denying the Candians any ſupport, but of their deteſtation and abhorrence of their conduct [l].

War with the Candians.

IN the mean time an army was levied, their marine put in readineſs, Dominico Michaeli, who before was proveditor of the gulph, was appointed admiral, and the land forces committed to Luchin Vermio. As ſoon as every thing was ready for embarkation Vermio reviewed his army, and found it conſiſting of five thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, all veterans who had ſerved in the late wars, and in good order. The fleet, amounting to forty gallies and ſhips, arrived early in the ſpring at Candia. c

A. D. 1364.

BUT during theſe tranſactions ſeveral gentlemen of Candace, the capital of the iſland, hearing of the vigorous preparations carried on at Venice to reduce the rebels, began to fall off, to practiſe with ſome of the chiefs of the faction, and to inſpire them with a ſenſe of their duty and danger. Hence proceeded horrid murders, maſſacres, and ſtratagems [m]. The chiefs fearing they might be betrayed to the republic, left no means by poiſon or the poignard untried to take off the ſuſpected perſons, the traitors as they were called. Many Venetians, of the firſt diſtinction in the iſland, were ſuddenly put to death by the infernal arts of one Calergo, a famous poiſoner and aſſaſſin. In ſhort, the native Greeks perceiving the ſucceſs of their diabolical agent, began to diſtruſt all the Venetians: they now inſiſted upon the management of the war; they demanded that ten natural Greeks ſhould be admitted into the ſenate; they threatened to break open the priſons, and murder the Venetian priſoners confined there, if they were not voluntarily ſurrendered, and a ſolemn oath taken of their allegiance to the Greeks. They had even the inſolence to demand the ſame of the Venetian nobility that remained. A ſcheme likewiſe was laid for ſeizing upon Candace; depriving the Venetians of all authority; and, if poſſible, of maſſacring every Italian in the iſland: a juſt puniſhment upon them for their perfidy to their native country. d

THE Venetian nobility were now in a miſerable dilemma; declared enemies to the republic, and dreading its power at the very time they were betrayed, poiſoned, and aſſaſſinated by the Greeks, with whom they were aſſociated in one common act of rebellion. To extricate themſelves it was determined to deliver the iſland to the Genoeſe, as they doubted not but they would rejoice at ſo fair an opportunity of enlarging their dominions, and of ſhewing their hatred to the Venetians [n]: but the republic of Genoa, either from a principle of honour, or diſlike to enter upon a freſh war, rejected the offer. It was next propoſed to throw themſelves on the clemency of the Venetian republic, thinking by this means to purchaſe their pardon. The Greeks diſcovered and prevented this deſign. e

THE Venetian army being landed, Vermio detached a party to reconnoitre the enemy, view the ground round Candace, and regulate the manner of making his approaches. The detachment fell into an ambuſcade, were cut off, cruelly mangled and hacked to pieces after they were killed: ſo great was the averſion of the Greeks to the Venetians; or ſo ready are men, engaged in a wrong cauſe, to perpetrate every villainy. Vermio marched his army againſt the Candians, engaged, and routed their army, making a great number of priſoners [o]. He then inveſted the capital on the land ſide, while Michaeli blocked it up by ſea, and ſoon reduced it to the obedience of the republic. It ſeems one article of the capitulation was, that the city ſhould not be plundered, and ſubjected to the ravages of the ſoldiers; to prevent which the gates were to be opened to the governor, and a party ſufficient for his protection: the army to remain without the walls. The ſoldiers, finding themſelves deprived of the booty they expected, began to mutiny, which had nearly terminated in a thorough revolt, f g

CANDACE being loſt, and the army defeated, the reſt of the iſland ſubmitted of courſe. The chiefs, both Venetian and Greek, were ſeized and put to death; the former with the greateſt rigour, their offence admitting of no extenuation.

MARCO CORNARO, Doge LIX.

In the mean time Lorenzo Celſo died, after he had governed the ſtate for three years with diſcretion, temperance, and œconomy [q]. Marco Cornaro was but juſt elected to ſucceed him when the news of a new revolt of the Candians arrived. It was excited by Calergo, who had b found means to eſcape the juſt puniſhment denounced: he now ventured to appear publicly: he declaimed againſt the oppreſſion of the Venetians, the puſillanimity of the Greeks, the ſubjection in which the natural lords of the iſland were kept, inſiſting on the weakneſs of the republic, and the ſtrength of the iſland, if they would exert that ſpirit for which their forefathers were famous. Every argument that could inflame their minds, and diſpoſe them to rebellion, was uſed, and with ſucceſs. Calergo ſet up the Greek ſtandard, exhorting every man inſpired with the love of his country, for liberty, to enliſt himſelf in the cauſe of freedom. A numerous army was ſoon raiſed, the forts ſeized, and the nobility and Venetian magiſtrates put to death. Nicholao Dandolo, and his brother, were the firſt victims of the popular fury [r].

Second revolution of the Candians.

c NICHOLAO JUSTINIANO, the provedatori, with ſome others of the nobility, found means to eſcape, and raiſe a body of forces to oppoſe Calergo; who, advancing to the citadel of Candace, aſſaulted it with great vigour, but was repulſed. The rebels, finding that they could make no impreſſion here, retired, after ſetting the ſuburbs on fire, to Rethimna, which the Venetian garriſon abandoned, not finding it tenable. Juſtiniano, having received forces from Venice, and indulgences from Rome, marched againſt the rebels, and defeated them in a pitched battle: but this decided nothing, the enemy were ſoon recruited. Another battle enſued, and Juſtiniano was a ſecond time victorious, though to as little purpoſe as before [s].

In this poſture ſtood matters, when all of a ſudden the inhabitants of fifteen towns and d villages, which had hitherto remained quiet, joined the rebels; by which they became greatly ſuperior to Juſtiniano. He therefore applied for ſpeedy reinforcements to the republic, acting in the mean time on the defenſive, while the rebels were committing the moſt barbarous exceſſes: he was on the point of being reduced to great neceſſity, when a ſeaſonable ſupply of proviſions, troops, and every thing wanted, arrived from Venice; upon which the ſcene was changed [t]. The rebels were now driven into the mountains, cut off from their magazines and ſtores, and at length compelled to ſubmit to the clemency of the republic. Reaſonable terms were granted, on condition that Calergo, and ſome other perſons ſpecified, were delivered up to puniſhment; but he made his eſcape to Anapolis, which he bravely defended againſt all the power of the Venetians. At laſt, perceiving the place was no longer e defenſible, he abandoned the iſland in a veſſel he had prepared for that purpoſe. Anapolis was ſurrendered, and the whole iſland reduced to its former obedience.

A. D. 1368.

Peace with the Candians.

Some members of the ſenate were diſpatched to Candia to enquire into the grievances which had occaſioned the revolt; to ſettle it upon a ſure footing; to abrogate ſome old and frame new laws; raze the holds and forts which were unneceſſary to the ſafety of the iſland: in ſhort, to eſtabliſh tranquility and peace upon the beſt foundation which the temper and diſpoſition of the Greeks would admit.

ANDREA CONTARENI, Doge LX.

MARCO CORNARO, after a troubleſome ſway of three years, died, and was ſucceeded f by Andrea Contareni, who unwillingly received a dignity, to ſupport which he was perfectly qualified. His ſcruples were no ſooner ſurmounted than the Iſtrians revolted, under pretence that the duties exacted by the republic upon all merchandize paſſing through the gulph of Fana to the Po, was an inſupportable impoſition, ruinous of their commerce, upon which depended their very exiſtence. They deſtroyed the galley the Venetians kept on the coaſt to receive the duty: not ſatisfied with this act of defiance, they pulled down the ſtandards of the republic, and expelled the Venetian governors. The doge and ſenate, reſolving to curb their inſolence, ſent againſt them a fleet and army, commanded by Michaeli and Molino [u]. In a ſhort time the rebels were ſo hard preſſed, that they threw themſelves upon the protection of the duke of Auſtria, and erected his ſtandard in all the public places. The duke g came to their aſſiſtance with an army of ten thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe: he was ſo much ſuperior in ſtrength to the Venetians, that he inveſted and blocked up their camp, a which was in great danger of being taken, when Molino arrived with a ſtrong body of ſailors, attacked the duke in rear, and after putting the Germans in confuſion, forced open his way into the camp: having joined Michaeli, a general ſally was made with ſuch impetuoſity that the enemy were routed and driven from the entrenchments with great ſlaughter. The duke's retreat was ſo precipitate that he left the wounded, his baggage, and proviſion behind, together with three or four hundred priſoners taken in the flight[w]. A truce was granted him for a day to bury the dead; after which he was defeated in another action, and his pride ſo mortified, that, leaving the Iſtrians to the mercy of the conquerors, he retired into Auſtria. Thus the rebels loſing their protector, ſubmitted to the republic, acknowleged their offence, made reparation, and agreed to pay the duty, the refuſal of which had reduced b them to this neceſſity.

SCARCE was the republic rid of this troubleſome affair when ſhe reſolved to enter on a freſh war. Franciſco Carrario had uſurped ſome of their dominions near the lakes; upon which the Paduans were forbid trading or carrying on any ſort of commerce to Venice. Other neighbouring ſtates were ſo affected by this prohibition, that they did all in their power to reconcile the contending parties; but not ſucceeding they applied for the mediation of Lewis king of Hungary, and the Florentines, at whoſe interceſſion it was agreed, that a truce for two months ſhould take place, in order to negociate a peace. Commiſſioners were deputed by both ſides to examine the bounds and fix the limits in an amicable manner; but the negociations were ſoon broke off, on certain intelligence which the republic received of a de- c ſign formed by Carrario, of murdering the doge and ſenate[x]. Strict ſearch was made after the conſpirators, ſome of whom were found, put to the torture, and on their confeſſion hanged. Apprehenſive that Carrario's villainous plots would not terminate with a ſingle attempt, the ſenate ordered a conſtant patrole of horſe, the guards of the palace and ſenate to be doubled, and the ſenators moſt obnoxious to the tyrant, to be conſtantly attended by two armed ſoldiers. Orders were likewiſe iſſued that all the wells in the city ſhould be well guarded; butchers, bakers, and poulterers, were made reſponſible for all the meat they ſold, and every precaution was taken to guard againſt poiſon[y]: nor did their fears end here, ſtrong reaſons appeared for ſuſpecting that they were betrayed by ſome of their own body. A ſcrupulous and rigid enquiry was made, which turned out to the ſafety of the ſtate, and d to the eternal ſhame of certain ſenators, who were proved guilty of holding a correſpondence with their moſt inſidious enemy. The moſt guilty met with condign puniſhment, others were impriſoned for life, and ſome ſtill leſs criminal, were degraded and for ever diſqualified from holding a ſeat in the ſenate.

War with the Carrarians.

Carrario attempts to poiſon the doge and ſenate.

IN the mean time the republic was taking meaſures for carrying on a vigorous war, in order to chaſtiſe the baſeneſs of this treacherous enemy. Rayniero Vaſco, the beſt commander of his time, was invited from Tuſcany to lead their army, Dominico Michaeli being appointed his lieutenant. Michaeli marched againſt the Paduans, entered their country, defeated them in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, laid the country under contribution, and filled it with terror and conſternation. Rayniero in the mean time arrived at Venice, and having received his commiſſion e immediately ſet out for the army, and was ſoon after diſmiſſed, upon a quarrel with the provedatori; who had the addreſs to make his conduct ſuſpected. The great Vaſco thought it beneath his character to ſtoop to a defence; to exculpate and palliate would lead him to an altercation with the provedatori, whom he deſpiſed equally for their corruption and ignorance. He quitted the command with a dignity of ſentiment, and contempt for the weakneſs of the republic, incapable of diſtinguiſhing true merit, that reflects more honour on his memory than all the laurels of the greateſt conquerors.

ALBERTO CARRARIO, Pietro Fontano, Alberto and Andrea Dandolo, were appointed to take the command of the army by turns; their ſucceſs againſt the enemy was conſiderable, which diverted the public ſuſpicion from falling upon the provedatori, though their in- f tegrity was doubted by perſons of penetration. The Venetians were divided into two bodies, one of which was conducted by Thaddeo Juſtiniano: he was ſurpriſed by the enemy, and defeated after a vigorous reſiſtance and great ſlaughter of the Paduans, whoſe victory conſiſted in remaining maſters of the field of battle. Juſtiniano retired into the Treviſan, where he withſtood all the attacks of the enemy until he was reinforced.

A. D. 1374. ABOUT this time Lewis king of Hungary arrived to the aſſiſtance of Franciſco Carrario and the Paduans, with a powerful army, which obliged the Venetians to act upon the defenſive, until an opportunity of breaking and dividing the enemy ſhould offer. On this occaſion the vigilance, activity, and conduct of Delfino the admiral, were greatly admired: he ſupplied himſelf with a number of light boats, came round the lakes, built and garriſoned g a forts in ſuch a manner as greatly diſtreſſed and annoyed the enemy. A party could not come out of the camp to forage, but it was ſurpriſed by ſome of thoſe garriſons, the convoys of the enemy were cut off, and their army reduced to ſuch extremity as compelled them to a motion which afforded the Venetians the opportunity they long deſired. Carrario was obliged to march through ſome narrow defiles, woods, and marſhy grounds, of which the Venetians taking advantage, attacked him in places where it was impoſſible to draw out his army. Pietro Fontano commanded the republic's forces upon this occaſion, and acquired great glory by the refined ſtrokes of generalſhip which he diſplayed. No opportunity was loſt, nothing omitted which could poſſibly harraſs, break, or reduce the enemy. For the ſpace of a week continual actions and ſkirmiſhes paſſed, all terminating to his b advantage: at length, when the enemy was fatigued, broken, and diſpirited, Fontano attacked them with all his forces, and gained a complete victory, killed two thouſand upon the ſpot, and made three thouſand priſoners [b]. Diviſions aroſe among the enemy; the Paduans blamed the Carrarians; the Carrarians ſhuffled the public odium on the Hungarians. Marſi, the brother of Carrario, offered his mediation to compoſe thoſe civil broils, which he foreſaw muſt ruin the common cauſe; but Franciſco continuing unalterable in his reſentment, he quitted the army, and ſought protection againſt the perſecuting temper of his brother at Venice [c].

LEWIS of Hungary, tired with his loſſes, determined upon a peace with the republic. Carrario, finding himſelf in danger of being deprived of ſo powerful an ally, began like-c wiſe to reflect upon the conſequences of ſupporting a war ſingly againſt ſo powerful and warlike a people as the Venetians. Accordingly he ſent propoſals to the Venetian general, which were accepted, and afterwards ratified by the doge and ſenate. It was propoſed that the republic ſhould appoint five commiſſioners to fix the limits of the controverted territories; that the Paduans ſhould immediately, as an indemnification, pay forty thouſand crowns to the republic, and an annual tribute of fourteen thouſand crowns more for the term of fifteen years; that Franciſco Carrario, or his ſon, ſhould acknowlege his fault in preſence of the people, ſenate, and doge of Venice; that the caſtle of Caranio, with all its diſtricts, ſhould be ceded to the republic; that Caſtlenuovo, with all the forts round it, ſhould be d razed, and never afterwards rebuilt; that Marſilio ſhould enjoy the profits of his eſtate, either to reſide in Venice or elſewhere, as he thought proper; that Carrario ſhould forthwith diſcharge his auxiliaries, and diſband his army; that he ſhould annually remit three hundred crowns to St. Mark's church; that the Paduans ſhould not build within three miles of the mouth of any river in Italy: that they ſhould not maintain forts or garriſons; and laſtly, that they ſhould ſurrender up all the towns, villages, and lands, taken from the Venetians in the courſe of the war [d].

Peace concluded. A. D. 1375.

On theſe conditions, ſo glorious to the republic and eaſy to Carrario, conſidering the infamous means he had practiſed to ruin the Venetian conſtitution, murder the doge, and poiſon the ſenate, peace was reſtored. His ſon came to Venice to perform the articles, and aſk
e pardon for his father's offence: he was carried to St. Mark's, where he ſolemnly ſwore to his father's acceptance of the conditions, expreſſed his contrition for the unprovoked injury offered the republic, and his firm reſolution to keep the peace ſacred and inviolable [e].

Soon after a fire deſtroyed the Monaſtery of Virgins, the moſt famous nunnery in Venice, in which a great number of young ladies of diſtinction periſhed, together with a great quantity of valuable effects, a prodigious ſum of money, and profuſion of rich plate.

A. D. 1377. Leopold of Auſtria invades the Treviſan.

Profound tranquility for the ſpace of three years ſucceeded theſe events; at the expiration of which a freſh war recommenced with Leopold duke of Auſtria, who without any previous complaint or declaration entered Italy, laid waſte the Treviſan, putting every thing to f fire and ſword as far as the gates of Treviſo. The magiſtrates of the city ſent immediate notice to Venice of their danger; but the republic having in the late repoſe laid up her fleet, and diſbanded her army, was forced to ſolicit the neighbouring powers to ſuccour the Treviſans. Their requeſt was rejected, and the Venetians found themſelves under the neceſſity of relying upon their own vigour and ſtrength [f].

An army and ſquadron were got ready with all poſſible diſpatch, and aſſurances of ſpeedy aſſiſtance ſent to the Treviſans. All the German merchants in the Venetian ports were ſeized, and their ſhips and goods confiſcated. Jacomo Caballa, an old warrior, was appointed to command. ing them, he obtained a complete victory on the banks of the river Piava. Thence marching to Feltre he deſtroyed the ſuburbs, and was about to inveſt the town, when he was informed of a ſtrong reinforcement Leopold had received, and of his intention to raiſe the ſiege. Upon this Jacomo determined to retreat towards the Trevisan, ſending his ſon with a detachment to ſeize upon the caſtle of Baldina, a place of ſome conſequence: Leopold having notice from his ſpies of Jacomo's intention, laid an ambuſcade for young Caballa, which ſucceeding, the whole detachment were made priſoners. Leopold diſmiſſed them next day, on their parole that they would return if an immediate peace did not enſue, propoſals of which he ſent by them to Jacomo: Lewis king of Hungary acting as mediator, the propoſals were accepted, and peace confirmed [g]. a

BUT Lewis, as if he had a mind to ſtrengthen the republic againſt himſelf, no ſooner rid her of this enemy, than he entered into an alliance with the Genoeſe, the Carrarians, and the biſhop of Aquileia, againſt the Venetians. The cauſe of the war was this: Andronicus having conſpired againſt the life of his father Caloine, emperor of Greece, was detected, convicted, blinded, and baniſhed to Pera, a Genoeſe ſettlement. Caloine had conceived a ſtrong friendſhip for the Venetians, in conſequence of which he complimented the merchants of the republic with ſeveral valuable and excluſive privileges. The Genoeſe, piqued at the preference given to the Venetians, reſolved to revenge themſelves by raiſing Andronicus, who had in ſome meaſure recovered his ſight, to the empire: for this purpoſe they ſent directions to Pera to ſet him at liberty. Agents were employed over the empire to form a party in his favour, and a ſtrong ſquadron and body of forces ſent to his immediate aſſiſtance. Andronicus was no ſooner releaſed than, agreeable to the inconſtancy of the eaſtern nations, he found himſelf at the head of a powerful faction, determined to diſpute the empire with Caloine. He ſent orders to the governor of Tenedos to ſurrender the iſland to the Genoeſe, propoſing thereby to ſecure a harbour and wintering for the fleet. This the governor refuſed, unleſs the order was counterſigned by the emperor. For further intelligence he ſent to Conſtantinople; and was directed by Caloine to put the iſland in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, whoſe aſſiſtance he was then ſoliciting [h]. Thus Tenedos became the occaſion of this, as Candia had been of former wars between the republics. b c

War with the Genoeſe.

MARCO JUSTINIANO, admiral of the gulph of Venice, having orders to receive Tenedos from the Greek governor, ſailed thither, put the iſland in a poſture of defence, appointed Donato Troni governor, and then convoyed a fleet of merchantmen to Venice. Tenedos was of the utmoſt conſequence to the commerce of Genoa and Venice; both had long endeavoured to acquire the poſſeſſion of the iſland, and now the ſucceſs of the latter rekindled their ancient animoſity, and occaſioned a bloody, tedious and deſtructive war [i]. d

BEFORE war was declared between the republics, the Genoeſe ſeized upon Lemnos, in the name of Andronicus, and made priſoners of ſome Venetian merchants. Sailing from thence, they joined Andronicus with eleven gallies, and made directly for Tenedos; where, upon their arrival, they ſummoned Troni to ſurrender his truſt to the lawful emperor. But this demand being anſwered with a ſhower of arrows, Andronicus gave the aſſault with great fury, which Troni ſuſtained with ſo much bravery as defeated their efforts: then ſallying out with the whole garriſon, he ruſhed upon them with an impetuoſity ſo irreſiſtible, as made the Genoeſe and Greeks precipitately take to their ſhips, and relinquiſh the attempt. The number of ſlain and priſoners was great, and the booty conſiderable, as it included all the enemy's battering engines and camp materials [k]. e

WAR was now declared by the Venetians againſt the Genoeſe, Lewis of Hungary, the biſhop of Aquileia, and the Carrarians, a powerful confederacy, againſt which the republic endeavoured to employ an adequate force. For this purpoſe forty ſhips of war were equipped, and the command given to Victor Piſani, with Barba and Loretani, in quality of proveditors. Victor lay at anchor with his fleet at Ancia, when he received intelligence that the Genoeſe, under Ludovico Fieſca, approached: he inſtantly gave the proper directions for drawing up the fleet, animated the ſoldiers and mariners, and weighing anchor crowded ſail to meet the enemy. As ſoon as the Genoeſe admiral appeared, the whole Venetian fleet gave a chear, ominous of ſucceſs from the alacrity and ſpirit it indicated. Upon the near approach of the fleets, the ſky was in an inſtant darkened with a cloud of arrows; but this kind of fighting was ſoon laid aſide for the ſword and pike, the ſhips being driven upon each other by the tempeſtuouſneſs of the weather. Here they boarded each other, and an obſtinate battle continued for two hours, when the Genoeſe were obliged to yield to the bravery of the Ve- f a netians, four of their gallies only eſcaping, the reſt being either taken, ſunk, or deſtroyed: about two thouſand priſoners were made, and a greater number of the enemy ſlain. Nor was the victory purchaſed without blood on the ſide of the Venetians, they having loſt about ſix hundred men, ſeveral of whom were citizens of diſtinction. However, as the Genoeſe admiral, and the whole fleet, fell into Piſani's hands, he the leſs regretted his loſs, although his ſon was among the number of the ſlain [l].

In the mean time the allies of Genoa had taken the field, entered, burnt, and deſtroyed the Treviſan; but failed in their attempt to ſurpriſe the city of Treviſo. The Genoeſe likewiſe ſurpriſed the city of Famagoſta, the richeſt maritime town in Cyprus, the king, the ally of the Venetians, having made his eſcape to Milan, where he married Viſconti's daughter, and b prevailed on the duke to aſſiſt the republic. The conditions of the treaty were, that the Venetians, with ten gallies, ſhould tranſport the king to Cyprus, and aſſiſt him in retaking Famagoſta from the Genoeſe: that on the other ſide Viſconti ſhould ſupply them with nine thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, for the defence of their dominions on the continent; and the king grant them a certain ſubſidy, which we do not find ſpecified by hiſtorians [m].

Accordingly ten gallies were ſent with his majeſty, the harbour of Famagoſta, a number of ſhips, and ſome priſoners were taken. The town was then ſtormed, ſcaling ladders applied to the walls, and the ramparts mounted by the Venetians, when the Cyprians failing to ſupport them, and the Genoeſe attacking them vigorouſly in front with numbers greatly c ſuperior, they were driven headlong to the ground with great ſlaughter. The Genoeſe, however, not purſuing the blow, the Venetians gained their ſhips without any farther loſs, and joined Piſani, who was ſteering his courſe to Cartharra [n].

This city belonged to Lewis, was ſtrongly fortified, and well ſupplied: Piſani ſummoned the governor, but he returned a haughty anſwer that only inflamed the Venetians. The troops being landed the city was inveſted, and in a few days all the outworks taken: then Piſani ordered a general aſſault, the walls were ſcaled, and the Venetians mounted the ramparts with a courage that daunted the enemy, though they ſtill endeavoured to maintain their ground; but in a ſhort time a flag of truce was hung out, and the governor ſurrendered at diſcretion: the booty was ſo conſiderable, that Piſani ſent ſix ſhips loaded with

Cartharra taken by Piſani.

Hearing that the Genoeſe fleet were ſteering towards Dalmatia, he directed his courſe to meet them, or, if he failed, to attack Zara and the coaſts. The two fleets came within view at Tarentum, and in appearance prepared for battle; but the Genoeſe admiral, perceiving Piſani to be well prepared, bore away with all the ſail he could make. Piſani gave chace as far as the coaſt of Dalmatia, where, fearing ſome deſign of the enemy, who were ſuperior to him, he waited for a reinforcement.

During theſe tranſactions at ſea the war was briſkly carried on by land: the Venetians had taken Saligetta, a city belonging to Gerardo Caminenſis, who had joined the league againſt the republic: Ceſalta, and ſeveral other towns they burnt, ruined, or diſmantled.
e Carrario, on the other hand, was not idle; having joined the patriarch of Aquileia, their forces amounted to ſixteen thouſand men, with which army they inveſted the city Meſtra. To deprive the beſieged of all ſuccour, ſtrong detachments were ſent to block up every path by which the Venetians could march; but Nicholao Galliano and Hico Piſani being detached with a ſtrong corps to attempt the relief of the beſieged, they forced a paſſage, and ſo ſucceſsfully haraſſed the enemy's out-guards and camp, being at the ſame time ſupported by briſk and ſeaſonable ſallies from the town, that Carrario was compelled to raiſe the ſiege with ſome precipitation, leaving behind a great part of his baggage [o].

War carried on by land.

PISANI was on his way to Trahu in queſt of the Genoeſe fleet: coming paſt Sicco, he ſtopped to ſummon the fortreſs, the governor of which replied, that the Venetians muſt uſe f more powerful arguments than menaces before they became maſters of the place. This anſwer being reported to Piſani he ordered an aſſault, the walls were ſcaled, and the fortreſs taken in the ſpace of a few hours, with prodigious ſlaughter of the garriſon. Loaded with priſoners, ſpoil, and rich booty, Piſani proceeded in his courſe to Trahu, ſending a galley to Venice with the news of the taking of Sicco, and the ſcarcity of proviſions in his fleet. The Genoeſe had ſtrongly blocked up both the channels leading to the harbour of Trahu, which foiled all the attempts of Piſani to come to an engagement: he therefore landed his troops at ſome diſtance from the city, marching them up along the coaſt, and attacked it with great intrepidity; but the garriſon was ſo numerous, and the want of proviſions ſo great in his camp, that he was conſtrained to raiſe the ſiege, with the loſs of ſeven hundred men, and retire to Zara. From hence he ſent ten gallies to Albania to ſummon the garriſon to ſurrender, with which they immediately complied, fearing the fate of Sicco and Catharra. a Famine in Piſani's fleet.

In the mean time the doge and ſenate, hearing of the retreat from Trahu, and of the famine in the fleet, ſent five gallies with proviſions, and orders to Piſani to return to Trahu, and either ſtarve or force the garriſon to ſurrender. Piſani, in obedience to his orders, made a ſecond attempt, much againſt his inclination, which proving unſucceſsful he ſailed to Iſtria, and there expected orders either to winter or return with the fleet to Venice. The former was the reſolution of the republic, and a pernicious one in effect; for the cold was ſo extreme, and the dearth ſo great, that not half the crews ſurvived the winter. In the ſpring a reinforcement of eleven gallies, and great ſtore of proviſion and ammunition were ſent: this ſupply enabled Piſani to put to ſea early: but he was ſcarce a day's ſailing from the coaſt, b

A. D. 1379. when a terrible ſtorm diſperſed the fleet. The admiral, however, had the good fortune to unite the fleet on the coaſt of Apulia, where in a few days he deſcried the Genoeſe ſquadron, conſiſting of fifteen gallies. Orders were immediately iſſued to give chaſe, and in the evening the Venetians were near enough to engage the enemy, who not chuſing to hazard a battle diſperſed themſelves and bore away. Piſani, however, fell in with a part of the ſquadron, and forced an engagement, in which the Genoeſe admiral was killed by an arrow, and ſeveral ſhips taken.

This good fortune did not continue long; for he was defeated by the Genoeſe, with the loſs of a great part of his fleet. Piſani fought with all imaginable courage and conduct; but he fell into an ambuſcade laid by the enemy, through which he would have made his c

Piſani impriſoned. way, had he not baſely been deſerted by five of his gallies. He was recalled by the doge and ſenate, mulcted in a ſum of money, and the captains of the gallies heavily fined and impriſoned. The people, who adored the generoſity and bravery of Piſani, murmured greatly at his unmerited puniſhment: they had publicly declared that envy rather than the public good actuated the ſenators; that many attempts had been made to ruin the glory of this hero, whoſe character was too exalted to be regarded with candor by narrow minds.

While the republic was thus divided, the Genoeſe reaped the fruits of her diſſentions. Caorli and Grada fell into their hands; the Venetian trade, protected only by ſix gallies under Zeno, ſuffered conſiderably, ſeveral of the richeſt merchant-men having been taken. Paleſtrina the Genoeſe took by aſſault, and they were now beſieging Chioggia, after having al- d

Chioggia taken. ready deſtroyed the ſuburbs, and ſeized upon Little Chioggia. The garriſon made ſo many vigorous ſallies, and diſputed every inch of ground with ſuch obſtinacy, that the enemy were obliged to quit the ſiege. They ſoon after returned, and took the city by ſurprize, putting the whole garriſon to the ſword, except Hemo the governor, and about fifty officers, who retiring into the palace, defended it ſo bravely, that the Genoeſe were glad to grant them an honourable capitulation. The ſlaughter here was prodigious, no leſs than ſeven thouſand citizens and ſoldiers were ſlain during the ſiege, and near an equal number made priſoners [p]. Carrario, we are told, aſſiſted at the taking of this important city, and behaved with all the cruelty and inſolence of a tyrant unuſed to conqueſt: ſome of the priſoners of the firſt diſtinction he ordered to be whipt almoſt to death, and afterwards hanged; others e were barbarouſly maimed and confined to dungeons upon bread and water. In every inſtance he gratified his natural diſpoſition, and ſatiated his revenge by the moſt wanton, ſavage, and inhuman cruelty.

When the news of this loſs, and the maſſacre of the priſoners, arrived at Venice, the people roſe up in the moſt tumultuous manner, threatened the doge and ſenate, and refuſed to enliſt themſelves for the defence of a city in which they ſaid they were ſlaves to caprice, ignorance, and cowardice: they were not to be appeaſed by any authority, until Piſani was ſet at liberty, whom they looked upon as the bulwark of the republic, and the only prop able him to his former employments. The joy of the people was extreme; nothing but ſhouting, bonfires, and demonſtrations of gladneſs were to be ſeen or heard: the tide of paſſion run ſo ſtrong, that the influence of Piſani was equally neceſſary to moderate their joy, as his liberty had been to appeaſe their reſentment. When he came forth from his priſon, the tumult, noiſe, and diſturbance redoubled; the whole city flocked together to behold the ſuffering hero; every one preſſed with an eagerneſs to touch him, inſomuch that Piſani, who had juſt been delivered from the hatred of the ſenate, was near falling a ſacrifice to the love of the people: at length, getting poſſeſſion of a little eminence, he addreſſed the crowd with a dignity ſo commanding, and an eloquence ſo perſuaſive, that upon his promiſe to accept of their ſervices, which they ſo earneſtly preſſed, they ſeparated and retired [r]. Piſani then returned to his priſon, where he ſpent the night with his confeſſor: on the morning a he went to the palace to maſs, and to receive the ſacrament; then he waited upon the ſenate, and threw himſelf at the doge's feet, who raiſing him up addreſſed him thus: "You were im-

" priſoned, Victor, by our orders, for the loſs ſuſtained by the republic at Pola, under your " conduct; you are releaſed that you may repair the diſgrace. Reſtrain your fire, exert
" your judgment, and uſe caution, without which the greateſt virtues in a general are but
" ſplendid vices, which often terminate in his own ſhame, and the ruin of his country.
" Go! and may you prove equally the terror of her enemies, as you are the darling of the " republic[s]." Piſani anſwered with modeſty, took his leave, and then retired to his own houſe, where he was crowded by the citizens, entreating him to enter their names for the ſervice, to accept of their fortunes to equip the fleet, and their lives to fight for him and b their country. In the ſpace of three days ſix gallies were rigged, manned, and ready to put to ſea. Piſani then held a conference with the principal officers, in which it was determined that a ſtrong brick wall ſhould be run croſs the mouth of the haven, each end fortified with a tower, well garriſoned, to prevent the entrance of the Genoeſe, whom they every day expected. Several other works were raiſed round the city by Piſani's advice, and the charge of the whole committed to Caballa, an eminent ſoldier[t] (A).

Zeal of the people.

DURING theſe preparations a number of adventurers, in ſmall boats, made incurſions up the channels leading to Chioggia, ſurpriſed a number of Genoeſe traders, and intirely blocked the city up on that quarter. The garriſon, apprehending that a ſcarcity of proviſions would enſue, if a ſtop was not put to theſe proceedings, ſent notice of their ſituation to Do- c ria, the Genoeſe admiral; upon which he came with a ſtrong ſquadron to Malamoc, built a fort there, and landed his troops on the oppoſite ſide to beſiege Poveggia. As ſoon as the Venetians were acquainted with the enemy's approach, they ſhut up the channels towards Chioggia, by ſinking large ſhips in the narroweſt paſſages: here daily skirmiſhes paſſed between the light boats of each ſide, while Juſtiniano, who commanded five gallies, ſo annoyed the workmen at Malamoc, that they were unable to proceed in building the fort. Brisk encounters happened almoſt every day upon ſhore, in which Caballa had always the advantage over the enemy, both from his military abilities, and from the courage of his troops: however, the people were diſſatisfied, they complained of being pent up by an enemy they had often conquered in the field and upon the ocean; an enemy, who but a little before
d was not in poſſeſſion even of a retreat to ſculk in from their victorious arms; they demanded a general action, which might at once bring either death or liberty; they were equally ſanguine in their hopes, and ignorant of the means of obtaining victory. The doge and ſenate were pleaſed to ſee this forward humour of the people, and, to indulge them, ordered a fleet of forty gallies to be got ready. Some authors affirm, that ſo great was the alacrity with which the people enrolled themſelves, and the artificers worked, that thirty-four ſail were complete for action, and well manned, in the ſpace of a week[u]. Prince Contareni took upon himſelf the command, appointed the officers, ſaw the troops diſciplined, and the rowers inſtructed in their duty: by this means he hoped not only to appeaſe the people until the arrival of Zeno, who was ſoon expected with twenty ſail, but by that time to breed up ſoldiers e and mariners fit to diſpute victory with the enemy.

New works raiſed to oppoſe the Genoeſe.

Venice blocked up by the Genoeſe.

DURING theſe tranſactions at Venice, Charles, ſon of Lewis of Hungary, ſat down before Treviſo with an army of fourteen thouſand men: here commiſſioners were ſent by the republic to treat of a peace, it being reported that Charles had full powers from his father to negociate one upon any terms he thought fit: Carrario prince of Padua, and the Genoeſe ambaſſadors came likewiſe to the camp. When the Venetian commiſſioners had their audience, the terms propoſed were ſo hard, unreaſonable, and ſervile, that they determined to hazard all rather than comply with them. Breaking off the conference abruptly, they returned home and acquainted the republic with the extravagant conditions propoſed, which excited a ſpirit of reſentment in every breaſt, from the doge down to the meaneſt plebeian: this, and the f ſcarcity of proviſions which began to prevail, made the people ſo eager to engage, that the doge thought it dangerous longer to reſtrain their impetuoſity[w]. A decree was now publiſhed, entitling thirty of thoſe who ſhould beſt ſupply the fleet with money and proviſions, to the privileges of ſenators, and the rank of nobility, which honour ſhould deſcend to their poſterity: five thouſand crowns were farther decreed to be yearly diſtributed to thoſe who by ſmaller ſervices ſhould diſtinguiſh their liberality and affection for the republic.

THE Genoeſe having notice of the great preparations in the city thought fit to raiſe the ſiege, and retire to Chioggia, from whence they could deprive it of all ſuccour by ſea or land, and thus ſtarve the Venetians into ſubmiſſion. Intelligence being received in Venice of their intention,

intention, Victor Piſani propoſed to moleſt them in their retreat: for this purpoſe he lay concealed in the night, with three hundred ſmall boats, in a bay near the enemy, with intention to attack them next morning while they were buſied in deſtroying Malamoc, and breaking up their camp; but his deſign being diſcovered, a great number of gallies bore down upon him, which produced a ſharp action, to the diſadvantage of Piſani, who was quite expoſed to the enemy's arrows: he retreated in the beſt manner he was able, leaving the victory undiſputed to the enemy [x]. a

ALL this time Carolo Zeno was laying waſte the Genoeſe dominions to the very gates of the city, taking their ſhips, and ruining their trade, without a thought of the diſtreſs to which his country was reduced in his abſence. On advice of the ſiege he immediately crowded ſail; but before his arrival Venice was ſo much diſtreſſed, that the doge reſolved to run all hazards for its relief. Sailing with twenty gallies, he beat off the ſhips poſted for the defence of the harbour of Chioggia, and then ſunk ſome large ſhips to prevent the enemy from coming out to cut off the convoys. When the Venetian troops were landed, an action enſued with the enemy, who advanced from Chioggia to give them battle; but the latter was ſo ſtrongly ſupported by freſh troops, that the Venetians were forced to quit the field with precipitation and take to their ſhips: the doge, undaunted with this defeat, ſent Cornaro to block up the paſſages to Chioggia by Brondelli, which was effected without the loſs of a man, although the enemy endeavoured to prevent it: thus the Genoeſe in Chioggia were as cloſely beſet as the Venetians lately had been. Several battles were fought in the haven, in moſt of which the Venetians were victorious [y]. b

NOTWITHSTANDING this advantage, the troops, pinched with cold and hunger, began to murmur, to appeaſe which the authority of the doge and credit of Piſani were ſcarce ſufficient, when Zeno unexpectedly arrived, to the great joy of the fleet. The ſenate had no ſooner deſcried him from the ſhore, than they ſent him orders to join the prince at Chioggia without ſlackening ſail. The public ſatisfaction was greatly encreaſed when it was known he had ſunk about ſixty, and taken near three hundred of the enemy's ſhips, ſome of them richly laden [z]. c

Now the Genoeſe were cloſely inveſted, and their ſole endeavour was to contrive the means of eſcape; for this purpoſe ſeveral feints were made, and at length a ſally, which terminated in a general engagement, where both ſides fought with extreme bravery and conduct. At laſt the Genoeſe were totally defeated and driven back within their walls, with the loſs of three thouſand men killed and taken, among which was Doria the admiral, and ſeveral of their beſt officers [a]. Next day Piſani took, burnt, or ſunk ten gallies, which were placed for the defence of the paſs of Brondelli, which the beſieged had recovered a little before the late action. The enemy were now ſo cloſely inveſted, that no hopes of eſcaping or relief remained but from Genoa.

THEY had made ſome overtures to ſurrender the town, which were rejected by the doge, when they received intelligence of a powerful fleet's being under ſail for their relief: this gave the beſieged freſh courage, and ſeveral ſallies were made with doubtful ſucceſs. Famine, however, pinched ſo ſeverely that, quite ſpent with fatigue, and worn out with hunger, they ſent ambaſſadors to the doge to ſolicit that they might be allowed the common privileges of priſoners of war. Their requeſt was granted, and articles ſigned; upon which the Venetians took poſſeſſion of Chioggia, after it had been in the hands of the Genoeſe for above a year [b]. e

THUS Venice was delivered from a ſiege in which it had ſuffered all the miſeries of want, civil diſcord, and defeats, for the ſpace of nine months. It was remarkable that both cities were in a manner blocked up at the ſame time. The Genoeſe cut off all communication with the continent from Venice, and reduced it to great ſtraits, at the very time when themſelves were blocked up and brought to the utmoſt extremity in Chioggia.

A. D. 1380. Bebia taken.

THE doge, willing to purſue his good fortune, ſent a detachment to beſiege Bebia, thereby to open a communication for the merchants of the republic to trade into Lombardy. It was taken after a tedious ſiege, and the garriſon made priſoners. f

IN the mean time the Iſtrians revolted, at the ſolicitation of the Forlians, and put themſelves under the protection of the Genoeſe. The capital having firſt taken arms ſeized on the palace, on the perſon of the governor, and on all the Venetians reſiding in the city, whom they plundered and impriſoned. The doge had juſt returned to Venice, after ſettling the affairs of Chioggia, when intelligence of this rebellion was received: the ſame day came the news of the Iſtrians having delivered up the forts to be garriſoned by Genoeſe, which encreaſed the people's uneaſineſs. The enemy's ſtrength immediately ſuggeſted to the Venetians the difficulty of recovering ſo valuable a province: however, the doge and ſenate were not diſcouraged, but began to make all poſſible preparations for recovering their loſs. g a In the mean time farther advice was received, that the Genoeſe had reſtored it to the patriarch of Aquileia, after they were defeated in their attempt to reduce the ſtrong fortreſs of Piana, and the little town of Parenza: they were likewiſe informed of the ſucceſs of the enemy at Pola, which city they had taken, plundered, and laid in aſhes [c]. This intelligence quickened the preparations at Venice, and made the army paſs ſooner into Iſtria than at firſt was intended. Upon the arrival of the Venetians at Pola the enemy retired to Zara, whither Piſani did not think proper to purſue them at that time: he ſent Delfino and Maripietro, with two gallies, to examine the condition of Cap-Iſtria, the firſt city which had revolted. Under favour of the night they broke down a bridge, which the patriarch of Aquileia had built between the city and the continent, by which means it was cut off from all ſuccours. In the

b morning the two gallies were joined by a ſquadron the admiral had ſent to reinforce them, upon which the attack began upon the town: it was conducted with ſo much reſolution that the garriſon ſued for quarter, ſubmitting themſelves at diſcretion: four hundred priſoners were made, the houſes of the Forlians plundered and deſtroyed, and the city committed to the care of the original inhabitants, ſupported by ſome companies of Venetians [d].

Cap-Iſtria taken by the Venetians.

THE Genoeſe were not idle in the mean time; they ſailed to Scardona, and, after a tedious ſiege, forced the city Arbo to ſurrender. Chinatius tells us, that ſo ſtrong was the fidelity of the inhabitants to the Venetians, that they ſupported all the hardſhips of a cruel famine, living for a great while on the moſt nauſeous animals: their bravery was generouſly rewarded with liberty by the Genoeſe, upon their promiſe not to moleſt the garriſon.

c ABOUT this time the Paduans laid ſiege to Treviſo, which was ſoon reduced to great extremities, all the paſſages by which the garriſon could receive ſuccour having been cloſely blocked up by Carrario. Two days were employed by the Venetians in attempting to force the enemy's works, during which they paſſed continual engagements: at laſt the enterprize was dropt, and the fleet returned with the loſs of a great number of men, although it was thought it did not equal the number of ſlain among the enemy. The ſcarcity of proviſions was now ſo great within the town, that a meaſure of wheat ſold for five crowns, and every other article of food at a proportionable price; yet the garriſon was reſolved to hold out to the laſt, although they were deſerted by numbers of the townſmen, who eſcaped to Venice [e]. The republic finding it impoſſible to ſuccour the beſieged, and fearing that it muſt ſhortly
d fall into the enemy's hands, thought of delivering it up to the duke of Auſtria, who might perhaps be induced by ſo valuable an acquiſition to make war in favour of the Venetians. Commiſſioners for this purpoſe were ſent to treat with him, which coming to the knowledge of the garriſon the ſoldiers began to mutiny: long arrears were due to them on account of the low ſtate of the Venetian exchequer; they demanded that either the governor, or one of the proveditors ſhould go to Venice, and repreſent their grievances to the doge and ſenate, aſſuring him that they might be implicitly relied on during his abſence. Dandolo was forced to comply, and the ſenate found means to raiſe their pay, which was remitted by the governor, and the mutineers appeaſed [f].

Paduans beſiege Treviſo.

LEOPOLD of Auſtria accepted the propoſals made to him, and accordingly ſent a detach-
e ment to take poſſeſſion of Treviſo, imagining the Paduans and Carrario would raiſe the ſiege when they were informed it belonged to a neutral prince: but being diſappointed in this expectation, he marched into Italy with a body of ten thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe to its relief. Buccenairo, Carrario's brother, who commanded the ſiege, hearing of his approach, ſent ambaſſadors to treat with him. Theſe the duke refuſed to ſee, contenting himſelf with acquainting them by a ſervant, that he would next day talk to their maſter. This haughty meſſage being reported to Buccenairo, he inſtantly broke up his camp, and retired from Treviſo, not being in a condition to ſtand an engagement. Thus was Treviſo delivered from a ſiege, and the Venetians deprived of their beſt city and province upon the continent [g].

f DURING this ſiege Piſani died as he lay with the fleet at Manfredonia. This great man was lamented as the protector and father of the people; he was ſo much beloved, that had not his moderation and prudence been equal to his other virtues, he might have been taken from priſon to be ſeated upon a throne, with abſolute power in Venice. Piſani was no leſs diligent in avoiding honours than others in acquiring them: he ſerved his country, gained the love of the people, and the eſteem of all men, from a principle of duty, and a natural ſweetneſs of diſpoſition. His bravery, his generoſity, and his popularity, had incurred the jealouſy of the ſenate; but his modeſty, his zeal for the republic, and his patriot ſpirit, ſoon made converts of thoſe who were moſt deſirous of his ruin. At his death he was equally beloved, eſteemed, and regretted by the doge, the ſenate, and the people. His body was carried to Venice, and interred with great pomp at the public expence, attended by the doge in perſon, all the nobility in mourning, and crowds of common people: an honour never before conferred upon a private citizen. Hardly an eye in Venice, ſays Sabellicus, but wept, or a breaſt but heaved with ſighs; never were funeral obſequies performed with grief more ſincere, more deſerving, or more general, Piſani being at the ſame time the child, the friend, and the patron of his country [h]. a

LODOVICO LORETANO, as the next in rank in the fleet, taking upon him the command, immediately ſteered for the coaſt of Livornia. Here by aſſault he took and deſtroyed the towns of Senia and Breſcia, carrying off ſome rich booty. At the report of his approach, the Goretani ſubmitted to the republic, and ſent their biſhop on board the admiral, to requeſt that their city might be ſaved from the ravages of the ſoldiers; with which Loretano complied. Upon his arrival at Pola, he was acquainted, by letters from the ſenate, that Carolo Zeno was appointed to the command; which inſpired the fleet with the utmoſt joy, Zeno, next to Piſani, being the moſt popular as well as the moſt deſerving general of the republic. b

The finances of the republic were now entirely exhauſted, ſeveral garriſons had mutinied, and ſome revolted, for want of their pay. This induced the doge and ſenate to think of a peace; for this purpoſe Amadeus, duke of Savoy, was ſolicited to become mediator between the Carrarians and the republic. A negociation enſued; but hoſtilities were ſtill carried on by both parties. Zeno, upon the coaſt of Dalmatia, met a fleet of twelve Genoeſe ſhips, which he took, ſunk, and deſtroyed. Soon after he fell in with a rich merchantman near the Morea; this he ſent into Candia. Next day he got ſight of the Genoeſe grand fleet, to which he gave chace for the whole day: at night he loſt the enemy, and put in next morning to Ancona, where he left ten gallies for the defence of the city: with the reſt he reſolved to ravage the Genoeſe dominions, where he narrowly eſcaped falling into an ambuſcade. Coaſting along the ſhore two gallies were ſent to water, who diſcovering twenty-four Genoeſe gallies lying upon their oars, in a creek covered by a woody mountain, returned with immediate intelligence to Zeno. The admiral put his fleet in order of battle, expecting the enemy; but as their intention was to attack him unprepared, they made the beſt of their way towards Livornia, Zeno purſuing for two days, until he loſt ſight of them [i]. c

Cap-Iſtria taken by the Genoeſe.

In Zeno's abſence another Genoeſe fleet attacked Cap-Iſtria, and in the ſpace of two days compelled the garriſon to ſurrender at diſcretion.

Peace concluded.

At laſt, by the good offices of Amadeus a general peace was concluded ſix years and four months after hoſtilities had firſt commenced, and four years after the declaration of war: d

the conditions were, that the priſoners ſhould mutually be releaſed; that Carrario ſhould reſtore all the cities, towns, and forts taken from the Venetians during the war; that the diſpute between the Paduans and the republic about their boundaries ſhould be left to the arbitration of Alberto D'Æſte; that the Venetians ſhould withdraw their garriſon from Tenedos, and put the iſland for two years into the hands of Amadeus, to be ſupported at the reciprocal expence of the two republics; that at the expiration of that term the fort ſhould be razed, the iſland reſtored to the empire, both parties for ever renouncing their claims; that neither republic ſhould trade to the river Tanais; that the Venetians ſhould pay to Lewis a ſubſidy of one thouſand crowns for ten years, as an equivalent for his ſuppreſſing pirates in Dalmatia, and preventing the manufacture of ſalt among the Sclavonians and Dalmatians. Theſe conditions being ſigned by all parties, Amadeus and the Florentines taking upon them to be guarantees of the treaty, peace was proclaimed in the dominions of each ſtate, and notified to all the other potentates of Europe. The priſoners on both ſides were in a deplorable ſituation, above two thirds having periſhed from the filth and ſtench of the jails; the remainder were ſickly, half-ſtarved, and quite naked. The Venetian matrons made a collection, to a conſiderable amount, to cloath the Genoeſe priſoners, and defray their expences home; an act of generoſity which, we are told by the Venetian writers, was by no means imitated at Genoa [k]. There the priſoners were turned out, loaded with diſeaſe, famiſhed, and naked, ſuffered to beg their way home, and, what was ſtill more barbarous, reviled, buffeted, and abuſed through the ſtreets. e f

A. D. 1381. This year, according to Sanſovino, died Contareni the doge, after he had governed the ſtate for fifteen years and four months. Sabellicus, and the other hiſtorians we conſult, place his death the year after the concluſion of the peace; but Sanſovino's account beſt accords with the chronology of the doges. Andrea Contareni was a man of ſtrong natural talents, rough, and unpoliſhed; of a ſaturnine, ſevere, and moroſe temper; which diſpoſition, the misfortune of being involved in a tedious and dangerous war encreaſed: he was, however, a good prince, who commanded the eſteem without ever gaining or even affecting the love of his ſubjects [l].

MICHELI MOROSINI, Doge LXI.

CONTARENI was ſucceeded by Micheli, or Michael Moroſini, a prince well qualified for promoting the arts of peace, filling the exhauſted exchequer, and reviving induſtry and commerce, which had long languiſhed almoſt to extinction under the laſt adminiſtration; but the republic was robbed by death of this valuable governor, after a ſhort ſway of four months. We are told, that in this time ſeveral excellent laws were framed, and regulations eſtabliſhed, under the auſpices of Moroſini; but hiſtory does not deſcend to particulars [a].

ANTONIO VENIERO, Doge LXII.

ANTONIO VENIERO, much eſteemed for his intregity, lenity, and gentle diſpoſition, was the next perſon promoted to fill the ducal chair. At this time he was governor of Candia, from whence he was recalled, to the great grief of the inhabitants, who enjoyed under him the moſt peaceable, flouriſhing, and happy government they had ever experienced [b].

THE preceding year, as ſoon as peace was proclaimed, the republic ſent Pantaleon Barba to Tenedos, with orders to Mutatio the governor to ſurrender the forts to Bonifacio, the commiſſioner from Savoy. The Genoeſe agent was gone there to ſee the performance of this article of the treaty, and to pay the Genoeſe quota of arrears due to the garriſon. Mutatio having received the money from Barba and the Genoeſe, for the payment of the troops, told Bonifacio and the other commiſſioners, "That the inhabitants were incenſed at that article "of the peace which ſtipulated that their fort ſhould be razed at the expiration of two years, "a circumſtance which would be the ruin of the iſland: that finding their intereſt neglected "by the Venetians, and themſelves ſacrificed to political principles, it was their determi-d "nation to take care of what concerned them ſo nearly, and to put it out of the power of "Venice, Genoa, or any other ſtate, to transfer them at pleaſure: that for this purpoſe the "inhabitants had appointed him for the protector of their liberties, which he and they were "determined to defend with the laſt drop of their blood. He, therefore, charged Bonifacio "and the commiſſioners inſtantly to depart the iſland, as they valued their lives, and not "offer to diſpute what was already reſolved [c]." Bonifacio was thunderſtruck at this diſcourſe; but the Genoeſe commiſſioner attributed the whole to the contrivance of the Venetians, who had taken this method to equivocate and fruſtrate the intention of the late treaty. The reſolutions of the ſenate ſoon convinced the Genoeſe of the falſity of their agent's ſuggeſtions, Zeno being ſent to Tenedos to uſe arguments, menaces, and even force, to compel e the iſlanders to the performance of an article which affected the honour and public faith of the republic. Zeno's arguments were ineffectual, and his ſtrength too inconſiderable: Fontano Georgio was therefore diſpatched to Tenedos with a fleet and army. On his arrival he immediately inveſted and battered the fort: frequent ſallies were made from within, ſcarcely a day paſſing without ſome bloody action. It was obſerved, that both ſides fought with more bitterneſs and enmity than common enemies: the priſoners were inſtantly hanged, or thrown inſtead of ſtones out of the baliſtæ and other military engines [d]. In ſhort, the natural animoſity between the Greeks and Italians, as well as that rancour peculiar to civil wars, were here exerted in their full force. After the ſiege had continued without interruption for ſeven months, famine prevailing within the fort, a flag of truce was waved from f the garriſon, and the following articles agreed to and ſigned: that neither Mutatio nor the inhabitants ſhould be puniſhed for the detention of the iſland; that they ſhould be ſuffered to depart with their jewels, gold, and effects; that thoſe who choſe it ſhould have land aſſigned to them in Candia of equal value with what they poſſeſſed in Tenedos; and laſtly, that ſuch as preferred reſiding at Conſtantinople or elſewhere, ſhould receive the juſt value of their lands and immoveable effects. The Venetians had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion than they razed the fort, and executed every article of the treaty [e].

The ſenate reſolves to reduce Tenedos.

THE firſt act of Veniero's government was exerted againſt his own ſon, who had carried on an intrigue for ſome time with a ſenator's wife. The lovers at laſt quarrelling, Lodovico, (ſo he was called) to revenge himſelf on his miſtreſs, procured a pair of horns to be hung g over the ſenator's door, a reproach not to be forgiven in Venice. Inquiry being made, Lodovico was found guilty of affronting a ſenator, and impriſoned by his father, where he died. Some blamed the inflexibility of the parent, while others commended the impar-

War with Carrario.

GALEAS VISCONTI and Franciſco Carrario came about this time to an open rupture. Viſconti laid cloſe ſiege to Padua, in which he was aſſiſted by the Venetians: the republic, beſides fitting out four hundred light boats, ſeized upon all the forts, caſtles, and towns belonging to Carrario, upon the lakes and great rivers. Viſconti having forced Padua to ſurrender, took all the other cities and forts within the juriſdiction of the city, and then inveſted Treviſo, which after a bloody ſiege ſurrendered upon honourable conditions. Of theſe conqueſts Viſconti claimed to himſelf Padua, Feltre, and Belluna; the Treviſan, and city of Treviſo, with all the forts, towns, and caſtles, they had ſeized upon the lakes, were aſſigned to the Venetians[f]. b

A. D. 1383. Plague in Venice.

SOON after the cloſe of this war a plague broke out in Venice, and raged with ſo much fury as to ſweep off the inhabitants by hundreds in a day. The contagion was ſuppoſed to ariſe from infected jails, crowded with diſeaſed priſoners, or from the atmoſphere's being impregnated with putrid exhalations from the lagunes and trenches made for the defence of the city; or laſtly, from the unwholſome food which compoſed the diet of the poorer people in the late ſcarcity of proviſions: whatever were the cauſes, the effects were dreadful; neither lazarettos, maſſes, or phyſicians, could impede the fury of the diſeaſe: the cold ſeaſon and goodneſs of Providence, however, brought that relief which the art of man could not afford[g].

A. D. 1386. ALL this time the war with Carrario was purſued with the ſame vigour as before, until at laſt his forces were totally broken and diſcomfited. Viſconti was ſo puffed up with pride, and his natural inſolence ſo elated, that nothing leſs than the dominion of Italy would ſatisfy his ambition. It is true he did not venture to acknowledge deſigns ſo vaſt and dangerous, although his conduct afforded ſtrong preſumptions of ſuch an intention. Quitting Padua, he marched with great diligence to Mantua, and, without any provocation, laid cloſe ſiege to the city. This produced a league between the Florentines, Bologneſe, Franciſco Gonzaga, and Novello, ſon to Carrario, in order to ſtop the rapid progreſs of this proud conqueror. The Venetians likewiſe broke off from his alliance, and, though not included in the league, were the firſt to ſuccour Mantua. The republic could not behold a confederate city thus wantonly oppreſſed, without oppoſing her influence. Intreaties were firſt uſed; but theſe producing no alteration in Viſconti's conduct, the Venetians had recourſe to force: a great number of boats were got ready, to which were joined twenty gallies, filled with archers, ſlingers, and light armed troops, with which they attacked Viſconti, and after a ſharp encounter compelled him to raiſe the ſiege. Soon after the duke was met by Malateſta, general of the confederate army, who engaged and defeated his army, obliging him to quit the Mantuan territories. Viſconti ſent ambaſſadors to Venice with propoſals for an accommodation, which were readily accepted[h]. They had taken arms to preſerve the juſt ballance of power in Italy; the duke's deſigns being defeated, they laid them down readily, and concluded peace for ten years. c d

Peace with Viſconti.

DURING this happy period of repoſe, the doge applied himſelf diligently to the civil affairs of the ſtate: granaries were formed to provide againſt a dearth; magazines for arms and all ſorts of warlike neceſſaries were erected; new docks for the ſhipping contrived; hoſpitals for the poor, and thoſe who had ſuffered in the ſervice of the republic, founded; workmen in all arts and profeſſions encouraged; induſtry and commerce cheriſhed; and laws tending to the regulation and order of ſociety, framed and rigidly executed. Afterwards, Antonio Veniero died, much lamented by a people whom he had governed for eighteen years, with inflexible juſtice, incorruptible integrity, unwearied application and vigilance, and laſtly, with a lenity, ſweetneſs, and moderation, that falſified the firſt judgment formed of his character (A). e

MICHELI STENO, Doge LXIII. f

Steno doge LXIII.

MICHELI STENO was ſubſtituted in the room of the deceaſed doge: he had been procurator of St. Mark's for ſome years, which truſt he diſcharged with ſuch fidelity, that the ſenate and council were induced to raiſe him to the higheſt office of the republic. At the time of his election Steno was confined to his bed with an illneſs, which kept the ducal chair vacant for near two months, at the expiration of which he came to the palace and took the uſual oaths. Unprecedented honours were beſtowed upon him, though we are not informed for what particular reaſon: probable it is, that the flouriſhing ſtate of commerce and manufactures began to produce the usual effects, luxury, which is ever the consequence of prosperity and affluence. Sansovino relates, that Steno's lady was conducted to the palace, attended by the senate and chief magistrates, with all possible pomp and magnificence [i].

(A) Sanſovino mentions the reduction of Corfu in the laſt year of Veniero, of which we find not a ſyllable in any other hiſtorian. He likewiſe ſpeaks of another plague which appeared in the ſummer 1388, and raged with a violence little inferior to the former; neither is this aſſertion confirmed by other authorities.

The two first years of Steno's government passed in peace, quietness, and tranquility at home and abroad, when suddenly a new cause of rupture with the Genoese arose. Intelligence was received that great preparations for war were carrying on at Genoa, and these the republic doubted not were destined against Venice, although the pretext was a quarrel with the Cyprians: Carolo Zeno was therefore sent with a squadron of eleven gallies narrowly to watch the motions of the Genoese fleet, and prevent their surprising any place belonging to the republic. The fleets were several days in company, each admiral dissembling his intention: the Genoese were commanded by Boucicault, a Frenchman, (for at that time they were under the protection of France) all the ships were well manned, each galley having, besides her complement, forty Frenchmen at arms. At last the two admirals came to blows near Modon, Zeno apprehending that the Genoese were only watching their opportunity to give him the slip, and attack some part of the Venetian territories. An obstinate battle was continued for the whole day, and Zeno in danger of being oppressed by numbers, when he was seasonably reinforced by two gallies: now the engagement was renewed with fresh vigour until night interposed, and gave the combatants respite: as soon as dawn appeared, both admirals returned to the charge with redoubled animosity. Heaps of slain were thrown over board on both sides, and the battle seemed equal, until Zeno, crowding sail, and taking a sweep, ran full upon the opposite ship, and sunk her with the impetuosity and rapidity of his course. Several of his officers followed his example with equal success, which immediately turned the scale of fortune, and gained a complete victory. The Genoese lost near three thousand men, four ships were sunk, and three taken. Certain Venetian captains were broke, upon Zeno's report of their conduct, which he attributed either to treachery or cowardice; others were rewarded for their remarkable bravery [k].

Genoese defeated by Zeno. A. D. 1403.

In the mean time the republic found herself in danger of a war on the continent with Novello Carrario of Padua. Unmindful of his obligations to the Venetians, and that he owed his present greatness to their good offices, he was constantly contriving and intriguing to the prejudice of the republic. The doge and senate were not ignorant how he stood affected to them, and their suspicions were confirmed by the report of several Genoese prisoners of distinction, who scrupled not to declare, that the preparations at Genoa were made in consequence of his advice and instigation. However, they still would have preserved appearances with Novello, if they had not been induced to enter upon a war with him upon other motives than his dislike to the republic.

War with Carrario.

CARRARIO had laid siege to Vicenza, the inhabitants of which detesting the dominion of his family, resolved to suffer the greatest extremities rather than submit. Finding themselves hard pressed, they sent to solicit assistance from Katharine dowager of Milan, and widow of Galeas Visconti their natural superior: but the dutchess was involved in other affairs, which deprived her of the power of relieving them; she, therefore, with the advice of her council, thought it more advisable to put Verona, Vicenza, Belluna, Bassan, Cologna, Feltre, and their dependencies, into the hands of the Venetian republic, than to have them exposed to the ambition of Carrario. With this proposal, and the keys of Vicenza, commissioners were sent by the besieged to the doge and senate: they were entertained with all possible respect, and dismissed with presents and assurances of speedy protection. An ambassador was accordingly sent to prevail on Carrario to relinquish the siege, or to denounce war; but instead of regarding their intreaties or menaces, he ordered the nose and ears of the ambassador to be cut off, charging him to tell his masters that he was not to have laws prescribed to him by citizens and merchants. The republic, incensed at the insolence of the tyrant, and this violation of the laws of nations, levied forces with all expedition, appointed Carolo Malatesta of Arimini their general, and entered into an alliance with Francisco Gonzaga. In the mean while the doge received the homage of Belluna, Bassan, and Feltre [l]. As soon as the levies were complete Malatesta took the field, fought several battles with various success, and at the end of the campain returned to Venice to resign his commission: we are not told upon what occasion. Paolo Sabello, a native of Rome, was appointed to succeed, whose valour and experience were so universally acknowleged, that no Venetian envied his promotion, or disputed his superior merit. Sabello entered upon action early in the season, and gave proofs of what consequence to the best disciplined army the vigilance, prudence, and bravery of a general may prove. Blondus and Sabellicus relate prodigies of him; every motion shewing the close, the artful, and the penetrating politician and commander, equally irreſiſtible by ſtratagem and intrepidity. Under his conduct ſeveral important places were taken in ſight of a ſuperior army; the enemy were as often defeated as they engaged, and the whole country of Padua, and territories of Carrario, laid under contribution; yet his inſolence and cruelty remained invincible [m]. a

He was now joined by Albert d'Æſte, won by the large promiſes of Carrario to declare war againſt the republic. A new army, under the command of Gonzaga, was ſent againſt him, which ſoon compelled Albert to ſue for peace, and give hoſtages that he would not join the enemy during this war; likewiſe that he would deſtroy the ſalt-works at Commachio, which, it would ſeem, interfered with that branch of the Venetian commerce.

To return to the affairs of Padua: Sabello's camp was unexpectedly attacked in the night by Tertius, the ſecond ſon of Franciſco Carrario, at the head of a ſtrong body of choſen troops. b The onſet was ſo ſudden and vigorous, that the whole camp was in the utmoſt conſternation and confuſion, the ſoldiers running up and down terrified and half aſleep: Sabello alone was calm and undaunted: with an unparalleled preſence of mind he diſpoſed the troops into their proper ranks, harangued, and led them to the charge. Tertius, unable to reſiſt his impetuoſity, and finding that his attempt of taking Sabello unprepared was fruſtrated, retreated with great precipitation, and conſiderable loſs. Sabello then marched againſt the enemy, with a reſolution to bring them to a general action, which he effected by the force of ſtratagem and ſuperior capacity: he ſo hemmed Carrario up that he was under the neceſſity of fighting, or ſurrendering at diſcretion. The firſt was his choice; he was defeated with prodigious ſlaughter, and very narrowly eſcaped being made priſoner. Sundry c other advantages Sabello gained over the enemy, when, in the full career of glory, he was ſeized with a fever of which he died ſuddenly.

The army was now given in charge to Galeas Grumella of Mantua, who neglected nothing that became a good officer. The Veroneſe, of which Carrario made himſelf maſter in the firſt campaign, was deſolated with all the horrors of war. The city of Verona, where Jacomo Carrario commanded, was inveſted and carried after a briſk ſiege: a day before the ſurrender of the city Jacomo made his eſcape, but was overtaken on the banks of the Po.

Padua beſieged by the Venetians.

GRUMELLO next inveſted Padua, and encamping his army on the Terra Nigra, he kept the Paduans under continual alarms. Carrario in the mean time exerted himſelf with great diligence and capacity, omitting nothing that could tend to the defence of the city, or d annoyance of the beſiegers. Day and night he was continually in action, repairing breaches, relieving guards, and ſallying out upon the beſiegers: he had likewiſe found means to corrupt ſeveral officers in the Venetian camp, and by their means received intelligence of every thing tranſacted or intended; but a ſtop was ſoon put to this treachery, Maſſolerio having been detected tying a letter to the head of an arrow. Some others were arreſted on ſuſpicion of holding a correſpondence, and ſent to Venice to be tried, where they were condemned to the moſt excruciating tortures. Carrario being cut off from all communication with the camp, by the death of his correſpondents, fell upon another ſtratagem to penetrate into the deſigns and ſituation of the Venetians: he ſent for a ſafe-conduct to the camp, as if he intended to make propoſals. It appeared on his arrival in the camp, from the extravagant e

A. D. 1405. propoſitions he made, that peace was not his view: however, the following conditions were offered him by the Venetian general; that Padua ſhould be ſurrendered, and Carrario be permitted to carry off his money, jewels, plate, furniture, and rich moveables; that he ſhould remove to the diſtance of an hundred miles from the Paduan diſtricts with his whole family, renouncing for ever all claim to the city and its dependencies; and that in conſideration the republic would preſent him with the ſum of ſixty thouſand crowns. Theſe terms Carrario rejected with diſdain, and returned under an eſcort to the city. Now the ſiege was puſhed with extraordinary vigour, and the city battered in ſeveral places: the firſt wall (for Padua was ſecured by three walls) was taken by ſcalade, and ſeveral breaches made in the ſecond. Upon this Carrario entreated the Venetians to receive himſelf and family into their protec- f tion; but he was referred to the ſenate, and told that poſſibly his tears and penitence might procure more favour than he could expect. He then deſired a paſſport to Venice, but was anſwered, that the republic would ſend commiſſioners to treat with him at Meſtra [n]. The parties having met, the conditions were debated for two days; at laſt they parted without coming to any concluſion, and Carrario returned to the city, where he was received with great coldneſs by the inhabitants, who were tired of his tyranny, and attributed to his pride the breach of the conferences, from which they at leaſt expected to be delivered from the miſeries of a ſiege. Carrario perceiving that no hopes of ſecurity remained, ſent to the Venetian general, requeſting protection for himſelf and family. Inſolence in proſperity is ever the ſure mark of meanneſs in adverſity. Carrario now cringed, ſupplicated with tears, g a and implored the protection of thoſe very perſons he had ſo haughtily treated in the beginning of the war. Himſelf and family were brought to Venice, and treated with a lenity and reſpect his conduct little merited. Padua was ſurrendered upon no other conditions than that it ſhould be exempted from the ravages of the ſoldiers [o]. Thus ended that bloody war in which the republic had been engaged on the continent; and the ſway of a tyrant, ambitious of power only to abuſe it by inſolence.

THE republic now began to taſte the ſweets of peace, which was ſoon poiſoned by the intriguing reſtleſs ſpirit of Carrario, who thereby accelerated his own ruin, and occaſioned the extinction of his family. He had projected the means of his eſcape by ſetting fire to the city in ſeveral places: a number of villains were employed for this purpoſe, and induced to b the undertaking by that very money which the public allowed him for the ſupport of his dignity. The plot being diſcovered, Carrario and his family were removed into different priſons, all his adherents baniſhed the city, and a ſtrict guard maintained; but this proving inſufficient againſt his ingratitude and treachery, he and his children were by order of the doge and ſenate ſtrangled, and the ſecurity of the republic eſtabliſhed [p].

Peace reſtored.

Carrario and his family ſtrangled.

THE expences of this war with Carrario exceeded two millions of money; but the republic received a valuable conſideration by the acquiſition of Padua, Verona, Belluna, Vicenza, Colognia, and Feltre, with their appendages [q]. Hence the Venetians became more powerful on the continent, and their armies reſpectable as well as their fleets.

AT the cloſe of the war a magnificent ambaſſy came to Venice from Verona, conſiſting of c forty perſons of the firſt diſtinction in the city. The ſenate ordered a fine theatre to be erected, richly adorned, for their public reception: here the doge, attended by his whole family in their richeſt apparel, by the ſenate and magiſtrates in their robes, gave them audience. The ambaſſadors walking in proceſſion to the throne, laid the keys of the city at the feet of the doge, requeſting his acceptance, and praying that the event might be proſperous to his highneſs, to the republic, and to the city of Verona. They intreated the protection of the republic, and that his highneſs would, with his accuſtomed goodneſs, preſerve to them their liberty, their religion, and property, againſt the attacks of all tyrants, aſſuring him of their perpetual duty, affection, and fidelity. To this the doge replied, "That d "it was his and the ſenate's greateſt happineſs to be able to protect the weak, comfort the "afflicted, and reward the deſerving: that while the city of Verona preſerved her preſent "ſentiments ſhe might confidently rely on the friendſhip of the republic, and enjoy all "the bleſſings which liberty and a feee conſtitution can afford to thoſe who have juſt eſcaped "from tyranny and bondage." Then recommending juſtice, equity, and moderation, the ambaſſadors were diſmiſſed.

THE Paduans came ſoon after in the ſame manner, were treated with equal kindneſs, and diſmiſſed with ſimilar aſſurances. Thus did the republic enjoy a profound tranquility for the term of three years, during which her aſſiduous application to commerce, the marine, and army, prodigiouſly augmented her ſtrength and conſequence.

THE firſt breach of the public quiet was occaſioned by a tumult at Sabenica, the nobility e acknowleging the authority of the republic, the people that of the Hungarian monarch: the latter having taken arms drove the nobles out of the city, ſeized upon all the public offices, and aſſumed thoſe prerogatives, which by the conſtitution belonged only to the nobility. The patricians thus excluded, ſought the protection of the Venetians, on whoſe account they ſuffered. Four gallies and a body of land forces were ordered by the ſenate to paſs into Dalmatia, and lay ſiege to Sabenica, which was accordingly done, but with little ſucceſs; for the inhabitants defended themſelves ſo bravely, that the beſiegers were repulſed, and forced to relinquiſh the enterprize. A more formidable armament was next ſent, but the obſtinacy of the plebeians rendered it neceſſary to have recourſe to Ladiſlaus, to whom commiſſioners were diſpatched. After various debates the whole affair was referred to the f deciſion of the pope, the parties not being able to come to any concluſion: we are no where informed of the determination of his holineſs [r].

The Venetians purchaſe Zara.

THIS little diſturbance was ſoon followed by one of more conſequence and hazard: the Forlians, like the Sabenicans, were divided among themſelves; the nobles were deſirous that the city ſhould be under the protection and laws of Venice, while the commons preferred the juriſdiction of Ladiſlaus, or the biſhop of Aquileia. How the emperor Sigiſmund came to concern himſelf in this quarrel, we know not; all we are told is, that Pipus, a Florentine, had the emperor's inſtructions to lead an army into Italy. Upon his arrival, Frederico Savagnani and his faction retired to Venice, and Udina was put into the hands of Pipus. From hence he marched with ten thouſand horſe into the Treviſan, and took from the republic the cities of Feltre, Belluna, Sarraval, and La Mothe. Afterwards indeed he abandoned his conqueſts,

conqueſts, 'tis ſuppoſed, by force of Venetian gold, and retired to Hungary, where he ſuffered the juſt puniſhment of his corruption [s]. a

ALL the particulars of this important war, in which the republic would ſeem to be ſo deeply concerned, are imperfectly related; it is even difficult to know what ſhare the Venetian armies took in the quarrel. Sabellicus ſays, that after a variety of battles between Sigiſmund and the republic, with various ſucceſs, peace was at laſt concluded, and the emperor withdrew his army to Bohemia [t]. As to the conditions of the peace, which might have reflected ſome light on the origin of the war, there is a profound ſilence.

Peace with Sigiſmund.

SOON after peace was proclaimed Steno died, having conducted the republic with applauſe through two dangerous wars, and flouriſhing intervals of public tranquility [u]. b

TOMASO MOCENIGO, Doge LXIV.

A. D. 1413. Tomaſo Mocenigo, d. LXIV.

TOMASO MOCENIGO, at the time of his election on an embaſſy at Cremona, was recalled to take upon him the ſupreme magiſtracy. The beginning of his adminiſtration was fertile in the bleſſings of peace: he gave ſtrict attention to commercial affairs, on which he was ſenſible depended the ſtrength and proſperity of the republic. A board of trade was appointed, conſiſting of the principal merchants, preſided by a ſenator. Originally this buſineſs was in the hands of one man; afterwards two more, with a ſubordinate authority, were added; and now trade, a ſubject of vaſt extent and importance, ſubmitted to the direction of a number properly qualified by nature and experience to regulate, improve, and promote this chief object of Venetian policy (A). c

A DISPUTE between the republic and biſhop of Aquileia furniſhed the Venetians with a pretext for recovering the towns loſt in the late war: they accordingly laid ſiege to Feltre, Belluna, and other places, which they took after a ſhort reſiſtance. Filippo Arcia, one of the beſt officers of the age, commanded the Venetian army: having garriſoned the above cities, he attacked and ruined Prata, and by his influence prevailed on the whole province of Fruli to acknowledge the dominion of the republic. Early in the ſpring the biſhop returned with a numerous army of Hungarians; he took the caſtle of Cluſino, and ſome other places; but Arcia marching with expedition againſt him, the Hungarians returned to their own country, leaving the prelate to fight his own battles [w].

DURING theſe tranſactions abroad, a terrible fire broke out in the palace, which almoſt entirely conſumed it, and communicating with St. Mark's church, quite demoliſhed the roof of that magnificent fabric. The great diligence of the people prevented the fire from ſpreading; and the palace and church were repaired by a decree of the ſenate, the doge having liberally contributed towards the expence: however, before the palace was habitable, he died, after a reign of ten years, in which the republic enjoyed a current of proſperity, uninterrupted by any adverſe accident, except the fire we have mentioned [x]. Mocenigo's death was preceded by that of the illuſtrious Carolo Zeno, one of the beſt ſea officers Venice ever produced, and whoſe other excellent qualities kept pace with his valour and military abilities. d

FRANCISCO FOSCARI, Doge LXV. e

A. D. 1423. Foſcari d. LXV.

FRANCISCO FOSCARI was elected to ſucceed Mocenigo, by the univerſal voice of ſenate and people. In the firſt year of his reign Salonica, a city of Albania, voluntarily ſubmitted to the Venetians, the inhabitants requeſting that a magiſtrate might be ſent to govern them with the ſame polity eſtabliſhed at Venice: accordingly, Marino Bondomario was diſpatched in quality of governor, and with the title of count. In the ſecond year of Foſcari's adminiſtration the war with Philip Viſconti, duke of Milan, and ſon of Galeas Viſconti, commenced. As this war proved tedious, bloody, and important in its conſequences, it may not be improper to trace it to its original ſource: Philip was a minor at his father's death, and, like moſt other children in their pupilage, robbed, plundered, and oppreſſed by thoſe very guardians who were bound in honour, conſcience, and by the laws of nature, to protect his infancy: his dominions were made a prey to the neighbouring petty princes and ſtates, and in the courſe of a few years paſſed into the hands of variety of maſters. Philip was no ſooner of age to take upon him the government of the little dominion left, than he attempted to recover thoſe cities and provinces of which he was plundered in his minority. By his own valour, and the great abilities of Franciſco Carmagnola, he not only won back a what lawfully belonged to him, but greatly extended his territories beyond what the family ever poſſeſſed. In the career of victory he inveſted Genoa, reduced it to great extremities, and compelled the Genoeſe to purchaſe peace with a prodigious ſum of money, for the payment of which the Florentines were bound ſureties, the ſtrong city Leghorn, at the mouth of the river Arno, being pledged to them for their ſecurity and indemnification. The Florentines interfering in this affair produced a coldneſs between Philip and that republic, which he ſoon improved into an open rupture. Under the pretext of aſſiſting pope Martin, he attacked and defeated the Florentine army near Zagonere: this was the gloſs Philip gave this tranſaction at foreign courts, in order to conceal his ambition. Other battles were fought afterwards, until the Florentines, finding themſelves unequal to Philip's power, had b recourſe for aſſiſtance to the Venetians [y]. The republic had refrained from taking part in the quarrel, as long as there was hope that the Florentines could ſtand their ground, and with their own ſtrength check the progreſs of this conqueror; but finding the balance greatly preponderate in favour of Philip, the Venetians were induced to throw themſelves into the oppoſite ſcale, from that conſtant maxim of their government, to pay a ſtrict attention to the juſt political poiſe. Firſt they endeavoured, by repeated ambaſſies, to reconcile Philip to the Florentines, all of which, like a true politician, he received graciouſly, and diſmiſſed with ſtrong promiſes and aſſurances of what he never intended to perform. The republic was no leſs artful than Philip; under pretence of placing an intire confidence in what he ſaid, they were making all the neceſſary preparations to oblige him to make good c his aſſurances. At laſt, when every thing was in readineſs for declaring war, Paolo Cornaro was ſent to demand a categorical anſwer. Cornaro addreſſed the prince in ſubſtance to the following effect: "That of all the princes on earth his highneſs had the greateſt reaſon to "acknowledge the goodneſs of Providence by a juſt and equitable conduct, ſince, under "the protection of the Almighty, he had not only recovered, but greatly extended his law-"ful dominions: that he was quietly in poſſeſſion of a fine country, exceeded by no other "in the fertility of ſoil, the beauty of its cities, the temperature of its climate, and the inge-"nuity of its inhabitants. His youth, his activity, his valour, and prudence, he acknow-"ledged, deſerved, and were able to procure greater territories, but this could not be ef-"fected conſiſtently with that firſt principle of chriſtianity, 'do as you would be done by.'

d "It was with the utmoſt grief, he ſaid, that his maſters found themſelves under the "neceſſity of remonſtrating to him on this head, and of aſſuring him that juſtice to "their neighbours, to their allies, to themſelves, and to the precepts of their religion, "obliged them to leave no means untried to prevent the oppreſſion of the weak, and ſtem "the ambition and avarice of the more powerful: that if he did not immediately recal "his army from Tuſcany; if he did not ceaſe to moleſt the Florentines in particular, and "could not confine himſelf within the large circle of the fine dominions it had pleaſed "God to beſtow on him, they would, without farther notice, break off their alliance, "join themſelves to the Florentines, and with all the force of their republic, by ſea and "land, wage inceſſant war, until his ambition was humbled, and his power reduced with-"in proper limits [z]." Philip was ſtung with the ſpirited remonſtrance of Cornaro; but, e always ſubjecting his paſſions to his intereſt, he replied, that out of reſpect to the Venetian republic he would ſubmit the diſpute with Florence to the arbitration of Nicholas d'Æſte, whoſe integrity could not be called in queſtion. Satisfied with this anſwer, Cornaro returned to Venice, and was ſoon followed by two ambaſſadors from Viſconti. Philip had heard that the Florentines were preparing an ambaſſy to the republic; he therefore diſpatched Giovanni Aretini and Bertrand Lampugniani to fruſtrate the effects, and prevent violent reſolutions. The firſt audience was given to the Tuſcan miniſters, who pathetically repreſented all the miſeries of a free ſtate, in danger of being overwhelmed by the mercileſs and inexorable ambition of a tyrant; the duty incumbent on free conſtitutions to oppoſe, with all their might, the encroachments of ambitious princes and monarchs; an atf tack upon Florence, they ſaid was an attack upon liberty, and the prelude to an attempt on the freedom of Venice. Some little difference there was in the natural diſpoſitions of tyrants, ſome were leſs, ſome more cruel; but the invariable and fixt object of their policy in general, was the deſtruction of liberty, and eſtabliſhment of bondage. They enumerated inſtances of Philip's cunning, ſpeciouſneſs, vigilance, activity, intrepidity, and power; and from each drew arguments for the neceſſity of curbing his ambition. They concluded with a warm and pathetic exhortation, which excited violent emotions in the breaſt of every ſenator. On the one ſide the power and ambition of Philip was formidable to liberty; on the other, the expence of the war was great, and the iſſue hazardous: here the voice of liberty and compaſſion called, there fear and the dread of ſhame reſtrained. diſengage themſelves from this perplexity, before any reply was made to the Florentines, the a duke's ambaſſadors were called in, when Aretini, the moſt artful and eloquent ſpeaker of his country, addreſſed the doge and ſenate in a ſpeech ſuitable to his character. He began with engaging the affections of his audience, ſoothing their paſſions, and explaining the nature of his inſtructions: he proceeded to ſome ſevere ſtrictures upon the Florentines, to refute their aſſertions, and vindicate the meaſures and character of his maſter. "They inſtance, ſays "he, Philip of Macedon, Mithridates, and Antiochus, as implacable foes to the liberties of "Greece and Rome; but why do they omit Porſenna, who at one blow had almoſt cruſhed "in its infancy the greateſt republic on earth? for this reaſon only, that they would not re-"cal to your memory that Tuſcany had ever produced a tyrant. But if the Florentines are "fond of their erudition, why did they not likewiſe mention Hieron, Maſſiniſſa, the Ptolemies, b "and Attalus, the moſt ſtaunch and faithful allies Rome ever had? King Lewis, they ſay, "was a capital enemy to your republic, ſo was Carrario; but then the Viſconti's, for above "an hundred years, loved, cheriſhed, and eſteemed the Venetians; a perpetual intercourſe "of friendly offices, treaties, and alliances, ſubſiſted between them, and will continue to "ſubſiſt after the ſlanderous, the artful, and the falſe Florentines are annihilated and for-"got[a]." In ſhort, after running over every topic which ſound policy could ſuggeſt, or the moſt perſuaſive eloquence adorn, he concluded with referring the whole diſpute to the arbitration of the ſenate and Nicholas D'Æſte.

their firſt opinion, others were drawn over by the ſpecious oratory of Aretini. It was at laſt propoſed that Carmagnola, who had deſerted the ſervice of Philip, ſhould be called in; from him it was preſumed a juſt judgment of the true temper, policy, and character of this prince might be collected. Franciſco Carmagnola quitted the ſervice of Philip upon ſome diſguſt, the particulars of which are not mentioned: he now offered himſelf to the Venetians, to humble that very maſter he had been the inſtrument of exalting. Every one careſſed, and was deſirous of engaging the eſteem of a man famous for his military exploits, and capacity in the cabinet: ſome perſons, however, dreaded placing at the head of their armies an officer whoſe late conduct gave room to diſtruſt his conſtancy, his honour, and his fidelity: they were anſwered, that under the conduct of a general ſo experienced, ſo perfectly d acquainted with the views, policy, ſtrength, and moſt intimate ſecrets of Viſconti, they could not fail of ſucceſs in defeating all the attempts, and reſtraining the towering ambition of this proud potentate; and that Carmagnola's pride was a ſufficient ſurety of his faith, ſince without doubt he would exert all his faculties to convince Viſconti how ſerviceable he might have rendered his merit[b]. Certain it is, that Carmagnola was greatly incenſed againſt the duke: when he was called into the ſenate, he ſpoke with a rancour and virulence that could not be aſſumed or counterfeit. His arguments were ſo forcible, his oratory ſo perſuaſive, his influence ſo conſiderable, and his vehemence ſo earneſt, that, urged by the ſentiments of the doge, an alliance with Florence, and war with Viſconti, was unanimouſly reſolved[c].

Treaty with the Florentines.

In the treaty with Florence it was ſtipulated, that ſixteen thouſand horſe and eight thou- e ſand foot ſhould be levied at the common expence of both republics, to act as future occaſions ſhould require; that two fleets ſhould be equipped, the Venetian to ſail up the Po, to reſiſt the forces of Viſconti, the Florentine to ſcour the Genoeſe coaſt; that all the cities, towns, and forts, taken on the confines of Flaminia ſhould belong to Florence, the reſt to be at the diſpoſal of Venice; and laſtly, that peace ſhould not be made with the enemy but by mutual conſent and approbation. The ambaſſadors threw themſelves at the feet of the doge, proteſting, in the name of the republic, their eternal gratitude for this ſo great an obligation, calling God to witneſs the ſincerity of their thanks, and reſolution to conduct themſelves as that this goodneſs ſhould not be unmerited.

Soon after Nicholas D'Æſte, Amadeus of Savoy, Franciſco Gonzaga, and other princes, ac- f
ceded to this alliance. Serrano, one of the doge's ſenatories, was ſent to Philip to acquaint him with the determination of the republic. His inſtructions were to deſire the duke, in the name of the republic, to ceaſe hoſtilities againſt the Florentines; and, if he refuſed, immediately to declare war. The envoy was civilly received at Milan; but Philip, far from complying with his demand, ſent back a defiance. War was publicly denounced, and the ſubjects of each commanded to quit the enemy's dominions without farther notice, on pain of being deemed traitors to their reſpective countries. The command of the army was given to Carmagnola, who was eager to ſignalize his zeal by ſome exploit worthy of the high opinion entertained of his capacity. His impatience would not wait for the new army to be levied; but taking the command of a few regiments of the ſtanding forces, he marched in- g a to the enemy's territories. His firſt attempt was on Breſcia, of which he ſoon became maſter by the force of corruption. The caſtle, into which Philip's garriſon retired, he took by ſtorm, putting all the ſoldiers to the ſword; but there was ſtill a fort in one quarter of the town which held out, and defended itſelf bravely. The duke ſent Franciſco Sforza to its relief, between whom and Carmagnola many brisk skirmiſhes paſſed. The ſiege was puſhed on with vigour, and the fort defended with courage, the beſieged relying upon Sforza's army, which had in a manner encloſed Carmagnola; who with fatigue and watching fell ſick, committed the army to Gonzaga, and retired to the baths at Padua. In the mean time, the ſiege went on with the ſame ſpirit, Gonzaga being in every reſpect a general equal to Carmagnola; but the enemy were ſo well provided, their ſallies ſo frequent and vigorous, and b the Venetians ſo harraſſed in the rear by Sforza, that ſhame only reſtrained them from abandoning the enterprize. Both ſides were continually reinforced, and the affair ſpun out to a great length: at laſt Carmagnola returned to the army, and reſumed the command. Now an aſſault was reſolved on, and, to encourage the ſoldiers, a reward of four hundred crowns promiſed to him who firſt mounted the walls, three hundred to the next, two hundred to the third, and a hundred to each of the ten following. Both ſides fought with the moſt obſtinate valour, and it was difficult to determine which diſplayed the greateſt courage: at laſt, the Venetians, overpowered with numbers, were forced to retreat, by which means the ſiege might have been protracted to an unmeaſurable time, if famine had not effected what had foiled courage, conduct, and numbers. This brave garriſon was reduced to ſo

c great extremities, that they were compelled to ſue for a truce upon this condition, that if Philip came within the ſpace of ten days with a force ſufficient to relieve them, they then ſhould be at liberty to defend the fort, otherways they would ſurrender it to the Venetians. The truce being ſigned, Carmagnola doubled the guards, and ordered ſtrict watch that no proviſion might enter the fort. Sforza's army could hardly be kept from mutinying; they accuſed their officers of cowardice and treachery, publicly declaring that this brave garriſon fell a ſacrifice to their baſeneſs. Numberleſs attempts were made to throw in ſuccour, but all were fruſtrated by the vigilance of Carmagnola. At laſt, the truce being expired, the fort was ſurrendered, agreeable to the articles ſtipulated [d].

d DURING this ſiege, which was intirely carried on by the Venetians, the Florentines, under D'Æſte, entered Cremona, which they deſolated with fire and ſword. Philip had no army able to oppoſe them: as yet he was but aſſembling his troops, and before they were united the Florentines retired.

Peace with Viſconti.

SOON after the ſurrender of the town and fort of Breſcia, through the mediation of the pope's nuncio, peace was concluded, but with reluctance embraced by all parties. The conditions were, that Philip ſhould amicably cede to the Venetians Commonica, Breſcia, with its territories, and that part of the Cremoneſe, on the Olio, towards Breſcia: and that Amadeus of Savoy ſhould keep whatever he had taken during the war. Here we find no mention of the Florentines, although it was ſtipulated in the treaty of alliance between the republics, that neither ſhould make peace without the other's conſent: 'tis probable, therefore, the e Florentines were included, though as they obtained no particular conditions, it was not neceſſary to ſpecify them by name.

IT appears from Philip's conduct ſoon after, that he by no means was deſirous of this peace, at leaſt upon the terms of diſmembering his dominions. Reſpect for the pope's nuncio would ſeem to have been the ſole inducement to patch up what may rather be termed a ceſſation of hoſtilities than a pacification. Some writers alledge, that he even affronted, in the nuncio's preſence, the Venetian commiſſioners who came to Milan to receive the towns ſurrendered to the republic. Sabellicus is of opinion that his ſo ſuddenly breaking through the peace was owing to the remonſtrances of the Milaneſe, who highly reſented the ignominious terms he granted. This author relates a ſpeech [e] made to Viſconti by a deputation of f the chief magiſtrates of the city, in which, with great freedom and boldneſs, they upbraided their prince with cowardice and meanneſs, for ſo eaſily relinquiſhing what the chance of war would probably have recovered, and yielding his ſtrong holds, cities, and lands, to an enemy whoſe ſtrength or courage in the field he had but once experienced. The remonſtrance concluded with a zealous offer of their lives and fortunes, which, they ſaid, they were ready to ſacrifice rather than his honour ſhould be ſtained, or the hereditary dominions of the ſtate alienated. Philip deſired to know in what manner they would enable him to proſecute the war; upon which the magiſtrates retired to their conſtituents, and the ſubject was warmly debated in a large aſſembly of the citizens. The reſult of their deliberations was, that they would requeſt of the duke to accept, during the war, of ten thouſand horſe and an equal g number of foot, conditionally, that the revenues of the Milaneſe ſhould remain in the hands of the magiſtrates of Milan. The intention of this propoſal was to prevent the abuſe of public money, to the purpoſes of miniſters and courtiers, who under the pretence of the ne-ceſſary occaſions of the ſtate and expences of the war, ſqueezed and impoveriſhed the people for the ſupport of their luxury. The duke was inclined to accept the terms; but was diſſuaded by one of his miniſters, who told him, that to leave the revenue in the hands of his ſubjects was to rear ladders for them to mount to liberty, ſo eagerly aſpired after, eſpecially at a time when he was to carry on a war againſt two free republics. Philip, ſatisfied with this reaſoning, was, however, afraid abſolutely to reject the propoſals; he left it to time and his own cunning to extort the ſums wanted upon his own conditions. In order to ſatisfy the people, he prohibited the ſurrender of thoſe towns which were ſtipulated in the treaty of peace, and ſoon after made an incurſion into the territories of Mantua. a

THE republic, ſpeedily informed of Philip's intentions, forthwith ordered new levies to be made, the troops which were not diſbanded to march into Mantua, their former alliances to be renewed, and every other meaſure to be taken for vigorouſly proſecuting the war, and puniſhing Viſconti's perfidy. Philip was not behind them in preparations. Undaunted at the league formed againſt him, he reſolved upon a triple attack on the enemy: arming ſome veſſels at Cremona he ſeized on Turcecole, a fortreſs in the Parmeſan, ſituated at the mouth of the Tarro. Preſuming on the ſtrength of his infantry, he made incurſions beyond the Breſcian mountains, while his cavalry foraged and ſcoured all the champain country: his third exploit was the moſt ſucceſsful and important; ſending an army againſt the fugitive Genoeſe, who greatly moleſted him, he by his general Sforza totally defeated Fregoſa and their army. b

PERGULAN, another of his officers, placed garriſons in all the forts of the Breſcian, which ſtood convenient to impede or harraſs the enemy, at the ſame time that Picinino with a fleet beſieged and took Caſſel-Major [f]. Briſſelles, on the Po, was ſoon after taken, and Viſconti's conqueſts were no leſs rapid than his reſolution to renew the war had been ſudden. All this time the Venetians were diligently employed; they fitted out a fleet with orders to ſail up the Po, under Franciſco Bembo. At Caſſal he came up with the enemy's fleet, commanded by Euſtace of Pavia, and both admirals prepared for battle (A). Bembo ordered eight galleons to form a line in front, theſe he faſtened together by a ſtrong chain. Euſtace oppoſed this van with four galleons, which he ordered to bear down upon the Venetian line with all the force of the tide and oars. The Venetian, aware of his deſign, eluded it by a ſtroke of military addreſs peculiar to the method of fighting ſhips at that time, attacked, and ſunk the four galleons. Euſtace, perceiving by this inſtance, that he was unequal to the dexterity of Bembo, made all the diſpatch he was able to Cremona [g]. He was cloſely purſued by the Venetian admiral, who inſtantly attacked and reduced three little forts built in the river to block up the channel. The victorious Bembo then entering the channel, ſeized upon the galleons, which he burnt, Euſtace having wholly unrigged them before his arrival. In the night the ſailors, having got on ſhore without leave from the admiral, were plundering and deſtroying the ſuburbs, when they were ſuddenly attacked by a detachment from the city, and to the number of three hundred taken priſoners. Bembo, incenſed at this accident, ordered the fleet up the river, attacked and deſtroyed the fort ſtanding on the confluence of the rivers Po and Adda; then purſuing his way, came to an anchor near Pavia; but finding the city deſerted, he returned to Cremona, apprehending ſome treachery was intended. c d e

A. D. 1427.

DURING theſe naval tranſactions, the Venetians were not idle on ſhore. An army of fourteen thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot being ready early in the ſpring, Carmagnola marched for Padua, croſſed the lake Benac, and arrived at Breſcia. Before his coming, Pietro Loretano, the governor, had been ſucceſsful againſt a detachment of the enemy, who made incurſions to the very gates of the city: ſallying out upon them, he took the commander priſoner, and about three hundred of the ſoldiers. Carmagnola, envious that the firſt military exploits were not performed by himſelf, departed with his army from Breſcia, and proceeded directly to Ortolonga, which he inveſted. As ſoon as his battering artillery arrived, lines were formed, and his batteries began to play upon the walls with great fury. There was a body of one thouſand horſe, beſides a ſtrong garriſon of foot, within the town: the governor, relying upon his ſtrength, reſolved upon a ſally, which he made in the evening on that ſide of the camp defended by Stroſſi, and the troops of Ferrara. Stroſſi, with with four hundred horſe, bravely ſuſtained the aſſault, making prodigious havock amongſt the beſieged. At laſt, overpowered with numbers, he was ſlain, with the greateſt part of his troops; upon which the enemy broke into the camp, where nothing but confuſion reigned. The ſoldiers, fatigued with the heat and labour of the day, had gone ſecurely to a reſt, never dreaming of an attack. They were running about in the utmoſt perturbation, a prey to the enemy, when Carmagnola arrived with a body of horſe, and charged the aſſailants with ſo much vigour, that they were repulſed, and driven back into the town with great ſlaughter. However, this affair coſt the beſiegers, beſides the loſs of the brave Stroſſi, about one thouſand ſix hundred men, according to Blondus, who is very particular [h].

In conſequence Carmagnola raiſed the ſiege the next day, and leaving behind all the towns and forces held by the enemy, marched ſtrait to beſiege Cremona, not doubting but the ſurrender of this fine city would induce others to a voluntary ſubmiſſion [i]. On his way he was ſtrongly reinforced, ſo that the army amounted to eighteen thouſand horſe and eight thouſand foot, excluſive of ſix thouſand auxiliaries: Bembo likewiſe with the fleet and two thouſand mariners lay near Cremona. Struck with the greatneſs of this deſign, Viſconti aſſembled the b citizens of Milan, and met with ſuch chearful returns of loyalty as enabled him to take the field at the head of thirty thouſand men, with whom he marched to give battle to the Venetians. Carmagnola with his army lay at Sama, the enemy being obliged to croſs a bridge above a mile diſtant from the camp before they could attack him: here he was determined to receive Philip, without giving himſelf the trouble of defending the bridge, for the Venetians were no leſs eager than the enemy to engage. Philip, contrary to his own judgment, by the advice of Sforza, led his army over the bridge, which he drew up in order of battle on a plain a little way diſtant from the Venetian camp. Both ſides joined battle with the utmoſt alacrity and vigour: they fought from noon till night, and no apparent advantage was gained. In the evening a ſtorm of wind ariſing drove before it ſuch clouds of duſt, as c rendered it impoſſible for the ſoldiers to diſtinguiſh each other; friends were known from enemies only by the word of battle. An advanced party of Philip's army thinking to retire out of this confuſion towards the bridge, found themſelves in the middle of the enemy's camp, where they were made priſoners. At laſt both generals ordered a retreat to be ſounded, each claiming victory, and perhaps with equal reaſon. Carmagnola uſed jocoſely to ſay, that at the battle of Sama, Philip and he took more of their own ſoldiers priſoners than of the enemy: however, Philip aſſerted with great gravity that the Venetians were defeated, eſteeming it a victory that he had not loſt a battle [k]: but he was ſoon recalled to the defence of the Milaneſe, the duke of Savoy's cavalry, having entered the ducny by the ſide of Vercellei, were making incurſions to the gates of the capital. The Venetians too perceiving d Cremona to be ſtrongly garriſoned and well provided, dropt their intention of laying ſiege to it, and encamped at Caſſel-Major, where Bembo and the fleet arrived ſoon after. Sforza had purſued the Venetians from Cremona with a choice body of horſe, thinking he ſhould be able to harraſs their rear; but he found them ſo well prepared, that he returned without making any attempt.

Carmagnola raiſes the ſiege, and marches to Cremona.

CARMAGNOLA entered upon the ſiege of Caſſel, which was for a long time defended by a brave governor and numerous garriſon: at laſt it was taken by ſtorm, and the garriſon put to the ſword, all beſides Piſani the governor and a few troops, who retiring into a ſtrong tower, capitulated upon honourable terms. He next laid a bridge over the Adda, e by which his troops made incurſions into the Milaneſe, ravaged, plundered, and deſtroyed every thing that came in their way.

The Venetians beſiege Caſſel-Major.

PHILIP was taken up in reconciling diſputes among his officers, each of whom claimed to himſelf a ſuperiority over the others. At laſt he was obliged to put an end to diviſions, which he apprehended might terminate in the ruin of the army, by creating a generaliſſimo: his choice fell upon Carolo Malateſte, who had formerly commanded the Venetian forces; an officer more diſtinguiſhed for his high rank, caution, and duplicity, than for his valour. Malateſte's firſt buſineſs was to put a ſtop to the incurſions of the Venetians, which in a ſhort time he effectually accompliſhed. Macale, a city of the Cremoneſe, was now beſieged by Carmagnola: this occaſioned great diſcontent in Philip's army, the ſoldiers entertaining f doubts about the courage of their general. At laſt their clamours became ſo loud, that Malateſte called a council of the principal officers: Sforza and Picinino were for giving the enemy battle; Pergulan and Taurello for avoiding it, and reſtraining the impetuoſity of the troops, ſaying, that the Venetians muſt neceſſarily quit the Cremoneſe ſoon for want of ammunition and forage. The general, apprehenſive of a ſedition, followed the former opinion, and gave orders for the army to march. When he approached the enemy, he put the queſtion to Sforza and Picinino, whether it were better to attack the enemy in their camp, or to draw up the army and receive them? To this thoſe officers replied, that he was their general, and muſt direct thoſe particulars as he thought proper. Orders then were iſſued for diſpoſing the troops in battle-array. In the mean time Carmagnola had drawn up the Venetians to receive the enemy: Tolletino was ordered with two thouſand horſe to make a ſweep g round a hill on the left, and attack them in the rear as ſoon as both armies were engaged:

Macale beſieged by the Venetians.

then he ſtrongly lined all the hedges and ditches through which the enemy muſt paſs, himſelf taking poſt in a particular defile of great importance. Here the action began: Sforza, advancing with the light horſe, charged the Venetians in front, while Carmagnola ordered the firſt and ſecond lines to give way to the right and left, in encloſe him if he advanced; which accordingly happened: continuing, however, to preſs on with irreſiſtible vigour, Carmagnola made a fighting retreat to the main body of his army. Here Sforza, ſeconded by Malateſte, purſued, and a general engagement began, in which both ſides behaved with great intrepidity: but Carmagnolo's diſpoſition gave him many advantages; his infantry, with which all the hedges were lined, gauled, and made prodigious ſlaughter amongſt the enemy's cavalry; while a great ſhout in the rear of Malateſte's army announced their being charged in the rear by Tolletino with his two thouſand horſe. Thus being attacked in the rear by cavalry, in both flanks by infantry placed in the hedges, and in the front by the main body of the Venetian army under Carmagnola, the enemy were at laſt totally defeated, after many bold efforts to rally. Then began a dreadful carnage, the general not having power to reſtrain the rage of the Venetian ſoldiers. At laſt, the enemy endeavoured to appeaſe by intreaties the reſentment they could neither repel nor eſcape; they laid down their arms, and ſix thouſand infantry, with three thouſand horſe, were made priſoners at diſcretion [l]. Without doubt Carmagnola might have cruſhed Philip in conſequence of this deciſive victory, if he had not either from unaccountable whim, over-ſtrained generoſity, or treachery, ſet all the priſoners at liberty, without a ſingle condition. The Milaneſe army being totally broke, nothing could prevent his becoming maſter of the whole dutchy, had he been as ſkilful, or rather had he been as willing to purſue as to gain a victory. His only exploit after this battle was the taking of Orges by aſſault, all the other cities, towns, and forts of Breſcia paying a voluntary ſubmiſſion [m].

In the mean time Sforza and Picinino were buſied in collecting their ſcattered troops, and in making new levies: having joined theſe with the priſoners reſtored by Carmagnola, a formidable army was ſoon on foot, which immediately entered upon action. Sforza ſurpriſed a convoy of proviſions going to the enemy's camp: Picinino made an attempt at night to recover the town of Pontaglio, but was repulſed [n].

A. D. 1429. Besides the attempts of Philip to ſtop the progreſs of the Venetians by force, he was not idle by negociation: he endeavoured, by his intrigues, to excite the emperor Sigiſmund againſt the republic. His art ſucceeded with the duke of Savoy, who gave him his daughter in marriage [o]: however, not all his policy could prevent the neceſſity he was under of ſuing for peace, upon the loſs ſuſtained by the death of ſeveral of his beſt officers. A congreſs was accordingly appointed at Ferrara, the pope's legate preſiding, where the conditions were long debated, and at laſt adjuſted. The moſt material articles were, that Breſcia, with all the Breſcian and Cremoneſe, that part of the Bergameſe ſtretching towards the river Adice, together with the caſtles, towns, forts, &c. which they then held upon the Cremoneſe, ſhould in perpetuity be ceded to the Venetians. Little was granted to the Florentines beſides ſome trifling honours, ſuch as hoiſting their own flag at ſea inſtead of the Piſan.

By this peace Italy was reſtored to a breathing of tranquility of a very unſettled nature: hoſtilities ceaſed, yet ſtill their mutual animoſities, jealouſies, and heart-burnings remained. The ceſſion of the Cremoneſe was never thoroughly reliſhed by Philip: his conduct at the time of ſigning the peace, as well as afterwards, intimated his reluctance to part with a diſtrict ſo commodious, which he regarded as hereditary in his family, although in truth his right was founded in conqueſt. This was one grievance, and might in time have produced a war had no other reaſons concurred [p]. Others, however, were not wanting, and they were accordingly made the pretext. Philip had perſecuted, with implacable hatred, the families of Fregoſa and Fieſci, in contempt of all the remonſtrances in their behalf from the republics of Venice and Florence, and even a promiſe that he would take them into his friendſhip: but the moſt open and avowed occaſion of taking arms aroſe from the following incident.

PAOLO GUENESIO had by his cunning, art, and policy, acquired an aſcendency almoſt deſpotic over the republic of Lucca: he conducted himſelf with ſo much conduct and prudence, that amidſt the broils in which all Italy beſides were engaged, Lucca alone taſted the ſweets of repoſe and tranquility; yet could he neither gain the hearts, nor even avoid the hatred of the principal perſons in that ſtate, which he had ſo ſkilfully ſteered through all the dangers and labyrinths of policy. Continual intrigues were carried on againſt him, and now a ſtorm was gathering which threatened deſtruction both to Paolo and the republic. The firſt attempt of the diſaffected was to ſtir up the people againſt him on account of his conniving at his ſon's deſertion of the ſervice of the ſtate to enter into that of Florence. Young Ladiſlaus had ſolicited for leave, but being denied he made his eſcape, and acquired great honour in the Florentine alliance with the Bologneſe againſt pope Martin. The diſafa fected represented the danger there was of being embroiled in a quarrel with the holy see, by the rashness of Ladislaus and ambition of Paolo: however, their intrigues were undermined by the cunning of Paolo, who proved too hard for them on this as on many former occasions. The malcontents, finding their endeavours to stir up the people against Paolo were to no purpose, grew desperate: they never considered that violent measures must be accompanied with the ruin of their country; or rather, they were indifferent what became of Lucca so that Guenesio was destroyed: this they endeavoured to accomplish, by working on the ambition and natural fire of young Stella, nephew to Brachio, a young nobleman in the Florentine service. Stella was easily induced by their remonstrances to undertake what was perfectly agreeable to his active and enterprising spirit. Without farther reflection he made b an incursion into the territories of Lucca, laying every thing waste to the gates of the city: he seized upon eight forts and castles belonging to Paolo, made the garrisons prisoners, and then encamped on the great plain near Lucca. His forces, which at first consisted of a few troops of Florentine horse, were soon increased by a great number of volunteers, who flocked from all quarters in expectation of honour or booty. When Stella entered upon action, he had no countenance from the republic of Florence, the few troops under his conduct being prevailed upon solely by his own influence to share his fortune. The Florentines, however, perceiving the rapidity of his conquests, and the unexpected increase of his forces, began to harbour ambitious designs, and to scheme the project of annexing Lucca to the territories of the republic by means of Stella. Instead therefore of recalling him and their soldiers, in c consequence of a solemn ambassy from Guenesio, they encouraged Stella in the enterprize he had formed, which they desired might be prosecuted in the name of the republic, assuring him of ample supplies of men, money, and every other necessary.

Stella supported by the Florentines.

PAOLO perceiving that nothing was to be expected but war from the Florentines had recourse to Venice; but the republic declining to interfere in a dispute in which she was not concerned, the ambassadors proceeded to the court of Milan. Philip joyfully espoused a cause in which he hoped to wreck his vengeance on the Florentines, ordered Sforza to levy a strong army, and march directly to the relief of Lucca [q]. This general, whose greatest pleasure was fighting, readily obeyed the mandate, raised an army, passed the Alps, and soon appeared before the city. Upon his approach Stella retired towards the confines of Pisa, d not chusing to give battle to the enemy who he knew must soon be in want of provisions. By protracting the war he doubted not but Sforza's assistance would become useless to Guenesio, as the country round being entirely destroyed, the Milanese army would only hasten the surrender of Lucca, by consuming the stores laid in for a siege.

Visconti resolves to assist Lucca.

In the mean time Sforza entered Lucca triumphantly, and was received by Guenesio as his deliverer and guardian angel. Here he made but a short stay, and then marched into Pistoia, where he took, plundered, and destroyed a number of forts and castles. In his absence the artful Guenesio began to ruminate upon the event; he considered how precarious was the support of auxiliaries, whose designs might have the same tendency as those of the avowed enemy; how much easier it was to treat with the Florentines for a peace, while his
e affairs were in a prosperous condition, than it would be after the departure or defeat of Sforza; he concluded, that now was the most adviseable time for him to enter into a treaty, and secure by a solid, though disadvantageous peace, that tranquility upon which his power and happiness depended [r].

Commissioners were in consequence secretly dispatched to Stella and Florence with proposals; but Sforza having intelligence of the design returned suddenly with a strong corps to Lucca, and seizing upon Paolo and his family, sent them prisoners to Milan, after he had distributed his money and rich moveables among the soldiers [s].

Scarce had he led his troops back to Lombardy when Stella returned to the siege of Lucca, where he was strongly reinforced by a body of horse and foot detached from Florence.
f This determined Philip to send Picinino, in the name of the Genoese, who were said to have received Lucca under their protection, to relieve the city. The news of his march and powerful army obliged the Florentines to apply to Venice for assistance, in consequence of a treaty offensive and defensive subsisting between the republics. Perceiving the danger which threatened their allies, the Venetians dispatched commissioners to Philip to acquaint him, that the republic could easily penetrate into his designs; that the Venetians were sensible the Genoese were incapable of raising such a force as Picinino was leading against the Florentines their allies; that it was absurd to pretend that a state, which itself was under his dominion, should have taken Lucca under its protection; and lastly, that if he did not recal his generals and troops, who incontestably composed the greater part of Picinino's army, they would
g immediately march to the relief of their allies, and contrary to their inclinations, break the peace subsisting between the states. Philip gave no determinate answer to this peremptory

meſſage, and the Venetians heſitated about entering upon war, until the news arrived that Picinino had defeated the Florentines before Lucca, which immediately produced a reſolution of coming to a rupture [t]. a

THE Venetians, previous to hoſtilities, made divers attempts to draw Franciſco Sforza into their intereſt, who had reſided at Mirandola from the time he left Lucca, without diſbanding his army, or acknowledging any allegiance to Philip. The Florentines likewiſe left no means untried to ſecure his friendſhip, to which Sforza was greatly diſpoſed, on account of the mutual good offices which had long ſubſiſted between his father and the republic [u]. But Philip uſed the moſt forcible arguments to gain him, promiſing him his only daughter in marriage, and the reverſion of his dominions if he ſhould die without male iſſue, as was probable. All their endeavours being baffled, the Venetians entered into a league with the mar- b

The war commenced with an attempt the Florentines made of reſuming the ſiege of Lucca, after the departure of Picinino; but their deſign was fruſtrated by Bartholomeo Fornari, the Genoeſe admiral, who lay at Leghorn, with a ſquadron of ſix gallies. Fornari's vicinity obliged the Florentines to garriſon Piſa, which they apprehended would revolt: the reſt of the army were forced to retire on the approach of Picinino, who was returning to Lucca after he had with wonderful rapidity over-run the country of the Piſans, and taken a great number of forts and caſtles. So apprehenſive were the Florentines of loſing the city of Piſa, that they paſſed a very extraordinary and cruel edict, to prevent their rebellion, viz. that all the inhabitants, from the age of fifteen to ſixty years of age, ſhould depart the city before a c candle, lighted up for the purpoſe, was conſumed, under penalty of their lives and confiſcation of their effects [v]. Picinino, finding that Lucca was in no danger, marched into the country of Volterra, where his conqueſts were no leſs rapid than before they had been in the Piſan territories. Even the city of Volterra muſt muſt have fallen into his hands, had not Michaeli Attendulo been ſeaſonably ſent with a ſtrong corps by pope Eugenius to its relief, which obliged Picinino to abandon his deſign [x].

DURING theſe tranſactions, the Venetian army under Carmagnola took the field. This general had ſome time remained encamped near Orges, watching an opportunity to enter upon action with advantage: he now diſcovered a treaſonable correſpondence between the governor of Lodis and the enemy, in which it was concerted that the caſtle ſhould be be- d trayed to Philip. Carmagnola having prevented the deſign by hanging the governor, thought of retaliating by a ſimilar conduct. He tampered with the chief officer of Socinna, that the place might be delivered to him at a certain time agreed upon. The governor had no ſooner touched Carmagnola's money, than he ſent ſecret intelligence of the tranſaction to Philip, who gave immediate orders to Sforza to march with all poſſible ſecrecy to Socinna, ſeize on all the paſſes, and lay a ſtrong ambuſcade for the Venetians. The troops were diſpatched to take poſſeſſion of the place on the day appointed, Carmagnola remaining with the army at ſome little diſtance: they no ſooner entered the town than they were ſurCarmagnola defeated. rounded by a body of Milaneſe, which had been admitted and concealed; Sforza at the ſame time attacking the main army under Carmagnola ſo ſuddenly, and with ſo much vigour, that e he quickly defeated it, the general with difficulty making his eſcape [y]. Thus Carmagnola was taken in his own ſnare, with the loſs of a thouſand horſe, and the precipitate diſorderly retreat of his whole army. To add to his mortification, he was upbraided by the governor as a ſhallow ſuperficial plotter, a pretender to ſkill in the human heart, the baſeneſs of which he eſtimated by the corruption of his own; falſely imagining that the love of money was the firſt principle and ſpring of human actions [z]. The Venetians ſoon after received another de*The* Venetians a ſecond time defeated. feat in the Cremoneſe, where they loitered about in a diſorderly and irregular manner, without diſcipline or conduct: but concerning this tranſaction Sabellicus alone ſpeaks, and he in ſo conciſe a manner as would make the truth of it doubtful.

IN the mean time the Florentines were hard puſhed by Picinino: after this general had laid f
waſte Volterra he marched into the territories of Arezzo, where he very nearly ſurpriſed the city. He battered forts, towns, and cities, many of which he took by force, ſome by ſtratagem, while others voluntarily ſubmitted.

THE Venetians, not diſpirited with their loſſes, levied recruits with all poſſible diſpatch, formed magazines, forged arms, and fitted out a ſquadron, which they ſent up the river with ten thouſand men as far as Cremona. Nicholao Treviſano was made admiral, and the command of each ſhip given to a Venetian of birth. This fleet was furniſhed with a prodigious number of warlike engines: it was likewiſe to be aſſiſted in its operations by Carmagnola, who lay encamped near Cremona with twenty-four thouſand horſe and foot. Philip made all the preparations he could to oppoſe ſo formidable an armament, though he was ſtill ina ferior in number of ſhips, a difference more than compenſated by the abilities of the admiral, and courage of the mariners and ſoldiers. The famous Giovanni Grimaldi, a Genoeſe, the greateſt ſea-officer of his time, commanded: he had choſen the beſt pilots, the beſt archers, and engineers that either Philip or Genoa could furniſh. Picinino's return from Tuſcany had likewiſe greatly augmented the army; ſo that upon the whole Grimaldi, Sforza, and Picinino were a very equal match for Carmagnola and Treviſano. Much depended on the fate of a battle; the hopes and fears of both parties were proportioned to the conſequences of a defeat or victory. Sforza and Picinino to their ſtrength joined every thing which the policy and art of war could ſuggeſt: they made frequent attacks upon Carmagnola's trenches, as if they deſpiſed his army and the fleet that was advancing. The nearer b Treviſano with the ſquadron approached, the more frequent and fierce were their aſſaults, at the ſame time that they conſulted with Grimaldi in what manner the Venetian fleet could be moſt advantageouſly attacked. Grimaldi propoſed, that Picinino with all the men at arms ſhould be embarked; that Sforza ſhould at the ſame time make a feint attack upon Carmagnola's trenches, to prevent diſcovery of his weakneſs by the detachment under Picinino; and that the garriſon of Cremona ſhould aſſiſt by a vigorous ſally, while he fell down with the ſtream to give battle to Treviſano [a]. The Venetians deſiring nothing more than an engagement, rowed with all the force they could to meet the enemy; but as they approached Picinino, who advanced before the fleet with ſix gallies, they diſcovered the enemy's intention: finding they had to fight a land-army as well as a fleet, they ſent repeated accounts

c to Carmagnola of their ſituation; but he returned an anſwer reflecting on the courage of the admiral. The engagement in the mean while began, which both ſides ſuſtained with great conduct and valour. Towards ſun-ſet Picinino grappled with four Venetian gallies, who defended themſelves with courage, but enequal ſtrength or ſucceſs; for they were taken after an obſtinate reſiſtance: this induced Treviſano to retreat and fall back to the harbour from whence he had weighed anchor. Grimaldi purſued, and next day renewing the engagement, the Venetians, after an obſtinate conflict were defeated, not above five gallies, having eſcaped being either taken, ſunk, or deſtroyed. Two thouſand men were ſlain, and about ſix thouſand made priſoners, in which number were included thirteen ſenators. Prodigious booty fell into the enemy's hands, and the victory was in all reſpects complete

THIS misfortune was attended with the revolt or deſertion of Palavicini, and diſmiſſion of Carmagnola from his office: indeed, he was ſo chagrined at this laſt accident, that he would voluntarily have reſigned the command; but the Venetians were ſo far from being daunted by the unfortunate defeat, that they reſolved to carry war into the bowels of the Genoeſe territories, as Philip's fleet was commanded by an admiral of that country, and chiefly manned by Genoeſe. A ſquadron of eighteen gallies was immediately got ready for this purpoſe, compleatly manned, armed, and victualled. Pietro Loretano, a man of experience and conduct, was appointed to command the expedition, and every thing done that could render his ſucceſs probable [b]. He ſoon arrived at Leghorn, where he was joined
e by five Florentine gallies: there too he accepted of the offered ſervices of Adorini and Fieſci, two noblemen of Genoa, who for ſome time had lived in baniſhment, and whoſe powerful influence and connexions it was thought might induce the Genoeſe to attempt the recovery of their liberty: but ſuch conjectures proved deluſive; the Genoeſe had prepared for their defence a ſtrong fleet of twenty-four gallies, commanded by Francis Spinola, a man equally diſtinguiſhed by the nobility of his birth and his perſonal bravery [c]. The Venetian fleet was come within ten miles of Genoa before intelligence was received at Genoa: the news no ſooner arrived than Spinola ſailed in ſuch haſte to meet Loretano, that ſome of his ſhips could ſcarce overtake him before battle was joined. About day-break the fleets deſcried each other, and orders were given on both ſides to prepare for an engagement.
f Spinola encouraged his men by reminding them of their late ſucceſs, of their ſuperiority, and of the dejection of the enemy. On the contrary, Loretano exhorted his fleet to wipe off the diſgrace incurred by the loſs under Treviſano [d]: the enemy, he ſaid, was by no means contemptible, and to conquer would require an exertion of their courage; but then the honour of victory was proportionable, and they could have no hopes in flight from a fleet ſuperior and lighter [e]. Spinola having the advantage of the wind, ordered his ſhips to bear down on the enemy, which Loretano obſerving, thought it adviſeable to decline battle, until the curvature of the coaſt ſhould give him the weather-gage. The Genoeſe admiral attributing his retreat to fear, gave chace, and was juſt a-ſtern when Loretano put the helm round, engaged with great intrepidity, and was bravely received by Spinola. conflict, the Venetians having grappled with eight Genoese gallies, took them, together with a the admiral, whose fate produced a decisive victory, the particulars of which are not specified by historians.

War in Lombardy.

During these transactions by sea, the war went briskly on in Lombardy. Philip, puffed up with his success on the Po, came to Cremona to compliment his generals and the army upon their conduct. The Venetians were encamped at Suma, where he resolved to attack them if they could be brought to an engagement, which he apprehended would be difficult: but in this he was mistaken; they were impatient for an opportunity of wiping off the disgrace. The Venetian general ordered his army to be drawn up in battalia, firmly expecting the enemy's attack, which soon began with great vigour: they fought for the whole day, every company in both armies, horse and foot, having a share in the engage- b ment. Both sides, however, being tired out before either thought fit to yield the victory, a mutual retreat was sounded, after incredible slaughter, in which the loss was very equal. Sabellicus says, that Carmagnola commanded the Venetians in this engagement, though he is silent concerning the occasion of his being reinstated; but he would seem right from the following incident, which became an article of that general's impeachment. A few days after this last battle a scheme for surprising Cremona was proposed by the brave Cavalcobovis, a Venetian officer: it was so well concerted, and his assurance of success so strong, that Carmagnola could not refuse complying with his earnestness to make the experiment. In the middle of October this gentleman set out about midnight from the camp with a body of troops, concealing himself among the sedges and rushes which surrounded the moat at c the foot of the walls. As soon as day-light appeared, and that the centinels went off guard, he applied scaling-ladders to the ramparts, which his troops mounted unobserved: another corps, that had seasonably arrived to his support, followed, leaving a strong guard on the ladders, in order that Carmagnola might send further reinforcements. He then marched into the city, seized upon several guards, repulsed the inhabitants who assembled to oppose him, and took possession of the nearest gate: here he maintained his ground for eight hours, in spite of all the efforts of a numerous garrison, who attacked him from every quarter. He sent repeated messengers to Carmagnola to acquaint him with his success, and to request that he would enter with the army at the gate he kept open for him; but Carmagnola, pretending his apprehensions of some treachery, hesitated so long, that Cavalcobovis, unable d longer to sustain the enemy, abandoned the city [g]. This transaction clearly proves that Carmagnola commanded after the defeat on the Po, which happened three months before the attempt on Cremona. As it afterwards formed the chief article of his impeachment, it leaves no room for doubt concerning the name of the Venetian general, when this project of Cavalcobovis was put in execution.

Fiesci and Adorini murdered.

In the mean time Fiesci and Adorini, who had been left at Reca, when Loretano departed from thence, were treacherously slain in their way from Pisa to Florence. They were suddenly attacked by one Buffettio of Pavia, at the head of a troop of ruffians. Their defence was brave, and worthy of their birth and reputation; for after great slaughter made among the assassins, and several wounds received, they at length dropt down dead with e fatigue and loss of blood. This Buffettio was supposed to have been employed by Philip, for no personal animosity had subsisted between him and those unfortunate noblemen [h].

About this time, and soon after the defeat of the Genoese by Loretano, Bernardo Adorini, brother to Adorini, who was assassinated, had caused all the coast of Genoa to revolt. He made incursions all over the country with three hundred horse given him by the marquis of Montferrat; but was in the end defeated by Picinino, and the country reduced to its former obedience [i]. Historians relate barbarous instances of Picinino's cruelty upon this occasion: instances which stain the great reputation he deservedly acquired by his extraordinary military atchievements. Besides the numbers he had slain in two battles, some hundreds of prisoners were put to death by a shocking variety of tortures. Having thus glutted his in- f humanity with blood, he had recourse to other methods of gratifying the natural cruelty of his disposition: he exposed to sale all the children, women, and priests, that fell into his hands, the soldiers having first indulged themselves in acts the most lascivious, wanton, and barbarous [k].

But to return to the affairs of Chios: the intended armament, consisting of fourteen gallies, ten ships of burthen, together with a great number of small vessels, being now in readiness, the command was given to Andrea Mocenigo. He sailed for the island, and immediately on his arrival invested the chief city by sea and land. This place, likewise called Chios, was strong by nature and art: the fortifications, for those times, were not only regular, but the garrison was numerous, and stores of every kind plentiful; insomuch that, a after Mocenigo had battered the walls with all manner of engines then known, for the space of two months, little or no impreſſion was made. Upon news of great preparations making at Genoa for the relief of the city, he thought it adviſeable to raiſe the ſiege, without hazarding farther loſſes. Before he embarked his troops, he laid waſte the whole iſland, deſtroying the corn-fields, and tearing up the vintages: unable to perform actions worthy of a great commander, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by others becoming the character of a ſavage and barbarian. The attempt upon Chios fails.

THE following ſpring Pietro Spinola was detached thither by the Genoeſe with a fleet of fourteen gallies: hearing of this armament, the Venetians reinforced Loretano, and gave orders ſtrictly to watch the motions of the enemy. Loretano ſailed from Corfu, and with in- A D. 1432.
b credible diſpatch arrived at Leghorn a few days after the departure of the Genoeſe fleet. By their coaſting along Sicily he miſſed them; ſo that Spinola arrived at Corfu a ſhort time after the Venetian admiral quitted the iſland. The inhabitants were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation on ſight of the enemy, as their new fortifications, raiſed by the advice of Loretano, were incomplete, and the iſland in other reſpects but indifferently prepared for defence. Immediate intelligence of the deſtination of the Genoeſe was ſent to Loretano by the ſenate: he therefore diſpatched ſix of his beſt gallies double-manned, which, being joined by four more appointed by the ſenate, ſteered directly to Corfu. The Genoeſe arrive at Corfu.

PICININO, in the mean while, having laid waſte the whole marquiſate of Montferrat, returned to the Cremoneſe, where he ſoon retook Torcello and Bordellan, both well garriſoned, c and within a ſhort diſtance of the Venetian army. Every one was amazed at the conduct of Carmagnola; his ſloth and ſecurity while the enemy were employed in ſacking, burning, and ſeizing on the dominions of the republic, excited ſuſpicions of his fidelity. Some were of opinion that his reputation ought to ſtand unimpeached until proſs of his treachery appeared; others again thought, and among theſe were the procurators of St. Mark's, that he ſhould be taken into cuſtody, and compelled either to clear his honour, or receive the juſt puniſhment of his perfidy: but all were ignorant that a decree of the ſenate had paſſed againſt him from the time of his defeat on the Po; ſo ſecret are all the tranſactions of that auguſt body. Carmagnola himſelf, though he had reſided for ſome weeks in Venice, and had numerous connections among the ſenators, was ſo far from ſuſpecting any deſigns againſt him, that he paid his compliments to the doge the very day he was taken into cuſtody. When d he returned to Venice from the army, he was met as he came out of his gondola by a great number of ſenators, who conducted him to the prince's palace, where he was received with the ſame reſpect as if nothing againſt him had been determined (A). Before the decree was made public he was taken into cuſtody, and then the ſenate's reaſons ſignified to the people; after which he was put to the torture, convicted of a treaſonable correſpondence by his own letters and hand-writing, which he could not deny, beheaded, and his effects confiſcated to the public treaſure [l]. Thus ended the life of Carmagnola; glorious in its firſt career under Philip of Milan, but contaminated in the end by pride, avarice, and corruption. With a magnanimity becoming a hero he had a meanneſs unworthy of a man; his conduct plainly evinced, that when corruption once ſeizes the human heart, like a rank poiſon, it
e inſtantly deſtroys every principle of honour, honeſty, and virtue. Before his impriſonment the prince of Mantua, with Cornaro Dandolo as proveditor, had ſecret orders to repair to the army, to take upon him the command [m]. Carmagnola's ſuſpicious conduct. Carmagnola beheaded.

PICININO, elated with his late ſucceſs, cloſely purſued the courſe of victory: a wound he received at the ſiege of Pontoglio firſt put a ſtop to his career; he was ſo dangerouſly ill that his life was deſpaired of, by which means Philip was for a time deprived of one of his beſt and moſt active officers [n]. Henceforward his affairs began to decline: Tolletino, who had entered into the pope's ſervice after deſerting Philip, was now diſmiſſed by his holineſs, and retained in the Florentine pay. He began his ſervices by fierce incurſions into the territory of Sienna, with great violence laying waſte all the ſea-coaſts of the enemy or f their allies. After joining Attendulo, aſſociated with him in the command, he attacked ſome towns belonging to the Siennois, and, after reducing them, retook all the enemy's conqueſts in the Piſan territories. Soon after which he attacked Philip's army commanded by Ber- Picinino's ſucceſs ſtopped by a wound.

(A) Sabellicus relates, that Carmagnola was at Venice the very night the decree againſt him paſſed in the ſenate, eight months before his trial: that the doge not returning before morning from the ſenate he was met by Carmagnola, who jocoſely aſked whether he was to wiſh his highneſs a good night or good morning: to which the prince ſmilingly replied, that the ſenate had ſat late, and often talked of him. In ſhort, this extreme caution, though it may give the reader a high opinion of the ſecrecy of the ſenate, will ſcarce prejudice him in favour of the ſincerity and honour of the individuals who compoſed it. There is ſomething extremely ſhocking, and really unneceſſary, in the ſpecious appearances of friendſhip from the doge and ſenate to this unfortunate man, at the very time, and for a continuance after, they had doomed his deſtruction.

Sigiſmund comes with an army into Italy.

At this time Sigiſmund, ſon to Charles of Bohemia and Hungary, came with an army to Italy, in conſequence of a treaty with Philip. He firſt marched to Milan, where he was crowned; after which he led his army towards Lucca, as had been concerted between him and Philp. Tolletino having intelligence of his deſign marched towards Lucca, to prevent his ſeizing upon the Venetian forts round the country. As both the armies lay encamped at ſome diſtance from the city, Tolletino's camp was ſurpriſed in the night by a ſtrong body detached by Sigiſmund, and ſupported by a briſk aſſault upon another quarter from the city; but after a bloody diſpute the enemy were repulſed with great ſlaughter [p]. Some of the Hungarians penetrated as far as Attendulo's tent, who, we are told, was attacked b by a trooper of enormous ſtature. The Hungarian ſtruck him a blow on the head that muſt infallibly have ended his life, had not the goodneſs of his helmet reſiſted it; but Attendulo ſoon recovering himſelf made a thruſt, which pierced the heart of the ſoldier and ended the diſpute [q]. Sigiſmund undertook no other exploits againſt Tolletino; for retiring to Sienna, he entered into ſome controverſies with the pope, which employed the remainder of the ſeaſon in negociations. After theſe were amicably terminated he went to Rome, and there was crowned emperor.

The Venetians ſucceſs in Lombardy.

In Lombardy the Venetians had ſtill better ſucceſs, Sanchio Venieri and Cornaro having recovered Bordellana, Ruminenga, Fontanelles, and Socinna; after which both ſides began to talk of peace. The Venetians, at the requeſt of the marquis of Montferrat, ſent commiſ- c ſioners to Ferrara to treat of the conditions, and receive propoſals from the enemy: here two deputies from Florence and Milan arrived. During the congreſs the proveditori Venieri and Cornaro were puſhing their conqueſts [r]: they paſſed the mountains and reduced the valley of Camona and Valtellina. Then attempting to lay a bridge over the Adda they were fruſtrated in the deſign by the obſtinate reſiſtance of the enemy: Cornaro, however, kept poſſeſſion of part of Valtellina, and with a body of three thouſand horſe repulſed Picinino, called in by the Gibelline faction (B). But that ſubtle general effected by cunning what he could not compaſs by force. The day after his defeat he returned to the charge, as if he intended to renew the engagement: ſkirmiſhing briſkly with Cornaro's troops, he began to give ground, as if unable to ſuſtain the power of the enemy, and maintained a d fighting retreat until he had drawn them into a ſtrong ambuſcade. Here the Venetians, attacked on every ſide were put to flight, about three hundred being made priſoners: among theſe were Cornaro, Cæſar Martinenga, Thadeo D'Æſte, Baptiſta Capitio, Hulars of Friuli, Antonio Martinaſco, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction and great reputation. Caſſel-Major was likewiſe recovered by ſome of Philip's officers, which was followed by the reduction of Brixelles [s].

Caſſel-Major taken by Philip.

Peace treated of and concluded.

The winter now approaching, both armies retired into winter-quarters, and peace was more ſeriouſly treated of than before: at laſt it was concluded towards the following ſpring, on theſe conditions, that Philip ſhould reſtore all the towns and fortified places taken in Breſcia and the Bergameſe; that he made reſtitution to the Florentines of all he had taken in c the Piſan and Volaterran territories; that he ſhould exert his influence to oblige the Siennois to reſtore to Florence whatever they had ſeized from the republic; that he would ſurrender the eſtate of Montferrat to the marquis, making good the damage ſuſtained by that prince from the detention of his dominions; that he would grant a full pardon to Vermio and others who had carried arms in the Venetian ſervice. The article moſt diſputed was the town of Pontremola, which at length was ceded to Philip, on condition that all the plunder taken from the Florentine inhabitants ſhould be reſtored. Before the peace was ratified by the ſenate, an ambaſſy was diſpatched to demand Cornaro, who had not returned with the other priſoners, with orders to break off all that had been agreed upon, if Philip ſhould refuſe his releaſe. Upon their arrival they opened their inſtructions, and had an audience of f the duke, who gravely told them he was ſorry for the reſolution of the ſenate, ſince it was not poſſible for him to comply with their requeſt. Upon this the ambaſſadors were proceeding to extremities, when he told them at length, that the body of Cornaro they might take back, but the ſoul, all that was valuable, had taken its flight two days before. It was indeed true, that Cornaro died of grief at his diſgrace in being made a priſoner. His bravery, his noble ſpirit, and generoſity, had acquired him the eſteem of Philip, by whom he was no leſs lamented than by his own countrymen. The ambaſſadors returning with the mea lancholly news the peace was ratified, and the mutual articles performed with all convenient expedition [t].

It is remarkable that in every treaty between the Venetians and Philip, though each party was heartily tired of war and desirous of peace, yet something always occurred to prevent its being solid and durable. One time an article was granted unwillingly, and soon became a cause of contention: another, a peace was made only to enable the parties to resume the war with fresh vigour: in the present case, some differences between Philip and the pope arose immediately after the congress at Ferrara, disturbed the public tranquility, and even prevented the effects of that treaty. The Venetians could not be idle spectators while their countryman was molested in his pontifical dignity. As Eugenius had ever since his pro-
b motion strongly supported them against Philip, gratitude obliged them now not to be indifferent to his interests. Philip had never acknowleged his authority; and now that he found himself disengaged from war, he could better pursue his dislike to the pope, which he did with great animosity and rancour [u]: but for the particulars of this war the reader must consult the volume above quoted.

During the war between the pope and Visconti, in which the Venetians acted only as auxiliaries, Carrario, who had been absent when his father was put to death at Venice, and ever since lived in Germany, was solicited by Philip to return to Italy, thinking by his means to stir up the Paduans against the republic. After an exile of thirty years he came back to his native country, where he remained for some months concealed, endeavouring to prevail upc on the Paduans to throw off the Venetian yoke, and receive him as their lawful prince. His promises were so liberal, and the expectations so great which he had raised in many, that his restoration was eagerly desired. The inhabitants of Verona and Vicenza were particularly disposed to favour him, and just ready to declare themselves, when the senate receiving intelligence of the design, gave orders he might be seized: accordingly Carrario, in the habit of a German merchant, and several of his friends and accomplices, were brought to Venice, convicted, and put to death [w].

This year it was that the Genoese resolved to throw off the dominion of Philip, who had A. D. 1433.
d governed them with a despotic sway for a great number of years, without the least regard or tenderness for their ancient customs and liberty. Spinola, who had been prisoner in Venice since the action with Loretano, was the great fomenter of this revolt: he had contracted Spinola stirs up a rebellion.
strict intimacies and warm friendships with several noble Venetians during his confinement: by them he was often exhorted and excited to encourage his countrymen to recover the liberty they had as foolishly as basely surrendered. They reminded him of the former splendor of the city before it was enslaved and subjected to the caprice and will of a tyrant: how mean and pitiful it was to give up the freedom which their ancestors had so bravely asserted at the hazard of their lives: how unbecoming that a city, herself the mistress of many other cities and large dominions, should be the slave, the vassal of a petty prince, inferior in power e and glory to herself. In short, they gave him room to hope for strong supplies of men, money, and provisions, if he could persuade his countrymen to follow what their own interests, honour, and inclinations strongly dictated. They assured him, that both they and the Florentines were ready to hazard their own liberty to recover the freedom of Genoa, not only from the just resentment they bore to Philip, but from the natural regard that both states must have for a sister republic. Animated with these remonstrances, Spinola returned to He returns to Genoa.
Genoa, and immediately set every engine at work to effect a revolution: his success in inflaming the common people was so great, that nothing less than the influence of Sigismund could prevail with them longer to support the Milanese yoke, although perhaps to throw themselves into the power of another master less powerful, but equally proud and haughty: but the politic Sigismund foresaw that any revolution upon this occasion, while his hands
f were fully employed otherways, would be a total exclusion of his imperial dominion, exerted himself so heartily in behalf of Visconti, that the tumults excited by Spinola were for the time appeased, and all thoughts of a revolution deferred to a more convenient opportunity [x].

In the war between pope Eugenius and Visconti, Sforza commanded the troops of the holy see and the Venetian auxiliaries. Disputes arose between him and the republic respecting his pay: Cosmo de Medicis came purposely from Florence to Venice, in order to conciliate the parties; but his mediation proving abortive, Sforza made up his quarrel with Philip, and returned to his service. Both the Venetians and Piccinino were offended at this treaty; the latter was particularly enraged, and every where exclaimed against the ingratitude of Philip,
g as if a friendship for Sforza was an injury done to himself: but as if his resentment to Philip had excited himself to a more earnest discharge of his duty, he attacked Ostasio Polentano, prince of Ravenna, with so much vigour and success, that he was at last compelled to forsake the Venetian alliance and embrace the party of Philip. Soon after this he took Imola and Bolognia from the pope, and in every respect performed greater services to the cause of Visconti than he had ever done before his quarrel. It would be difficult to determine whether Picinino's conduct was actuated by a rivalship of Sforza, by more generous motives, or by sound policy and his endeavours to shew Philip the importance of his friendship, and force of his merit. All we know is, that he rendered Visconti signal services, and did the pope, Venetians, and their allies irreparable damage [y]. a

Mellato commands the Venetians.

MELLATO, who commanded the Venetian army, in the mean time, was not idle: after he had recovered all the places taken in the Bergamese by Picinino in the last campaign, he entered the Cremonese, and every where carried with him terror and desolation. Picinino, hearing of Mellato's progress, recalled all his detachments, marched into the Cremonese, and encamped between the Po and the city Cremona. Passing the river, he went and besieged Cassel-Major, which he knew would divert Mellato from his other designs. The event answered his conjecture; for Mellato having strongly garrisoned all the places he possessed in the Cremonese, marched to Cassel-Major, and found means to throw in a reinforcement. Having fully supplied Socinna, a strong place of equal consequence, and placed centinels and corps du gard along the river, he encamped at Bina, twelve miles from Cassel, his army not being strong enough to raise the siege by a battle. Picinino, taking advantage of his superior force, which consisted of twenty thousand fine troops, almost double the number of Mellato's army, prosecuted the siege with unwearied diligence, and great vigour [z]. For nineteen days successively did he batter the walls, almost without intermission, or any great success. The senate entertained hopes that he might at length be forced to abandon the siege, both from the strength of the place and the obstinacy of the garrison: but their expectations were soon disappointed by the sudden fall of a strong tower, supposed to have been undermined by the treachery of some of the garrison, corrupted by Picinino. So alarmed were the besieged with this accident, that they hung out a flag of truce, and offered to capitulate upon reasonable and moderate terms. Their proposals were equivocally answered, which more strongly confirmed the governor in his suspicions. Mean while Picinino was scheming the destruction of the Venetian army: he delayed the capitulation, until the issue of an ambuscade laid for Mellato should appear; but the plot being discovered a capitulation was signed, and the garrison permitted to march out with the honours of war, their arms, and ammunition. b

After Gonzaga had resigned the command of the Venetian army, a report was propagated of his intention to enter into treaty with Philip: upon this the Venetian senate sent ambassadors to him to dissuade him from a design so injurious to the republic. Notwithstanding he had resigned his post of general, yet a considerable body of the Mantuan horse acted under Mellato; and though Gonzaga generally resided at Mantua, he often made excursions, upon occasions of consequence, to the army, to assist Mellato with his advice and counsel. The ambassadors finding him at Mantua, received the strongest assurances of his intention to preserve the friendship of the Venetians inviolably, with which answer they returned fully satisfied. All this time Gonzaga maintained a secret correspondence with Picinino, in which he agreed to assist the plan he had laid down for the ruin of Mellato, by withdrawing his forces and joining them to Picinino's as soon as he began the proposed attack. For this purpose he came to the Venetian camp, and strongly advised Mellato to quit his present situation, and march into the enemy's country. He had so far gained upon the provedatori, by the speciousness of his manners and the force of his arguments, that they concurred with his opinion. Picinino arrived by a secret march upon the banks of the Oglio, and encamped at a ford about four miles distant from Mellato's camp, where he disposed every thing for an attack. The Venetian general suspecting those motions were only a feint to cover some other design, kept close within his entrenchments, and took every necessary precaution. The frequent motions of the enemy still more confirmed him in his opinion, that Picinino had some other design than to attack a camp strongly fortified by nature and art. At last the courier between the treacherous Gonzaga and Picinino was taken, and the whole design disclosed to Mellato, who thinking it best to avoid coming to an explanation at that time, took his measures for deceiving Gonzaga and turning the tables: for this purpose he detached the Mantuan horse under Giovanni Tolentino, with orders to cross the river some miles above the enemy's camp, and to attack them in the rear, upon a signal given that the armies were engaged. Having thus disengaged himself from the Mantuans, he gave orders for the army to decamp with the utmost silence, in the middle of the night, and marched with such expedition, that by break of day he was twelve miles distant before the enemy was apprised of his motions. In this manner did he proceed unmolested to Bagnolo, e

a where he encamped and fortified himſelf in a ſituation almoſt inacceſſible [b]. Gonzaga's ſchemes being known at Venice, the ſenate reſolved to puniſh his perfidy. With this intention, a prodigious fleet, conſiſting of ſixty-five gallies, eight galliots, and a number of ſmall veſſels, was equipped with all poſſible diſpatch, and the command given to Pietro Lorotano, the old and faithful favourite of the republic. He had orders to ſail up the Po, and deſolate the enemy's country. During the preparations at Venice, Mellato propoſed ſending part of his army to Breſcia, both to refreſh the troops and provide for the ſecurity of the town; he was ſtrongly oppoſed by the inhabitants, who inſiſted upon its being left to their own defence. Mellato ſuſpected their fidelity, until, by the influence of Franciſco Barbaro, a leading perſon in the city, the inhabitants were perſuaded to comply with his b requeſt, and the gates were put into the hands of the Venetians. Barbaro, at the ſame time, performed another ſignal ſervice to the republic, reconciling, by his prudent conduct, the heads of a faction, whoſe animoſity endangered the loſs of the city [c].

PICININO, in the mean time, was concerting meaſures with Gonzaga and Vermio for ſhutting up the lake Benac and river Mincia, the only paſſes by which Mellato could ſupply his army with forage and proviſions. Dividing his army into four columns, Gonzaga and Vermio, with two ſeparate corps, entered the Veroneſe; and having, by the force of money made themſelves maſters of Valeza, they ſoon over-run all the country lying between the rivers Adice and Mincia. Here it was that Giovanni Melavotte, going from Breſcia to Verona, with three hundred horſe, fell into their hands after a brave reſiſtance. They ſoon
c afterwards ſubdued the inhabitants of the lake Benac; and Gonzaga reduced Pelcara, ſituated at the riſe of the Mincia, and Lonata, upon the Breſcian mountains; forts which had formerly belonged to him, but were now garriſoned by Venetians. Mellato, having received reinforcements from Breſcia, volunteers raiſed by Barbaro, and multitudes of mountaineers, his army was augmented to the number of twenty thouſand ſtrong; but finding that Picinino, by Gonzaga's junction, was ſtill ſuperior, and ſuſpecting the fidelity of ſeveral of his own officers, he waved his intention, and cantoned the army in the neighbouring towns and fortreſſes. Picinino, being thus at liberty to act as he pleaſed, led his army to beſiege Sales; which, after ſome time loſt, he was forced to relinquiſh, on account of the brave and obſtinate defence of the garriſon [d]. After this he drew near Feliciana and Manubia, by the d terror of his arms compelling the Forlani and the inhabitants of Monteclao to embrace the cauſe of Viſconti. Hence he marched to Pontoglio, which, with ſeveral other towns, he reduced before the end of the campaign.

PHILIP's arms were no leſs ſucceſsful in another quarter. In the valley of Camona he carried all before him, Antonio Bechari, his general there, having by force or perſuaſion, reduced all the inhabitants to his obedience: however, he did not long retain his conqueſts; for the diligent and faithful Barbaro of Breſcia raiſed great bodies of mountaineers, whom he ſent under the conduct of Leonardo Martinenga againſt Bechari. Martinenga ſoon drove the enemy out of the country with great ſlaughter; after which he over-ran the whole territory, deſtroying every thing with a barbarous fury, and ſeverely puniſhing the cowardice e and perfidy of the miſerable inhabitants of the valley [e]. A. D. 1434.

During theſe exploits Picinino defeated Gritti, who was diſpatched by Mellato, with a body of three hundred foot and two hundred horſe, to reinforce Chiava, at that time beſieged by the Milaneſe general; after which he inveſted Rhoad, but not before he had compleated the reduction of Chiava. Mellato apprehending the danger of the town from the weakneſs of the garriſon, detached a body of troops, all volunteers, from the mountains of Valhopia and Serotiona, to raiſe the ſiege, or at leaſt to reinforce the garriſon [f]. An ambuſcade was laid for them by Picinino; but the Venetian general conducted his affairs ſo prudently that the enemy's ſcheme was baffled, a general engagement brought on between both armies, and the Milaneſe general forced to relinquiſh his enterprize. After an obſti-
f nate conflict a retreat was ſounded by mutual conſent, and the armies ſeparated without victory's declaring for either; Mellato returned to Breſcia, and Picinino to Coloignes [g]. Policy and zeal, however, made Barbaro proclaim a complete victory all over Breſcia; that Picinino was broken and repulſed with great ſlaughter, and that the night only had prevented the total deſtruction of his army. Nor was this report confined to Breſcia only; it diffuſed itſelf to Venice, which excited ſo general a joy, that the people flocked to the market-place to congratulate each other upon the narrow eſcape of their army, and complete defeat of the enemy. The city at this time ſwarmed with ſailors, raiſed for manning the fleet intended againſt Gonzaga: they ſoon became riotous in their mirth; they began with pulling down ſtalls and ſhops, to make fuel for their bonfires. At laſt the tumult
g became ſo great as to require the intervention of the magiſterial authority; but this was likewiſe that their paſſions ſoon yielded to his arguments. The tumult was quelled, the mob diſ-perſed, and public tranquility eſtabliſhed by this admiral, whoſe reputation and popularity effected what the ſenate and doge found too difficult for their authority. He had for the ſpace of twenty years been the conſtant and faithful ſervant of the republic: his mildneſs, modeſty, liberality, and affability, had gained him the general eſteem: he was not more reſ-pected by the people for his bravery and generoſity, than by the doge and ſenate for the ſweetneſs of his manners, and zeal for the public ſervice. Notwithſtanding his great age, he was now appointed to conduct one of the moſt formidable armaments ever equipped by b the republic, and to execute a commiſſion of equal delicacy and importance.

PICININO, during the preparations at Venice, carried all before him by his vigilance, Rhoad taken by Picinino. activity, and the ſuperiority of his army. Marching from Coloignes to Rhoad with all his forces, he proſecuted the ſiege ſo vigorouſly, that the garriſon ſoon ſurrendered at diſcre-tion. He then reduced Bomedi, Paternia, and Paſſorini. In the ſpace of one week he forced the Monticulans, Julians, Ornians, and Brienſes, together with the forts of Iſea and Valhopia to ſubmit to Philip. A few days after he poſſeſſed himſelf of all the Breſcian plains, a great part of the mountains, and the whole territory, the new Orges excepted. His deſign was to ſhut Mellato up in Breſcia, where, in a little time, for want of proviſions, he muſt ſurrender [h]. The Venetian, ſuſpecting his intention, and aware of the conſequence of c being pent up in that corner, left a ſtrong garriſon in the city, and, with the reſidue of the army, began his march about the middle of the night towards Verona. Blondus ſays, Mellato had with him five thouſand horſe and foot; but Montano and Paſius of Arimini, who were both preſent in the whole war, affirm, that his army did not exceed three thouſand. He firſt marched to the banks of the river Mincia, which he attempted to ford before Valezia; but was diſappointed on account of the depth of the water, and the oppoſition from the enemy. Upon this he returned to Breſcia, and was cloſely purſued by Pici-nino, who might probably have ſurrounded the Venetians, had he taken the precaution of ſending a body of troops to intercept their return, upon the preſumption that they would be unable to advance. Mellato, finding it would be impoſſible to ſubſiſt longer in Breſcia, d Mellato propoſes croſſing the mountains. determined to hazard every thing to avoid ſurrendering by famine [i]. He projected the ſcheme of leading his troops to Verona, over mountains, and through foreſts which had always been deemed impaſſable. Nothing in hiſtory exceeds the difficulty of this march, which was equal to Hannibal's over the Alps. The army ſet out from Breſcia about midnight, paſſed through the vale of Suabia to the mountains, every ſoldier being furniſhed with as much proviſion as he could conveniently carry. They continued their march through rocks, bogs, foreſts, and deſerts for the whole night and all the ſucceeding day, without halting. The inhabitants of the valley of Suabia, ſubjected to the biſhop of Trent, knowing their maſter's diſlike to the Venetians, took arms, and grievouſly harraſſed the rear of the army. Mellato's orders were, that the ſoldiers ſhould keep cloſe to their colours; but that e was impoſſible in the difficulty of the roads, where frequently only one man could paſs, while the horſes came tumbling down with their riders from precipices. This, and the fatigue of the foot, occaſioned the loitering of numbers behind, who were conſtantly knocked on the head by the Suabians. For the defence of the wearied infantry, Mellato ordered a troop of horſe to lead up the rear, and often to diſmount, in order to accommodate ſoldiers unable to proceed. He was foremoſt in every danger, difficulty, and hardſhip.
The troops were animated by his example, and ſo affected with the goodneſs of their general, that they chearfully performed exploits beyond their natural ſtrength. After having travelled two days, the army halted to refreſh on the top of a mountain; and as ſoon as the wearied ſoldiers had with food and ſleep recruited their exhauſted ſpirits, Mellato f gave orders to proceed on their march by break of day. He knew the neceſſity of expedition, as the biſhop of Trent would not fail to take advantage of their deſperate ſituation. On this day's march he was joined by Pario Lodron, who followed him with a conſiderable body of mountaineers from Breſcia, and had, in ſpite of fatigue and danger, reſolved to ſhare the fortune of Mellato and the Venetian army.

The terrible diſtreſs of the army. In the mean time the biſhop of Trent, having notice that Mellato was paſſing through his dominions, raiſed all the forces he could to block up the paſſes, and hem him in on every ſide. This prelate ordered a ſtrong body of troops to ſeize upon the declivity of a ſteep mountain, over which Mellato muſt neceſſarily march by an exceeding narrow path. With- g out an enemy the place was horrible; two men could ſcarce paſs a-breaſt, and the moun-

a tain was almoſt perpendicular: above appeared nothing but ſtones and rocks; nor was the proſpect below leſs dreadful; the brain turned giddy, and the moſt reſolute courage was diſmayed: the leaſt ſlip of the foot, or the ſlighteſt accident would have ſent the paſſengers tumbling into eternity; how horrible then muſt it have been to encounter an enemy from above, and the immenſe ſtones they ſent rolling down with prodigious force! Mellato perceiving the troops quite diſheartened with the danger, advanced with a detachment againſt the enemy: he made a ſweep round the hill, and ſcrambled up with a ſpirit and reſolution that amazed his own troops, and confounded the enemy, who were ſoon broke and defeated. Having happily effected this he returned to the army, who impatiently waited the event of the expedition. To add to the miſery of this day's march, every little rivulet
b was ſwelled with the deluges of rain, and rendered ſcarce fordable. Nothing but neceſſity and an invincible courage could ſurmount the numberleſs difficulties that concurred; an enemy barbarous to a great degree, famine, fatigue, mountains, rocks, tempeſtuous weather, and almoſt impaſſable deſerts: theſe, together with ſickneſs, which now prevailed, made up the horrid catalogue. At length, after three days march, they deſcended to the plain on the banks of the river Sarta, which runs from the mountains of Trent to the lake Benac: here the army was obliged to ſtop, the fords being found too deep for the paſſage of the infantry. Next morning the oppoſite ſhore of the river was covered with Vermio's troops, diſpatched by Picinino along the lake to oppoſe the paſſage of the Venetians: they were likewiſe purſued and attacked in the rear by the biſhop of Trent, who by this time had collected an Attacked by the enemy.
c army greatly ſuperior to Mellato's. In this extremity the Venetians were relieved by the courage and conduct of a ſubaltern officer, who propoſed that in the night torches ſhould be tied to their lances, and the army march as if determined to attempt the paſſage of the river rather than periſh in their preſent ſituation. The enemy, who defended the paſs by which it was deſigned to eſcape, obſerved the Venetians make towards the river, and they doubted not but their intention was to open themſelves a way through it by the ſword. Without heſitation they poured down from the mountains to attack Mellato in the rear; but no ſooner moved than Piloſus ſeized upon their poſt with a ſmall party he had with him, and made a ſignal to the reſt of the forces, that he was in poſſeſſion. Immediately a ſhout of joy was heard all over the army, and the enemy perceiving their miſtake, endeavoured to regain Piloſus ſaves the army.
d the paſs; but they were received by Piloſus with a courage equal to his conduct, and repulſed with great ſlaughter. Then did Mellato purſue his march, croſſing the river without oppoſition, by which the army found themſelves next day in a plentiful country, after having long ſuſtained the utmoſt preſſure of fatigue and hunger in barren mountains. The change was a paradiſe to them, and Piloſus regarded as a tutelary angel both by the general and ſoldiers. Mellato was ſo ſenſible of his ſervices, that he immediately preferred him to the poſt of centurion, and recommended him to the ſenate as the preſerver of the Venetian army.

During theſe tranſactions in the mountains of Trent, Loretano with the Venetian fleet entered the Po; but found his paſſage oſtructed by Gonzaga, who had cauſed great piles to Loretano enters the Po. e be driven in the river, upon which he laid ſtrong planks, building forts at every twenty paces diſtance, and filling up the ſpaces with ſtrong iron chains in ſuch a manner as made them impaſſable [k]. He likewiſe ſtrongly garriſoned Sermena, a ſtrong town upon the Po, and took his meaſures ſo well as effectually ſtopped Loretano. This admiral waited for three weeks, every day in expectation of the land-forces: at laſt wearied out, he reſolved to beſiege Sermena, but found the place too well prepared to entertain hopes of ſucceeding without a greater force of infantry. Chagrined with diſappointment Loretano fell ſick, and died univerſally regretted.

While Mellato was croſſing the mountains Picinino laid ſiege to New Orges, and carried it through the treachery and corruption of Pietro Luca, whom Mellato had diſpatched with f three hundred horſe to reinforce the garriſon, and take upon him the command. After this he received orders from Philip, though late in the ſeaſon, to beſiege Breſcia, which had long Picinino lays ſiege to Breſcia.
been the object of his ambition. Picinino immediately led his army, conſiſting of twenty thouſand fighting men, and a great number of battering pieces, againſt this city, and without delay opened the trenches. Before this ſiege few hiſtorians take notice of cannon uſed by the Italians, though it is imagined the invention was known to the Venetians at the time when Chioggia was taken by the Genoeſe. Baronius expreſly mentions, that by means of them the ſiege of Venice was raiſed, and the Genoeſe blocked up in Chioggia. Upon the preſent occaſion we are told, that Picinino had pieces of cannon ſent him from Milan, which carried bullets of three hundred weight. His batteries played ſo furiouſly againſt the tower
g of Mombellane, and other parts of the city, that ſeveral breaches were made in the walls, and the garriſon began to talk of a capitulation [l]: however, Barbaro the governor, and ſome of the chief officers, ſtill determined to defend it to the laſt extremity. By agreement among a them it was reſolved, that Chriſtophoro Donato, the chief civil magiſtrate, ſhould keep open table, and generouſly entertain all degrees of men, that they might the better ſupport the fatigues of the ſiege, and more ſecurely be fixed in their allegiance to the republic: that Barbaro, who was the higheſt military magiſtrate, equally zealous for the public good, generous, and brave, ſhould by the ſame means animate and ſupport the garriſon. Barbaro omitted nothing which could prompt them to their duty: he even feigned letters and meſ-ſages of ſpeedy ſuccour promiſed him, by which and his own example there was not an individual in the garriſon who had not rather periſh than ſubmit. Thus inſpirited he made ſeveral ſucceſsful ſallies, whereby the enemy were often repulſed with great ſlaughter, and their batteries deſtroyed. All the breaches made in the day were repaired at night, and the b beſiegers ſurpriſed with finding complete walls next morning as they were preparing to ſtorm the city: even the women laboured with indefatigable induſtry, danger, and the example of Barbaro inſpiring them with unuſual magnanimity and courage. At laſt diſeaſe and famine were near producing what neither the power or skill of the enemy could effect. To obviate this inſupportable evil, proclamation was made for all thoſe unable or unwilling to bear arms to retire from the city. In conſequence of this, one half of the inhabitants removed, with their wives and families [m]. The city appeared in a manner deſolate; but the courage of thoſe who remained was unappalled. Although the aſſaults of the enemy were more frequent, and their hopes augmented in proportion as the number of the beſieged was diminiſhed, yet they were always warmly received, and repulſed. At laſt the walls round the tower c Mombellane being levelled to the ground, it was reſolved to ſtorm the garriſon: Picinino, at the head of his beſt troops, began the aſſault, and continued it for the whole day without intermiſſion; when, towards the evening, his ſoldiers, unable longer to withſtand the fury of the beſieged, were broken and defeated. The attack was renewed for three days ſucceſſively; but always unſucceſsfully: the beſieged were not to be overcome either with fatigue, danger, or any kind of hardſhip [n]. Picinino, perceiving they were reſolved to buy death enduring all the extremities of cold and fatigue, after the loſs of near three thouſand of his troops, beſides a great number of nobility and gentlemen of the firſt rank in Italy, after d having exhauſted his whole ſtock of military skill and cunning, he was compelled to retire from the walls of a city defended by a handful of brave militia.

DURING the ſiege of Breſcia Mellato was not idle: as ſoon as he had recovered the fatigue of his late march he entered upon action. His firſt care was to try every method to ſuccour Breſcia; but they all proving fruitleſs, he reduced Bargo and Corvario: here the brave Piloſus received a contuſion, of which he died before the arrival of the phyſicians and ſurgeons ſent to his aſſiſtance by the ſenate. The grief was general for the loſs of this hero, though of private rank [o]: his body was brought to Venice, and interred at the public expence. Such were the many examples of public honours beſtowed upon private ſubjects, of valour and merit, by that wiſe and politic ſtate. Upon this occaſion too the ſenate con- e ferred the title and authority of general on Mellato, in acknowledgment of his late good conduct, and in reward of his former exploits: nor was Barbaro forgot; his zeal, ſpirit, and indefatigable induſtry met with a recompence and honours adequate to the high degree of his merit, and the ſenſe the republic had of his unwearied loyalty and fidelity [p]. Avo-
A. D. 1435. gadre, a native of Breſcia, was ſoliciting the ſenate for the relief of his brave countrymen, and the doge earneſtly exhorting them to ſend immediate ſupplies, when a meſſenger arrived from Barbaro with the joyful intelligence that the ſiege was raiſed. Neither Foſcari, the ſenate, or Avogadre, could credit the meſſenger before they had read Barbaro's diſpatches:
they were then equally ſtruck with amazement and admiration at the obſtinate valour of the garriſon. The whole city was in a blaze with bonfires, and a joy appeared every where, f equal to what might be expected had Venice been relieved from a ſiege. A reward was ſent to every individual in the garriſon; the wives of the dead were ordered to be ſupported at the public charge, and particular honours decreed to Barbaro and the other officers.

AFTER the diſgrace before Breſcia, Picinino beſieged and reduced Lodron, aſſembled his troops, and proceeded to Romana, which he inveſted; but this place, ſtrong by art and nature, and well-provided and garriſoned, baffled all his attempts. Finding he could make no impreſſion, he retired, with his troops, into their former winter-quarters [q].

DURING theſe tranſactions in the depth of winter, the ſenate, by the advice of Nicholao D'Eſte, were taking meaſures to regain the friendſhip of Sforza, whom they now found to be of more conſequence than they imagined [r]. They likewiſe laboured with all their might g a to engage the Florentines in their quarrel, this republic having, ſince the diſmiſſion of Sforza, been entirely neutral and inactive. Sforza was diſguſted with Philip's prevarication about the promiſe of giving him his daughter in marriage. That prince had detached him from the alliance of Venice in ſuch a manner, that he thought no reſentment could induce him to enter again into a ſervice in which he had been ſo groſsly affronted. Some ſarcaſtical ſtrokes from his rival Picinino, added greatly to Sforza's indignation. At the ſiege of Breſcia, Picinino being asked, to what purpoſe he laviſhed his own and the ſoldiers blood to procure a city which would ſoon come by inheritance to his rival? he replied, "Do you finiſh the "buſineſs, and we ſhall be time enough at La Marca to diſappoint this delicate bridegroom, "and turn the mirth to our own advantage." In ſhort, the duplicity of Viſconti, and his b animoſity to Picinino, determined this general to liſten to the Venetians, who were even profuſe in their offers of ſervice. Montano tells us, that a penſion of two hundred and twenty thouſand ducats, an incredible ſum in thoſe days, was aſſigned him [s].

THE Florentines withſtood all the exhortations, remonſtrances, and ſolicitations of the Venetian envoy, until they had certain aſſurance that Sforza was reconciled and engaged. Though they perfectly well knew that if Philip had once conquered the Venetians, his next attempt would be againſt themſelves, yet neither this or any other arguments could rouſe or ſtimulate them to their own defence. The elevation of Viſconti muſt prove their fall; the ballance of power in Italy would be loſt by the depreſſion of their ſiſter republic; but all arguments of reaſon and policy were ineffectual until Sforza had actually ſigned the alli- c ance with Venice. Whether their conduct proceeded from ſome ſecret connivance with Sforza, or aroſe from the confidence they had in his valour, hiſtory is ſilent; certain it is that they now firſt acceded to the treaty. The triple alliance was concluded about the middle of February: among other articles it was expreſly ſtipulated, that the two republics ſhould immediately remit to Sforza the pay of three thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; that all the towns, forts, and cities, with their dependencies, conquered in courſe of the war, ſhould be given to Sforza, Cremona alone excepted, which was to revert to the Venetians; that if Cremona only ſhould be taken, it ſhould in this caſe become the property of Sforza, the general and commander in chief of the combined army; that any number of forces he ſhould think neceſſary, ſhould be levied at the joint expence of both ſtates; that Sforza d ſhould directly march into Lombardy to relieve the Venetians, who were hard puſhed in that quarter: Nicholao D'Eſte was likewiſe included in this treaty; and it was ſtipulated to ſupport, at the expence of the republics, Guido Favalino with fifteen hundred horſe and three hundred foot, together with his ſon Borſia with one thouſand horſe, as auxiliaries, to act by the direction of Sforza [t].

League between the Venetians, Florentines, Sforza, and D'Æſte.

PHILIP, finding that he was miſtaken in his conjectures concerning Sforza, left no ſtone unturned to regain his friendſhip, but he was too far engaged to retract with honour; beſides, he paid little regard to promiſes, which had already ſo often been falſified. At Venice, although this league was eagerly deſired, it was ſuſpected; jealouſies were entertained of Sforza's ſincerity: however, their preſent diſtreſs and the event juſtified the wiſdom of e the ſenate's conduct (A).

PICININO, underſtanding that the league was formed, took every precaution to with- A. This ſeemed a plan eaſily executed, if a fortreſs or two in which to form magazines could be ſeized. The whole plan was afterwards found to be Gonzaga's, who intended nothing more by it than to remove the ſeat of war at a diſtance from himſelf: he farther propoſed, that the fleet upon the Po might be brought either by land or water to the river Adice, by means of which he could greatly diſ-

(A) While the league was in agitation, a very extraordinary propoſal was made to the ſenate by a native of Candia, one Sorbolla, of carrying a fleet over land to the lake Benac, for the relief of Breſcia, at that time cloſely beſieged by Picinino. Sorbolla was a mechanic of a buſy, enterpriſing, and projecting diſpoſition; but withal ingenious and ſenſible. The ſcheme was firſt received as an impracticable and wild whim of the imagination, ſuggeſted by folly and madneſs: but after the ſenate had peruſed and weighed Sorbolla's memorial, they began to entertain ſome notion of the propoſal, and an high opinion of the projector. At length the experiment was reſolved upon, and the conduct of the whole committed to the artiſt, who was to be ſupplied with every thing neceſſary for the execution. Sorbolla immediately ſet to work: he firſt had the fleet, conſiſting, according to Blondus, of two gallies, three galliots, and twenty-five ſmall veſſels, towed up againſt the ſtream of the river Adice to Verona, and from thence to Mora. By land the ſhips were moved by engines upon rollers of a ſmooth hard wood for the ſpace of ſix miles from Mora to the lake of St. Andrew's. At length, three months after he left Venice, he arrived at Torbolles with his fleet, to the infinite fatigue of himſelf, and amazement of all who beheld him. Before his arrival the ſiege of Breſcia was raiſed, and Sorbolla's expedition was attended with advantage only to himſelf, who was well rewarded for his ingenuity.

treſs and harraſs the enemy [u]. But ſecretly as this project was concerted, Mellato obtained a ſome intelligence of it, which he immediately tranſmitted to Venice; but his accounts were diſregarded. Thus Gonzaga, having built eight gallies at Hoſtilia, ſent them with infinite expence and labour to the river Adice. Marino Contarini and Lodovico Molino were diſpatched by Mellato with a few ſhips, to ſtop their progreſs, if poſſible. Their firſt attempt began at Caſtagnaria: here vigorous ſkirmiſhes daily happened; but the Venetian forces being in-A ſea-fight. conſiderable, the enemy at length gained their point, and appeared on the Adice. Some days after the two fleets came to an engagement, in which neither ſide claimed victory, though the Venetians retired firſt, for which the commanding officers were diſgraced [w]. In conſequence of the retreat of the Venetians, Picinino laid ſiege to Lenaga, and reduced the beſieged to the neceſſity of capitulating. b

In this ſtate were affairs when an engagement happened near the lake Benac, which terminated more to the advantage of the Venetians than the laſt encounter. Ittalus lay at Sales with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, and was oppoſed by a corps greatly inferior to his own under Avogadre. They met at Moderna, a town to which Ittalus propoſed laying ſiege. The battle began with vigour, and was maintained with obſtinacy and conduct for the whole day: neither ſide ſeemed to have any chance for victory, until Zeno, the Venetian admiral on the lake, bringing his ſhips as cloſe as poſſible to the ſhore, landed a body of The Venetians victorious. ſeamen, who ſoon turned the ſcale in favour of Avogadre. The ſailors attacked Ittalus in the rear, and ſo galled him, that, unable longer to keep the field, he retreated in diſorder, leaving behind a great number of ſlain, wounded, and priſoners, to the amount of one thou- c ſand five hundred ſoldiers. Himſelf eſcaped under favour of a dark night; but fifty of his chief officers were taken [x].

A. D. 1438. In the mean time Sforza ſet out for the army from La Marca, attended by a numerous retinue of young nobility and gentry. On his arrival at Arimini, the head-quarters fixed for the army, he ordered a general muſter, when the troops were found complete. He had heard of Picinino and Gonzaga's intention of removing the war into Padua and Vincenza, and reſolved, if poſſible, to anticipate their project, by puſhing into Lom- bardy [y]. His firſt attempt was upon Forlimpopoli, which he ſoon reduced; thence marching to Ravenna, news was brought him, that the enemy had ſeized upon all the territories of Verona and Vincenza. The city Verona was cloſely beſieged, and the burghers of both ca- d pitals had mutinied and expelled the Venetian garriſons: in ſhort, without the utmoſt expedition and good fortune, thoſe cities, it was feared, muſt fall into the hands of the enemy.
The commotions aroſe from the wanton oppreſſion of the garriſon, who treated the inhabitants with unbridled licentiouſneſs and rapacity. The Paduans were ſoon perſuaded to pacific meaſures upon the return of their governor; but the Vincenzans were more obſtinate.
They ſaid, that they wanted no foreign defence; that their loyalty to the republic, and their own bravery, were ſufficient for the ſecurity of their city, and to repulſe all the attacks of their enemies. The Venetian ſenate had many proofs of their fidelity and affection, which were ſtronger barriers againſt Philip's power than thouſands of hireling troops. Mellato, hearing of the expulſion of the garriſon, haſtened thither; but finding the Vincenzans firmly e attached to the Venetians, and that only a noble reſentment of the inſults and wrongs ſuſtained from the troops, occaſioned the preſent troubles, he greatly commended their ſpirit and zeal, aſſured them of the protection of the republic, and left the inhabitants to defend their own city [z].

Sforza marches to the Veroneſe. The intelligence Sforza had received from Padua and the Veroneſe made him change his meaſures: quitting Ravenna he went to Rancannes, where he obliged Guido and Franciſco, Picinino's ſons, to retire with a large body of cavalry to Forli. Hence, through the Bolog- neſe, he paſſed to Bodina, where, ſhipping his heavy baggage on the Po, he proceeded thro' Ferrara to Adria, and arrived in the Paduan territories, having croſſed four great rivers, in half the time expected. Another muſter of his army was made, and it amounted to ſix f thouſand two hundred and forty-four horſe, and eight thouſand ſix hundred foot, complete and fit for action. His firſt care was to effect a junction with the troops under Mellato, which was happily accompliſhed by the good conduct of both generals. Sforza's army now amounted to fourteen thouſand horſe and eight thouſand foot, a force ſufficient to carry on the war offenſively [a].

The diſtreſs of Breſcia. During theſe tranſactions in the Paduan and Veroneſe, Breſcia was reduced to great extremities, inſomuch that nothing but the invincible zeal and courage of Barbaro could maintain the inhabitants in their allegiance. Although Picinino had raiſed the ſiege in Jan- uary, yet during the whole winter and ſpring the Breſcians were infeſted by perpetual ina curſions of parties: the paſſes by which they could receive proviſion and forage were ſhut up; money was ſcarce, as the Venetians had remitted none for ſeveral months, ſo exhauſted were the finances of the republic; and to crown their miſery, diſeaſe and famine prevailed to a great degree. In this ſituation Barbaro was indefatigable, his ſpirit invincible, and his invention inexhauſtible: he raiſed money upon his own credit for the payment of his troops; laid in great ſtocks of cheſnuts, roots, and fruits, to ſupply the want of wheat and corn; he deceived his own troops and the enemy by feigned letters and correſpondences; he converſed affably with all degrees of the inhabitants, and liberally ſpent his fortune in their ſupport; his houſe was open to relieve the hungry of every degree; he procured troops of horſe to enter the city in the night with bags ſtuffed with hay, to perſuade the inhabitants

b into a hope of freſh ſupplies, and then the next day made a diſtribution of wheat and barley, which he had reſerved for his own uſe; he carried his patriotic artifice ſo far as to have arrows, with ſcrolls of paper, ſtuck at night in ſome of the high towers and ſteeples, as if they had been ſhot by his friends without, to acquaint him with their intentions of affording him ſpeedy relief.

ITTALUS had by this time encamped within a few miles of the city, with a conſiderable body of troops; and Barbaro, on promiſe of being powerfully ſupported by the mountaineers, reſolved to diſlodge him and ſet fire to a part of the enemy's fleet upon the lake [b]: but tho' the plan for both was concerted with all the foreſight which human prudence could direct, yet the execution failed, through ſome unaccountable circumſtances, and Barbaro
c was repulſed with loſs [c].

BRESCIA was ſituated in this manner while Sforza's approach obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege of Verona and retire to Savi, a town on the confines of the Veroneſe. Sforza then beſieged Longina, and after ſeveral aſſaults, in which he loſt two of his intimate friends, obliged it to ſurrender. This ſo incenſed him that he razed the walls to the ground, but had the humanity not to put the garriſon to the ſword: then drawing up his army in a hollow ſquare he marched againſt the enemy, who were encamped a few miles diſtant; but they declining battle, he turned towards Vincenza, and ſoon recovered all the towns which had been taken from the republic.

Sforza raiſes the ſiege of Verona, and reduces Longina.

Although the enemy had raiſed the ſiege of Verona, they continued to keep it blocked
d up by entrenchments, which Sforza, without great danger and imprudence, could not force. He therefore determined to relieve the city by paſſes over the mountains, which he effected, after a dangerous and tedious march.

In the mean time both Picinino and Sforza exerted all their skill about Breſcia, the one to diſtreſs, and the other to relieve Barbaro. The former relied chiefly on his perfect knowlege of the country, ſnares, ambuſhes, and intrigues. Sforza's genius and comprehenſion were greatly ſuperior: his ſchemes were extenſive, great, and worthy of a renowned commander; but then he neglected the minutiæ, on which often depend the fate of the fineſt laid ſchemes. The ſenate of Venice was under the utmoſt concern about a city that had ſo long and faithfully ſuſtained all the preſſure of extreme miſery: they ſent the moſt poſitive
e orders to Sforza to leave no means untried to relieve the truſty Barbaro and his brave garriſon. At laſt it was happily effected by the defeat of Picinino, and deſtruction of his army. Before the engagement began, Sforza animated his troops with every argument that could inflame their courage; he ſet before them the example of the Breſcians, and the fair proſpect of immortal glory, and booty, the ſtrongeſt inducements of any to a ſoldier [d]. His diſpoſition was ſo judicious, his choice of the ground ſo excellent, and his courage, throughout the engagement, ſo conſpicuous, that the ſucceſs could not be attributed to the fate of war. It was the natural conſequence of that aſtoniſhing diſplay of the fineſt talents and capacity. He was ſupported by his army with all the courage he could deſire; and a ſort of rivalſhip ſeemed to prevail who ſhould beſt execute their general's commands.
f Picinino, after his right wing gave way, made one deſperate puſh againſt the Venetian infantry on the right, which they were unable to withſtand: they were broken and put in confuſion, when Sforza arrived with a freſh corps, who ſuſtained the enemy while he was rallying the diſordered lines. This effected, he renewed the attack with ſuch impetuoſity, as baffled all reſiſtance, broke the enemy, and made prodigious ſlaughter, Picinino eſcaping with difficulty in a mean diſguiſe. Sforza imagined he had been among the priſoners; but finding that he was miſtaken, he offered a reward of five thouſand crowns to whoever ſhould take him alive [e]. Near four thouſand priſoners were made, and among them a great number of nobility and officers of the firſt diſtinction.

ZENO, with the Venetian fleet on the lake Benac, was, during this time, leſs ſucceſsful:

fleet, and Ittalus a land army upon the banks of the lake. The latter made ſo good uſe of a the victory, that he ſoon reduced the ſtrong caſtle of Moderna.

As to Sforza he was called from purſuing his victory to relieve Verona, cloſely beſieged by a ſtrong detachment Picinino had ſent for that purpoſe before the engagement. Before he could arrive the enemy were in poſſeſſion, by means of a ſtratagem which ſucceeded, and Gonzaga was proclaimed prince of Verona. The citadel and ſome forts were ſtill in the hands of the Venetians, and defended againſt all the arts and power of the enemy. Sforza ordered lines of circumvallation to be formed, to prevent Gonzaga's eſcape or ſuccour, and the works were proſecuted with ſo great diligence, that in four days the trenches were open- ed, and the batteries began to play with prodigious fury upon the walls. There was ſome- thing extraordinary in the ſituation of the enemy, who were beſieging the citadel at the very b time they were beſieged in the city. In this condition it was not poſſible they could hold out long: nor in effect did they, for the third day after the batteries were opened a breach was made, and Sforza ordered it to be ſtormed [f]. The troops mounted with ſo much reſo- lution, and were ſo well ſupported by a ſally from the citadel, that the town was ſoon enter- ed, and the enemy chaſed with great ſlaughter about the ſtreets. The inhabitants had kept themſelves cloſe in their houſes, without joining with either party, until the enemy were de- feated: then they began to give proofs of their courage and loyalty, by inſulting the dead and wounded, and knocking on the head the few ſtragglers that remained: but this would not ſatisfy Sforza; he demanded clearer proofs of their fidelity, and examined every cir- cumſtance concerning the ſtratagem by which the enemy gained poſſeſſion. The inquiry c did not turn out greatly in favour of the citizens, many of whom were convicted of treaſon- able practices, and puniſhed accordingly; others were pardoned, and the whole exhorted to a more faithful diſcharge of their duty [g]. The news of Sforza's ſucceſs was received with great joy at Venice, and a ſolemn ambaſſy ſent to compliment him upon his conduct; and henceforward the fortune of the republic began to riſe, while that of Philip and Picinino viſibly declined. In conſequence of Sforza's victories Breſcia was relieved, and an inter- courſe opened between all the parts of the Venetian dominions.

A. D. 1440.

PHILIP ſoon recruited Picinino's broken army, took meaſures for protracting the war by a ſecret contract with Cornetano the pope's general: herein it was ſtipulated, that Corne- tano ſhould invade La Marca, while Picinino, croſſing the Po, ſhould enter Tuſcany. The d pope, ſuſpecting his general's fidelity, narrowly watched his conduct, which was at laſt fully cleared up by ſome intercepted letters; in conſequence of which Cornetano was ſeized and committed to the caſtle of St. Angelo [h]. This detection diſconcerted Philip's plan, but he was not daunted. Picinino entered Flaminia, and laid every place waſte with fire and ſword, though he could make no impreſſion on the fortified towns, which were bravely defended.

His holineſs in the mean time ordered Lodovico, one of his biſhops, to lead the army, late Cornetano's, to Tuſcany, in quality of apoſtolical legate, and join the Florentines; a proceeding which it was ſuppoſed would fruſtrate Picinino's intention [i]. But this general, after he had been repulſed by Piſani in his attempt upon Primotoria, marched directly with deſign to croſs the Apennines. All poſſible precautions were uſed by the Florentines to guard e the paſſes, which Picinino found means, however, to avoid, by marching over mountains almoſt impervious. In this manner did he get to Politiana, which he beſieged, to the great terror of the Florentines, who every minute expected him at their gates. This city he took, and inſtead of marching to Florence turned his arms againſt the Caſſentines, ruining and de- ſtroying every place he paſſed through. Picinino's overſight produced a fatal alteration in his affairs; for before he came from his excurſion againſt this people, the Florentines had joined the pope's forces, and were in a condition to act offenſively [k]. Early in the ſpring Sforza marched with a prodigious army to Tuſcany. He propoſed making his way through the midſt of the enemy's troops and garriſons, in order to act in conjunction with Contarini, who commanded the Venetian fleet upon the lake Benac. The chief ſtrength of the enemy f had always been directed againſt Breſcia, which ſtill was in great want, notwithſtanding the ſuccours received. Sforza determined, at all events, to relieve it; but herein he foreſaw numberleſs difficulties: the greateſt of which was, the almoſt impoſſibility of ſupplying his army with proviſion and forage. When he came to the river Mincia, he called a council, to conſult what was beſt to be done in this critical ſituation; whether or not he ought to paſs the river, the conſequence of which would be a neceſſity of opening his way to Breſcia by the ſword? The council was unanimouſly of opinion, that every thing was to be hazarded for the relief of a city, which had, through ſuch a ſeries of calamities, maintained a equipping a fleet in carts to Torbolles, the carpenters fell to work with the utmoſt diligence, and, in a ſhort time, launched ſix gallies. With theſe Contareni ſailed againſt the enemy, who were near double the number, commanded by Blaſio Aſſereta, a Genoeſe. Contareni took on board ſix companies of ſoldiers, to annoy the enemy with their arrows and ſmall arms. The ſecond day he met and engaged the enemy with a ſpirit, intrepidity, and conduct, that ſoon made him victorious. The battle was very bloody while it laſted; the very elements combined to increaſe the horror of the ſcene, it blowing a ſtorm during the whole engagement. In the end the enemy were totally broken, routed, and diſperſed, two of their gallies, with their crews, were ſunk, and two more taken. Contareni, purſuing his victory with prudence equal to his courage, attacked and reduced Riva, La Garda, Laciza, and Bardolin, b in order to open a communication with Breſcia. The news of this victory greatly animated the Breſcians: they now did not doubt of immediate and effectual ſuccours, from the efforts of Contareni on the one ſide, and of Sforza on the other [l].

SFORZA, before he had intelligence of this victory, had croſſed the Mincia, and reduced Montzabena, Salles, and Rivoltella: here, by the advice of the brave Barbaro, he reſolved, inſtead of marching directly to Breſcia, to ſeek the enemy's main army, and give it battle, knowing, if he was victorious, that it would be a great ſtep not only to the relief of Breſcia, but towards finiſhing the war [m]. Hearing that Sanſeverino, Ittalus, and Vermio were entrenched near Socinna, he departed in the night, and furiouſly attacked their entrenchments. After the aſſault had continued for ſome hours he began to fall back, as if his troops were unable c to ſtand the charge: having drawn the enemy out of their trenches, he returned fiercely to the attack, broke and entirely routed them with the loſs of three thouſand men killed and taken priſoners. Paſius of Arimini, quoted by Sabellicus, ſays, that he entered the town of Socinna pell mell with the fugitives, and took it without reſiſtance [n]. In conſequence of this victory the New Orges, and all the cities, towns, forts, and caſtles of the Breſcian, Bergameſe, and valley of Cremona, returned to the obedience of the republic. Croſſing the Oglio, Sforza reduced Caſſel-Major, Bregnan, Rinolea, and other towns in the territories of Ghiradadda and the Cremoneſe [o]. In a word, his conqueſts were ſo rapid, that Philip reſolved to recal Picinino out of Tuſcany, for the defence of the Milaneſe, which was greatly alarmed by the vicinity of Sforza. This general, knowing the importance of leaving the Florentines and d pope's forces unoppoſed, and that the loſs of the places he had taken would neceſſarily enſue, reſolved to give the allies battle before his departure. With this intention he marched to Anglare, where they were encamped at the bottom of the Apennines. The Florentines could not ſtand the firſt ſhock, but were put in ſome confuſion, when the pope's forces, pouring in upon the enemy with great vigour, retrieved the battle. Picinino had purſued the Florentines too far; he was now attacked in the flank and rear by the pope's army: theſe, aſſiſted by the Florentine horſe, fell upon him every where, during his purſuit of the Florentine infantry: thus, hemmed in on every ſide, he was broke and put in confuſion, great ſlaughter was made, and an incredible number of priſoners were taken. His intimate friend Aſturio Faventino was among the latter, a circumſtance that affected Picinino more e than the loſs of the battle [p]. We are told by Sabellicus, that ſo great was the reciprocal affection of thoſe friends, that they were with difficulty prevented from falling on their ſwords when they were ſeparated.

SFORZA in the mean time purſued his conqueſts, having taken Cavanza after an obſtinate defence, together with Azola and Caneda, towns belonging to Gonzaga, which made but a ſlight reſiſtance [q]. From thence he proceeded and laid ſiege to Peſcara, a city ſeated at the mouth of the river Mincia: Nicholao D'Æſte came to the camp, offering his mediation for a peace. D'Æſte farther aſſured Sforza that Philip would willingly give him his daughter in marriage, and even ſend her with her portion to him, if required. It was Sforza's anſwer, that peace would be equally agreeable to the Venetians and to himſelf, not- f withſtanding their rapid courſe of proſperity, could it be obtained on equitable and honourable conditions [r]. D'Æſte returned to Philip with this anſwer, and during his abſence Peſcara ſurrendered at diſcretion.

PICININO, after his defeat, retired with his broken army into Flaminia; from thence he ſet out by long marches for Milan, where he was in a ſhort time recruited and enabled to take the field. Nothing material, beſides the ſurrender of Ravenna to the Venetians, happened during the remainder of this campaign. Sforza, having put his army into winter-quarters, went to Venice; where he was received with a profuſion of honours, worthy of his great merit and ſervices [s]. He was run after, and gazed upon as a prodigy. When he came to the gates of the city, the ſenate, the ſeignory, and all the nobility went out to meet and conduct him to the palace, where he was entertained by the doge with the utmoſt diſtinction and magnificence. Barbaro, and an hundred Breſcian gentlemen, were likewiſe come to Venice, to compliment the republic on the late ſucceſs of her arms, and do honour to the marriage of Jacomo Foſcari, ſon to the doge. In ſhort, nothing but mirth and feſtivity was thought of, when intelligence arrived of the ſudden march of Picinino into the Breſcian, where he laid waſte every thing, and ſpread conſternation and ruin all over the face of the country [t]. Sforza immediately ſet out to aſſemble his army; but, in ſpite of his expedition, Picinino had poſſeſſed himſelf of all the champain country, the Venetian dominions on the banks of the Adda, and the Bergameſe, before a body ſufficient to oppoſe him could be collected. a

THE enemy, finding that Sforza was taking effectual meaſures to attack them, ſeized upon a ſtrong camp near Agleſia, defended by the river Seriolles in front, the mountains in both flanks, and in the rear by the Oglio. In this ſituation did Picinino watch the motions of Sforza, who did not long heſitate about giving him battle under all diſadvantages. Having viewed the ground, Sforza ordered the bridge on the Oglio to be attacked, at the ſame time advancing with the main army on the enemy's front, he forded the Seriolles [u]. The engagement laſted for two hours with great fury, when night coming on, ſeparated the combatants, and probably ſaved Picinino's army (A). The carnage was conſiderable, neither ſide giving or receiving quarter. Immediately after this battle Sforza led his troops againſt Martinenga, which he inveſted with the moſt complete army the Venetians had ever raiſed: the troops amounted to thirty thouſand fighting men, well cloathed, paid, and attended with a fine train of artillery. Though the trenches were ſoon opened, and the batteries began to play with execution, yet the ſiege was drawn out to a great length: ſome attributed this to ſecret practices between Picinino and Sforza, who, they alleged, were more intent upon dividing the provinces among themſelves, than on the intereſt of the ſtates by whom they were employed: others ſaid it was owing to the ſtrength of the place, the numerous garriſon within, and Picinino's army without, which omitted no opportunity of harraſſing and incommoding the beſiegers [x]. Certain it is, that the ſenate entertained no diſtruſt of Sforza's fidelity: but the caſe with Philip was different; he began to harbour ſuſpicions of both, and thought it unſafe to commit ſuch vaſt armies to men whoſe ambition might uſe them to the utter extinction of both the contending powers. Impelled by theſe reaſons, wearied with the intolerable expence of the war, and, as ſome affirm, out of patience with the haughty demands of Picinino, he reſolved upon peace: for which purpoſe he diſpatched a meſſenger with great ſecrecy to Venice, to ſound the diſpoſition of the ſenate (B). At the ſame time he treated with Sforza; and the propoſals he made were ſo advantageous to the republic, that hoſtilities ceaſed the day after the arrival of Philip's courier in the camp [y]. Picinino highly reſented this treatment, and openly complained of the ingratitude and infidelity of Philip, for having preſumed to treat of peace without his conſent or knowlege. But, without paying any regard to his remonſtrances and indignation, the following articles, after violent debates, were agreed to, or rather were determined by Sforza, who was appointed umpire of the differences: that the Breſcian and Bergameſe ſhould unalterably remain to the republic; that Ravenna, Riva, Torbolles, and Penetra, cities of which they were poſſeſſed by right of conqueſt, ſhould become a part of the Venetian dominions; that Martinenga, with all the cities, forts, and caſtles of Ghiradadda, ſhould be ceded to Philip; that all the Mantuan confines and territories ſhould be given up to Gonzaga; that Cremona and the Cremoneſe ſhould be the portion of Sforza, with Bienca, Philip's daughter (C); that Eugenius the pope ſhould in two years have Bologna ſurrendered to him; that the Genoeſe ſhould be reſtored to their liberty, and Philip exert no farther authority over that republic; that the Florentines ſhould releaſe Faventino, upon his reſtoring to them all the places he had taken during the war; and laſtly, that the cities Peſcara and Lonnado, the articles moſt diſputed in the treaty, ſhould belong to the Venetians [z]. b c d e f

(A) Hiſtorians differ greatly concerning the event of this battle. Montano ſays, that Picinino did not quit his camp until after the taking of Portoglia. Paſſius affirms, on the contrary, that, unable to withſtand the ſhock of Sforza's impetuoſity, he decamped before the morning, and paſſed the Oglio, the bridge of which had been obſtinately defended by the body he had left there. However, Sabellicus ſeems to prefer the former opinion, and by his judgment the reader may probably be determined.

(B) Sabellicus ſays, that the peace was concluded by Sforza before any intimation was ſent to the ſenate. That though the Venetians did not diſlike the terms, they could not but wonder at the ſuddenneſs of Philip's reſolution. We are told, that ſo great was the deſire in both camps of a reconciliation, that the ſoldiers ran mutually and embraced each other, with all the tokens of eſteem and affection.

(C) This lady was ſent to Cremona to meet the bridegroom. Here their nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence and pomp; after which Sforza ſet out, with his bride, for Venice.

a THESE terms were agreed to and ſigned by all parties, the pope's nuncio excepted, who retired from the congreſs in a rage, and ſet out for Rome, complaining that the holy ſee was unjuſtly treated and robbed of its patrimony. Thus the public tranquility was reſtored, and the ruinous war with Philip concluded, to the mutual ſatisfaction of the Venetians and Viſconti [a] (D). For three days public rejoicings were made at Venice and Milan, the people expreſſing the utmoſt joy at the proſpect of a ſolid and laſting pacification between the republic and duchy of Milan. Venice never preſented a more beautiful and wealthy ſcene than on this occaſion, all the merchants from the Rialto to St. Mark's expoſing their richeſt furniture, merchandize, and plate, to public view; and the treaſure of that noble church, by order of the procurators, being laid out in the moſt elegant b manner for the entertainment of ſtrangers and the people [b].

THE remainder of this year produced nothing of conſequence, the attention of the republic being employed wholly upon the civil policy This winter it was that the procurators of St. Mark's were augmented in number, when, inſtead of ſix, nine of thoſe high magiſtrates were appointed [c]. An extraordinary overflowing of the ſea, or deluge, as Sabellicus calls it, happened towards the vernal æquinox, which deſtroyed a great number of houſes, ſhops, and warehouſes, the loſs of which was computed at a million of ducats. About this time a war againſt ſome piratical ſtates was commenced. The firſt Venetian fleet was deſtroyed in a ſtorm; but another ſoon after equipped, had the good fortune to clear the ſeas in a ſhort time, and ſecure the public commerce. War with pirates.

c EARLY in the ſpring, a fleet, at the expence of Eugenius, was equipped at Venice, to proceed againſt the Turks, who were rapidly purſuing their conqueſts in Europe. Of this armament we are told nothing beſides its having blocked up the ſtraits dividing Europe from Aſia, which for a time checked the progreſs of Amurath the Turkiſh emperor. As to the affairs of Italy, they were now, as uſual after every peace, diſturbed with the diſcontent of ſome of the parties concerned. The pope openly declared his reſentment againſt Sforza, for having kept him out of the poſſeſſion of Bolognia. Alphonſo of Arragon and Sforza began to renew a quarrel, hereditary in their families, and the former found means to draw Philip into a league againſt his ſon-in-law. However, though theſe wars diſturbed the peace of the neighbouring powers for the ſpace of five years, the Venetians kept them-d ſelves quiet until the year one thouſand four hundred and forty-ſix, at which time they found it expedient to join Sforza againſt Philip. Young Picinino's beſieging Cremona was the immediate cauſe of their taking part in the quarrel: they firſt ſent an envoy to Philip, to acquaint him with their intentions, if Picinino did not relinquiſh the ſiege. The haughty anſwer given to their miniſter occaſioned the ſenate to iſſue orders to their general Michaeli Attendulo, to march directly to Cremona and give battle to Picinino. Attendulo executed his inſtructions with ſucceſs, a battle being fought in Ghiradadda, in which Picinino was defeated with great ſlaughter of his troops, and the loſs of four thouſand priſoners, his camp and artillery. Another battle ſoon paſſed, in which Attendulo was a ſecond time victorious, and Picinino's defeat little leſs complete than the former [d]. Two ſuch ſignal victoe tories excited the jealouſy of Sforza, though upon the whole he was to reap the advantage: Alphonſo and the pope was likewiſe envious of the ſucceſs and growing greatneſs of the republic on the continent. They therefore left nothing untried to induce Sforza to break with the Venetians and go over to Philip: upon this he reſolved without ſcruple; but the Venetians ſuſpecting his deſign committed his envoy to priſon, and revoked all the grants and decrees of the ſenate in his favour [e]. Now it was that the republic had occaſion for the full exertion of that unſhaken reſolution ever diſcovered upon all hazardous conjunctures. The ſenate accordingly ordered the army to be augmented, the paſſes to and from Lombardy to be ſtrictly guarded, and every other meaſure for vigorouſly proſecuting the war intended. Attendulo, after the victory upon the Adda, carried terror and devaſtation where-f ever he marched: Crema and Lodes were the only towns left to Philip, the whole of the province beſides he reduced under the obedience of the republic. He even over-ran ſome part of the Milaneſe, his cavalry making incurſions to the very gates of Milan. Reinforced by a conſiderable corps under Carolo Montone, ſon to Brachio, the implacable enemy of Philip and Sforza, he took Caſſel-Major and other fortified places. Brandelino, with a ſtrong detachment, erected the Venetian ſtandard within ſight of Milan, inviting the inhabitants to the recovery of their liberty, which they not caring or daring to accept, he returned to the main army, laying deſolate the whole country [f]. Philip ſtruck with the good fortune and boldneſs of the Venetians, ſent agents to treat of a peace; but after they had reſided for a a month in the city they were diſmiſſed without effecting their purpoſe. Attendulo was all this while purſuing his conqueſts: he beſieged and took Brebia, ſcoured and laid waſte the country of the Briantines, ſurpriſed and ruined Barri, and in ſhort extended the dominions of the republic from the Adda to Coma, on both ſides the lake of that name.

Philip dies. THESE ſucceſſes were ſoon followed by the death of Philip duke of Milan, the greateſt politician and warrior the family of Viſconti had ever produced [g]. His death occaſioned a variety of ſentiments among his ſubjects and party; ſome were for peace, ſome for liberty, and others for war. The inhabitants of Lodes and Plaiſantia or Placentia, tired of the ducal yoke, opened their gates to the Venetians, and received the troops of the republic; but the Milaneſe determined to continue the war in their own name: for this purpoſe they b augmented their troops, and appointed Sforza captain general, on condition, that if he was fortunate enough to reduce Breſcia, that city and its appendages ſhould be his reward; but that if he ſucceeded againſt Verona likewiſe, the former ſhould revert to the Milaneſe, and
A. D. 1447. the latter, with the whole Veroneſe, be ceded to his family. This general quitted the Parmeſan, and ſet out with four thouſand horſe and two thouſand foot, to join the Milaneſe army under Franciſco and Giacomo Picinino, ſons to the late general of that name, ſo long the riAttendulo retires. val and enemy of Sforza. The Venetian army, greatly inferior to the enemy in number, retired towards Lodi, and there ſtrongly entrenched itſelf. No leſs than three different ambaſſadors were ſent to Venice, to demand, in the name of Sforza and the Milaneſe, reſtitution of all thoſe places they had diſmembered from the dominions of Philip. The ſenate c adhered to their firſt anſwer, that though by the right of war thoſe places were the juſt dominions of the republic, yet, to ſhew the world their pacific inclinations, they would reſtore them on being reimburſed the expences of the war. This the ambaſſadors refuſed, and accordingly returned, without having brought their buſineſs to any concluſion [h]. Aware of the importance of the quarrel in which they were engaged, the ſenate determined to uſe their utmoſt efforts by ſea and land. It was decreed to equip a fleet, which ſhould ſail up the Po, to make a diverſion in favour of Attendulo, who was too weak to offer the enemy battle.

DURING theſe preparations at Venice, Sforza marched ſuddenly to Placentia, and after having beat down the walls by his batteries, ſtormed the city, reduced it, and gave it to his d army to be plundered. Gerardo Dandolo and Thadeo D'Eſte, who commanded the garriſon, were made priſoners, together with one thouſand horſe and foot. Attendulo, tho' his force was not ſufficient to raiſe the ſiege, determined, however, not to lie idle: he entered the territories of Pavia while Sforza beſieged Placentia, from which he returned loaded with rich booty. After this he ravaged and plundered the Milaneſe, and, according to Montano, took the city Melſa or Meliſſa. Having finiſhed theſe exploits he reſolved on the ſiege of Cremona, but was prevented by the ſurrender of Placentia and rigour of the ſeaſon, upon which he retired with his army into winter-quarters [i].

Now negociations of peace were again renewed, and commiſſioners from each party met e at Bergamo, to diſcuſs the conditions of accommodation. Pope Nicolas V. uſed all his endeavours to promote the conferences; notwithſtanding which, and the mediation of ſome other powers, the commiſſioners parted without coming to any determination, both ſides unalterably adhering to certain articles which could not be ceded by the oppoſite party.

WHILE the congreſs ſat at Bergamo, the Venetian fleet was employed againſt the pirates, who had inſulted their coaſts and plundered their merchant ſhips. The eager purſuit of the pirates drew on the republic the reſentment of Alphonſo of Arragon, greatly incenſed at the Venetian fleet for preſuming to attack and deſtroy the enemy in his harbours. In revenge the king ordered all the Venetians in his dominions to be impriſoned, their ſhips ſtopped, and merchandize to be ſeized and brought to his warehouſes; but finding the ſenate reſolf ved upon a war, he ſet the priſoners at liberty and reſtored their effects [k].

A. D. 1448. EARLY in the ſpring both armies took the field, and Sforza beſieged and took Mozaniga; after which marching into Ghiradadda he reduced the whole country, the city of Caravaggio excepted: he then ſurpriſed Caſſan, and thence proceeded to the Cremoneſe to ſtop the ravages of Quirini and the Venetian fleet. Here he got together about twenty-eight galliots, with which and his army he ſurrounded Quirini. The Venetian fleet fought with obDefeats the Venetian fleet. ſtinacy, but in the end was defeated and broken. To prevent his ſhips falling into the enemy's hands Quirini ſet fire to them; for which, and his miſconduct in the engagement, he was recalled, delivered over to the civil power, and impriſoned for life. After this victory Sforza laid ſiege to Caravaggio, to which place Attendulo followed him, with intention, if poſg ſible, to raiſe the ſiege. After various debates in the Venetian camp, it was at length reſolved

a ſolved ſecretly to attack Sforza by croſſing the marſhes in the rear of his camp, which was but ſlightly guarded, on account of the natural ſtrength of the ſituation. The ſcheme was planned with conduct, and executed with courage; but ſupported by a force unequal to the undertaking. The firſt onſet was furious, the attack and defence being made with equal intrepidity and vigour: after the battle had continued for ſeveral hours, and the Venetians had forced the entrenchments, oppreſſed with numbers, they were forced to retreat with precipitation [l]. Here it was that Sforza's army began the ſlaughter; the Venetians crowding upon each other to avoid the enemy's blows, met that death from each other which they thought to eſcape from the enemy. They no ſooner began to give way than the two Picinino's, iſſuing forth from another quarter, marched directly, with a ſtrong corps, to attack
b the Venetian camp, which they eaſily took, the whole army being engaged in forcing Sforza's entrenchments: in ſhort, Attendulo was entirely defeated, having loſt near three thouſand of his beſt troops, all his baggage, tents, and artillery, together with two thouſand waggons of proviſion and forage. After this defeat he retired to Breſcia, where, in a ſhort time, he was purſued by Sforza, after he had firſt reduced Caraovaggio, Caſſel-Major, and ſome other places [m].

Defeats the land forces.

The republic ſoon recruited her army, having for that purpoſe decreed a large bounty to all able-bodied men who ſhould enter into the ſervice. The pay of the troops was likewiſe augmented, and conſiderable ſubſidies granted to ſeveral petty princes who entered into her alliance: but her greateſt ſecurity aroſe from ſome jealouſies which aroſe among the c enemy. The Milaneſe began to harbour ſuſpicions that Sforza affected the ſovereignty of his father in-law's dominions, and having but juſt taſted the ſweets of liberty they were the more willing to preſerve that precious gift of Providence. Sforza diſcovering their ſuſpicions, reſolved to avenge himſelf, by concluding an alliance with their enemies: with this deſign he gave the ſenate to underſtand that he was not averſe to peace; to which the republic gave a willing ear, notwithſtanding the Venetian army was now in a condition to act offenſively, by means of the number of levies and ſtrong reinforcements from Florence. Maſtropietro was in conſequence privately ſent to treat with Sforza, between whom it was agreed, that not only a peace but a ſtrict alliance ſhould take place [n]; that the ſenate ſhould ſupply him with four thouſand horſe and two thouſand foot, until he had reduced Milan; that d thirty thouſand crowns per month ſhould be allowed for his table; and laſtly, that all the places poſſeſſed by Philip beyond the Adda ſhould belong to the Venetians. This treaty being ratified, Sforza ſet the priſoners at liberty, and croſſing the Adda, marched into the Milaneſe. After reducing all the country between the rivers Adda and Theſin, he pitched his camp five miles from Milan. Before he entered upon the ſiege of the capital, he took, by the aſſiſtance and good conduct of Marcello, who commanded the Venetian auxiliaries, Novara, Alexandria, and Parma: then he laid ſiege to Milan; but, previous to his opening the trenches, intelligence was received that Lewis of Savoy, having entered into treaty with the Milaneſe, had ſent an army under the conduct of John Campenſio to their aſſiſtance. Campenſio had reached Novara, when Sforza detached Coyoni with a ſtrong corps to oppoſe him, e who immediately attacking the army of Lewis defeated it, making Campenſio and about four hundred horſe priſoners.

Sforza quits the Milaneſe ſervice, and joins the Venetians.

While Sforza was battering the fort Mellignana, the Milaneſe within the city put to death a number of perſons of all ranks, whom they imagined eſpouſed his cauſe; after which the inhabitants aſſembled to the number of ſixty thouſand, and marched out of the city to give battle. Sforza having intelligence of all their motions drew up his army, and diſplayed ſo much capacity and judgment in his diſpoſition, that the Milaneſe, with all their ſuperiority of troops, not caring to hazard an engagement, retired into the city. Upon this he inveſted Milan more cloſely; but the number of inhabitants being ſo great he propoſed reducing the city by famine, it being abſurd to pretend aſſaulting it with an inferior f body of troops.

In this ſituation lay Sforza when jealouſies between the Venetians and him began to appear, which produced propoſals for an accommodation between the republics of Venice and Milan. After the terms had been debated and agreed upon they were referred to the arbitration of Sforza, conditionally, that he accepted of ſeven cities, not ſpecified, for his ſhare of Philip's dominions, leaving the people in poſſeſſion of all the reſt. The other articles were, that the Venetians ſhould maintain ſix thouſand, the Milaneſe two thouſand, and Sforza only one thouſand troops in his ſervice; that if he accepted of theſe terms he ſhould be eſteemed the friend and ally of both ſtates; if not he ſhould be declared an enemy, and war againſt him proſecuted with all the forces of both republics. Theſe articles being pre-g ſented to Sforza, he expreſſed juſt indignation againſt the Venetians, who, after all his im-

Sforza makes war on Venice and Milan.

GREAT preparations were made by both republics, and the Venetians put a ſtop to all trade and intercourſe with Florence, on her refuſal to join in the alliance againſt her old general. Sigiſmund Malateſte was appointed general of the republican forces: his firſt attempt was upon the forts which Sforza had built to block up Brebia. Two of theſe he burnt and deſtroyed, and the reſt would have ſhared the ſame fate had not Sforza's approach obliged him to retire beyond the Adda. All this while Sforza continued the blockade of Milan, which, in deſpite of the efforts of the Venetians, was reduced to great extremities. Malateſte having joined the corps under Coyoni, did all in his power to draw Sforza to a battle, which that wiſe general avoided, knowing the fate of Milan depended on his draw- b ing the war out to ſome length. At laſt the Milaneſe, conquered by famine, and ſtarved into ſubmiſſion, murdered Venieri the Venetian ambaſſador, and ſaluted Sforza prince, opening their gates, and receiving him with the ſame demonſtrations of joy they would the ſon of their lawful ſovereign [o]. Thus, by a change as ſudden as amazing, he inſtantly became the ſovereign and protector of a people he had but the day before perſecuted with all the rancour of an inveterate enemy. The Milaneſe having changed ſides, the Venetians reſolved to conclude a treaty of alliance with Alphonſo, who deſired nothing more than a war with Milan, and an opportunity of humbling Sforza. This was effected by the good conduct and addreſs of Paſcali Maſtropietro, the Venetian envoy at Naples [p]. Intelligence of the treaty c being received at Milan, Sforza reſolved to gain the Venetians by acts of generoſity and kindneſs; for this purpoſe he ordered all the Venetians who were impriſoned upon the late change of meaſures, to be ſet at liberty, and loaded with preſents and good offices, hinting to them at the ſame time his deſire of cultivating the friendſhip of the republic (E): but theſe overtures coming to nothing, both ſides prepared for a vigorous war. Alphonſo and the Venetians opened the campaign by ſeizing on Coyoni and a detachment of fifteen hundred horſe [q]. Some attacks were likewiſe made on the Florentines for having aſſiſted Sforza with money. For the better ſupporting the war a tax was laid by the ſenate on all perſons holding places and enjoying penſions from the government: they were likewiſe obliged upon their diſmiſſion to ſerve the government for ſix months at their own expence in the field. d Little progreſs was made by either ſide the firſt year of the war; but early the following ſpring both armies entered upon vigorous meaſures. Leoneſio the Venetian general, after he waſted the country about Lodes, and reduced ſeveral ſmall forts, marched directly to Milan, upon an aſſurance from ſome of the inhabitants of being ſtrongly ſupported: but finding that no inſurrection was like to appear, he went and laid ſiege to Socinna. Having battered the town for ſeveral days, a breach was made, which he ſtormed and carried after a bloody action. Sforza marched too late to the relief of this place: the armies being encamped for ſeveral days within a ſmall diſtance of each other, frequent ſkirmiſhes and briſk encounters paſſed, though no general battle enſued.

DURING theſe tranſactions on the river Adda, William of Montferrat, with four thouſand e horſe, ſpread terror and deſolation every where in the territory of Alexandria. From thence marching to Tortona and Pavia, he deſtroyed the whole country, and was in this manner proceeding in his conqueſts when Sacromer Viſconti, ſent by Sforza, ſuddenly attacked, defeated, and obliged him to retire to Caſtlenovo.

IN the mean time Alphonſo's general Ferdinand was not idle: having laid ſiege to Forlano, he took and deſtroyed it, after having forty days inceſſantly battered the walls. During the ſiege he twice routed Faventino, with the ſlaughter of two thouſand of his men, as he was attempting to relieve the garriſon: then marching into the territory of Sienna he inveſted Caſtlelina; but the fortifications being ſtrong, and the garriſon proving obſtinate, he

(E) This year pope Nicholas conferred ſome particular honours on the doge; ſuch as a golden ſword, a crown ſet with diamonds, &c. Preſents likewiſe to the ſtate were ſent by the king of Boſnia, and the vaivod of Croatia. The duke of Auſtria viſited Venice, and was magnificently received; but the entertainment and reception given to the emperor Frederic exceeded every thing of that kind, ever ſeen in Venice, both in grandeur and elegance. The ſenate, ſeignory, and whole city, went in the bucentauro, gondoles, ganzares, and other veſſels, richly adorned, to meet the emperor; whilſt the ladies, with no leſs pomp, waited on Leonora the empreſs. On their arrival on ſhore, they found the whole city and ſtreets hung with ſcarlet, purple, and the richeſt ſilks and cloths. Nothing but muſical inſtruments and the fineſt voices ſaluted the ear with ſongs of rejoicing and congratulation. They were both preſented by the ſenate with crowns of gold, richly ſet with jewels; a child's coat and cradle ſtudded with gold, jewels, and pearls, was given by the ladies to the empreſs, and other preſents, valued at a million of money. This entertainment in the palace was magnificent beyond deſcription, the richneſs of Venice vying with the taſte and elegance of Italy. Their imperial majeſties expreſſed the utmoſt ſatisfaction, and departed highly delighted with the power, wealth, ſplendor, and hoſpitality of the republic. Sabel. ibid.

a abandoned it, and retired into winter-quarters. A detachment from Leoneſio's army defeated a corps of the Milaneſe ſent by Sforza to ſurpriſe him, and this little ſkirmiſh proved the prelude to a battle. Aleſſandro was detached by Sforza with four thouſand horſe and one thouſand foot, to ſtop the incurſions of the Venetians into the Milaneſe; and the Venetian general having intelligence of their rout ſent Carolo Montone to attack him, which he did with ſuch vigour that Aleſſandro was defeated, his army diſperſed, and only himſelf with a ſmall number of attendants eſcaped to Sforza's camp, which then lay before Calviſiana [r]. The Venetians uſed every expedient for the relief of this place, without which the enemy could not winter in their dominions: but all their endeavours proved fruitleſs, though they afforded the officers many opportunities of diſplaying their valour. Among others one in b particular deſerves notice: Leoneſio being apprized of a convoy of one thouſand horſe going to the enemy's camp, he detached Gonzaga and Brandolino to make an attempt on it: they met the enemy near Iſſea in the Breſcian, and fell upon them with ſo much intrepidity, that they ſoon were maſters of the convoy. Sforza receiving timely notice of the loſs, detached a ſtrong body to recover the booty. The Venetians ſuſtained the enemy with great bravery, but would at length have been overpowered with numbers, had not Leoneſio with the reſt of the army come up to their relief. The ſcale was now turned, and the enemy would infallibly have been defeated, but that Sforza arrived to their ſupport: here a general and obſtinate engagement began, which continuing for ſeveral hours, was at length ended by the darkneſs of the night. The only mark of victory on either ſide that appeared was,

c the Venetians carrying off the convoy [s]: however, it did not raiſe the ſiege; on the contrary, Sforza aſſulted the town with redoubled vigour, and the garriſon, unable to withſtand his efforts, ſurrendered priſoners of war. Thus, by the acquiſition of Calviſiana, did he eſtabliſh winter-quarters in the enemy's territories. The Venetian writers affirm, that before the armies left the field, Leoneſia frequently offered battle to Sforza, which he as conſtantly declined. Hence they take occaſion to reflect on the courage of this great officer, without conſidering that it was Sforza's buſineſs to avoid a battle, ſince a defeat in the enemy's country muſt be attended with the ruin of his affairs.

Alleſſandro defeated by the Venetians.

A battle.

THE winter as uſual was ſpent in treaties, negociations, and alliances. Sforza and the Florentines ſent to the French king to requeſt he would uſe his intereſt with the duke of d Savoy to break with the Venetians, and likewiſe prevail on Renatus of Anjou to attempt the recovery of his kingdom of Sicily, promiſing him liberal ſupplies of money. By this means they intended to divert Alphonſo from proſecuting the war againſt the Florentines. The king undertook their cauſe, and by his intereſt perſuaded the duke of Savoy to lay down his arms, and Renatus to paſs into Italy, purſue his claim to Sicily, and carry on war againſt Alphonſo.

THE Florentines ſtill continued in the alliance of Sforza, and entering upon action early A. D. 1452. in the ſpring recovered Fogliani, which had been taken from them laſt campaign. Manerba was beſieged by the Venetians, which they continued in ſpite of all the efforts of Sforza to relieve, until the brave Leoneſio was killed in a ſally from the town by a random

e arrow in the purſuit. The command of the army devolving upon Picinino, he proſecuted the ſiege ſo vigorouſly that the garriſon, finding they could expect no relief from Sforza, ſurrendered priſoners of war. This event was followed by the reduction of Quinzeno and Pontevico; after which he undertook the ſiege of Seniga, but was forced to raiſe it on the approach of Sforza with an army greatly ſuperior. A number of ſkirmiſhes daily paſſed, when Renatus with four thouſand horſe joined Sforza. The enemy being thus reinforced, Picinino was obliged to ſtand on the defenſive, during which time Sforza ſoon recovered Manerba, and all the other places loſt in the beginning of the campaign. Indeed the whole Cremoneſe and Breſcian, except the two capitals, were reduced under his obedience, or rather voluntarily ſubmitted. Picinino marched with the utmoſt diligence to the Breſcian, to ſtop the f progreſs of the enemy, and to defend the mountains, the inhabitants of which had as yet remained firm in their duty: here he fixed upon a ſtrong camp, ſo advantageouſly ſituated as to cover the paſſes to the mountains, and at the ſame time render all approaches to him difficult and hazardous. This put a ſtop to the progreſs of both armies, until the rigour of the ſeaſon obliged them to quit the field and retire into quarters [t].

DURING the winter, the Venetians, the pope, and Alphonſo, were buſied in preparing a fleet Fleet againſt the Turks. to oppoſe the Grand Seignor, who had reſolved on the ſiege of Conſtantinople early in the ſpring. The ſenate firſt decreed ten gallies and two argozais, of two thouſand tons each, to be ſent to Greece. Afterwards ten more were equipped, and theſe, joined to the pope's and A. a prodigious fleet and army. Loretano was obliged to fight his way through the Turkiſh a fleet to enter the harbour, which he did with a conduct and reſolution altogether aſtoniſhing. It would be unſeaſonable to enter on the particulars of this ſiege; ſufficient it is for our preſent purpoſe, that Loretano, perceiving the whole dependence of the enemy was on the land-forces, and that the Turkiſh fleet could be of little uſe, determined to ſail to Ne-gropont for the defence of the iſland, and there wait for a reinforcement ſufficient to engage the enemy [u].

WHILE the Venetian fleet remained in the Levant, their army was upon the defenſive, Sforza carrying all before him in Lombardy. He took Rhoads, Romagna, Martinenga, and Briſança; then he reduced the New Orges, Romanenga, and Socina. Towards the end of the campaign he began the ſiege of Iſola; but the heavy rains falling, made it impoſſible b for him to keep the field. Picinino's army was too weak to cover all thoſe places; and indeed he was kept in awe by a ſtrong detachment, which Sforza had ſent to watch his motions;
ſo that the winter came on before he was in a condition to enter upon action [w].

THE pope now laboured hard to mediate a peace, in order that the chriſtian forces might unite in defence of Conſtantine Paleologus and the Greek empire: but the endeavours of his Peace with Sforza. holineſs proved of no effect; though the peace was concluded by means of a mediator of leſs conſequence [x]. Simon Camertes, a hermit, was ſo indefatigable and eloquent, that he brought all parties to accede to the following terms: That Sforza ſhould reſtore to the Venetians whatever he had taken from them in the war, the territory of Ghiradadda excepted: that the marquis of Mantua ſhould reinſtate his brother Caroli in all his dominions: that Alphonſo c ſhould reſtore his conqueſts to the Florentines; with other articles of leſs importance. For the further ſecurity of the public tranquility it was expreſly mentioned, that if any future differences among the parties ſhould ariſe, the pope ſhould have ample and full powers to
A. D. 1454. determine them, his holineſs taking upon him to be guarantee of the treaty [y]. The city of Venice received with great joy the news that a war was terminated in which they had been hard preſſed by the vigour, conduct, and intrepidity of Sforza. Public thankſgivings were offered, and proceſſions made, attended by the doge, ſenate, and all the clergy, with images and relics of ſaints. Marcello was likewiſe ſent to Conſtantinople, to execute a treaty with Mahomet; and he returned, loaded with preſents and expreſſions of the friendſhip of that great monarch for the republic. d

Foſcari de- FROM this time to the year one thouſand four hundred and fifty-ſeven the republic en-was, at the age of ninety, laid aſide as ſuperannuated and unfit for the diſcharge of his important office: an inſtance of ingratitude conſiſtent, perhaps, with the meaſures of ſound policy, but very contradictory to the dictates of humanity. He was a prince of a noble and pleaſing aſpect, poſſeſſed a prodigious memory, flowing eloquence, ready wit, and ſound judgment, according to Baronius and the Italian writers. At this remarkable age he enjoyed good health, the perfect uſe of his limbs and faculties, remembered every incident from his childhood, had a ſweetneſs, and at the ſame time a majeſty and authority in his manner that equally commanded love and reſpect. He had greatly extended the power and e dominions of the republic, and was no leſs loved by his ſubjects than eſteemed and feared by ſtrangers and his neighbours; yet was this valuable and venerable prince ſacrificed to the politics of an ungrateful multitude: happy fruits, ſays Baronius, of a republican conſtitution!

The cardinal informs us, that his depoſition, as well as his acceſſion to the ſupreme magiſtracy, had been predicted; the latter by a gypſy in his father's life-time, the former by an aſtrologer at Venice, ſome months before it was thought of by the ſenate. He was no ſooner diveſted of the ſupreme authority, than leaving the palace with indignation he retired to a private houſe, where falling ill with grief, he died, univerſally lamented and eſteemed [z] (F).

a tranquility handed down by Foscari, executed the laws with justice and moderation, tempered the severity of old age with the innocent mirth and dissipation of youth, and blended the dignity of the prince with the ease and freedom of the companion: in short, he was a prince of great and shining virtues; of a penetrating judgment; open, sincere, and candid; a lover of peace, but profoundly skilled in the art of war [y]. In a word, all we have transmitted of this prince is a panegyric on his wisdom, prudence, bravery, and clemency, without facts to illustrate or confirm these virtues. Historians relate that he patronized men of letters and ingenuity, an instance of which they give in the kindness they shewed to Nicolo Jenson Tedescho, who first introduced the art of printing in Venice [z]. The doge made him very handsome and liberal presents; had the satisfaction of perusing some splendid editions A. D. 1462.
b of the classics and other books issued from the Venetian press. Thus, amidst employments useful to the public and glorious to himself Malipiero died, to the great affliction of the whole republic. In his room the senate substituted Christoforo Moro, a procurator of St. Mark, equally beloved for his disposition and admired for his capacity.

Containing the Origin and Progress of the Turkish War; the Rise of the War with the Triestines; Death of Moro; and the Transactions which occurred during the Ad- c ministration of Nicolo Throno, and others of his Successors.

CHRISTOFORO MORO, Doge LXVII.

THE first year of Moro's administration was spent in acts of civil discipline. Sansovino, indeed, tells us of a kind of war with the Triestines, which was soon made up at the pope's intercession [a]; but of this we find no mention in any other historian. The winter was taken up in preparations to oppose the Turks, who, after the surrender of Constantinople, and ruin of the Grecian empire, were desirous of seizing on the Morea as a dependency on their conquests. Thomas and Demetrius, the princes of this province, had three years before d offered the Venetians to put the Morea into their hands, for an equivalent in Italy [b]; but Demetrius giving his daughter in marriage to Mahomet, and going over to the Turks, frustrated that design. Thomas made some resistance near the streights, to the incursions of Othoman; but finding himself unequal to the power of that monarch he fled into Italy. The Grecian dominion being extinct in the Morea, the Venetians still held the towns they long possessed in that province: however, the encroachments of Othoman obliged them at length to take arms in defence of the trade and subjects of the republic in that quarter. It was with great caution the Venetians entered upon this important war: Victor Capello, their admiral, refused to succour Lesbos and Mitylene, though both islands offered to put themselves under the protection of the republic. The senate even passed over Othoman's infractions of e the late treaty, by crossing the streights of Gallipolis, lest thereby they should draw on a war with this potent monarch. They proceeded so far in their pacific measures as to be taxed with indifference and coolness for the Christian religion; but they wisely withstood all attempts to engage themselves in war, until the defence of their own rights and property rendered it unavoidable. Now a strong fleet under Loretano was equipped, and an army of fifteen thousand land forces sent to besiege Argers (A), lately taken by the Turks. Bertoldo D'Este, who commanded the army, soon made himself master of this city, defended by a small garrison, and gave it to be plundered by the soldiers. Basilia (B) was next reduced, after which he marched through the territory of Corinth, and encamped on the sea-coast, where Loretano rode at anchor with the fleet. Here D'Este and Loretano began a very laf borious and useful work, which they completed in fifteen days: they fortified with a wall and double moat the whole length of the streights, from the Ægean to the Ionian sea, about four thousand paces. Thirty thousand men, we are told, were employed in this work, finished with no less strength than expedition [d]. Six thousand Turks who lay before Corinth endeavoured all in their power to obstruct the workmen, but they were constantly repulsed with great slaughter. In the mean time D'Æste sent Coyoni with a detachment to seize upon Misistrate, where after having reduced the country round, and taken the town, he was killed in an assault upon the citadel. The city of Londaria was likewise seized by another detachment, after which D'Æste marched with the whole army to besiege Corinth:

(B) Basilia, or Basilico, a fortified town North of Corinth, situated on the coast of the gulph of Lepanto. It would seem from D'Æste's first attacking Argers, that the fleet sailed up the gulph of Napoli, the army marching along the banks of the river on which the town is situated.

the attack was made on the weſt, north, and eaſt ſides; that on the latter ſucceeded, for Attelano having broke down the walls with his cannon, ſtormed the breach, and effected a lodgment. D'Æſte in viewing of the batteries was killed the next day by a cannot ſhot, which with a furious ſally of the enemy, and the approach of the Turkiſh army, determined the Venetians to abandon the ſiege and retire to Napoli (C), where they were ſoon followed by an army of fifty thouſand horſe and thirty thouſand foot [e]. The Turks immediately undertook the ſiege, and cut off a party of the garriſon that had with more bravery than conduct ſallied out upon them; but Bertino, who ſucceeded D'Æſte in the command, exerted himſelf ſo vigorouſly, that with his ſmall army he forced the Turks to abandon the ſiege. D'Æſte was deſervedly blamed for abandoning the line he drew croſs the Iſtmus; though in fact this miſconduct ought to be attributed to Bertino, D'Æſte being killed before the ſiege of Corinth was relinquiſhed.

The Turks beſiege Napoli.

THE Turks having raiſed the ſiege of Napoli ravaged the territory of Modon, and cloſely inveſted Zanchio, an enterprize which the bravery of Giovanni Craſſo the governor fruſtrated. Upon this they retired out of the Morea, and left the Venetians at liberty to ſack and deſtroy the towns garriſoned by Turks [f].

Raiſe the ſiege.

To keep the republic in full employment, a war with the Trieſtines aroſe. The German merchants trading to Iſtria uſed to bring their goods to Cap-Iſtria, and other towns of the province, paſſing over Trieſte, on account of a particular impoſition on all foreign commodities. This was perceived by the Trieſtines, and that their trade declined: inſtead of taking off the tax, they had recourſe to the emperor Frederic, beſeeching that he would oblige the German merchants to frequent their markets, and prohibit the commodities of the empire to be carried to any other town within the province. The emperor paying no great attention to their requeſt, they determined to uſe force; upon which the inhabitants of Cap-Iſtria ſent ambaſſadors to beg the protection of the doge and ſenate of Venice. An envoy was immediately ſent to the Trieſtines, to deſire they would abſtain from moleſting the inhabitants of Cap-Iſtria; at the ſame time a ſquadron was ordered to anchor in the gulph of Trieſte, to keep the city in awe and give weight to the ambaſſy. The Trieſtines, however, continued their meaſures, which made the ſenate reſolve upon ſending a land army to lay ſiege to the city: for this purpoſe three thouſand horſe, four thouſand foot, and a train of artillery, were ſhipped under the conduct of four Venetian nobility. The city was immediately inveſted, and the ſiege carried on with great vigour for the greater part of the autumn: ſeveral ſharp ſallies were made from the town; and the Venetians, on the other hand, having made a breach in the walls, repeated their aſſaults: at laſt, the pope interfering, at his mediation the ſiege was raiſed, on condition that his holineſs would abſtain from proſecuting Sigiſmund Malateſte, whom he at that time blocked up in Arimini. Thus did the Trieſtine war end with the operations of one campaign, after the garriſon had been reduced to great extremities [g].

War with the Trieſtines.

A. D. 1464.

THE Venetian fleet and army having wintered in the Morea, were ready early in the ſpring to take the field; but orders were ſent that they ſhould wait for the arrival of Urſo Juſtiniano, appointed to take the command of the fleet and army from Loretano and Bertino. Before his arrival an encounter happened, in which the Venetians loſt fifteen hundred of their men, with Attendulo who commanded, near Modon. Urſo arrived at Modon a few days after, and taking upon him the command of the fleet left part of the forces in the Morea with Bertino, and ſailed with the reſt directly to Mitylene, which he attacked with great vigour. This was the capital of the iſland of that name in the Archipelago, taken a few years before by the Turks. A breach being made in the walls, Urſo ordered it to be ſtormed, where, after a bloody action for ſome hours, he was at laſt repulſed with great loſs, and forced to abandon the enterprize [h]. Quitting Mitylene he went to Nigrepont, where, reflecting on his miſcarriage, he died of a lowneſs and oppreſſion of ſpirits. Giacomo Loretano was ſent to take the command of the fleet, which ſailed upon the death of Urſo to the Morea. Sigiſmund Malateſte was appointed general of the army, and both the commanders immediately ſet out with a ſmall ſquadron and a reinforcement of one thouſand horſe to join the forces. Malateſte found the army in a miſerable condition after the death of Attendulo: he complained loudly of the injury done his reputation in appointing him general of a handful of diſeaſed broken troops, oppoſed to a numerous and powerful enemy: however, reſolved to make the moſt of his condition, he marched and laid ſiege to Sparta; but, after continuing two months before the walls, he was forced to abandon the enterprize [i]. During the ſiege of Sparta, Loretano with the fleet made a deſcent on Rhodes, returning a after he had waſted the iſland to Nigropont. Thus ended the campaign without any memorable action performed ſince the arrival of Malateſte and Loretano.

EARLY in the ſpring Loretano reſolved to paſs the ſtreights of Gallipoli, but was fruſtrated in the attempt by the ſtrength of the Turkiſh forts on each coaſt. The whole ſummer was ſpent in expectation of the event of pope Pius's endeavours to excite the other Chriſtian powers againſt the Turks; but his holineſs dying at Ancona, where he arrived to meet the ambaſſadors of different potentates, the whole enterprize ended in ſending a ſlender remittance of money to Matthias of Hungary [k]. The plague raging in Napoli di Romagnia, Malateſte retired with the army to Laconia, where he wintered, having attempted nothing during the whole ſeaſon. Victor Capello was ſent the next year to ſucceed Loretano; but no rein- A. b forcement was given to Malateſte. Capello ſailed to Aulida, which, with Larſa, he took, after a vigorous reſiſtance. He afterwards paſſed into the gulph of Corinth, upon the promiſe of the inhabitants to deſtroy the garriſon, and put the town of Patras into his hands. Here Barbadico, the proveditor, landed, and entering Patras, the ſoldiers immediately fell a pillaging, during which they were attacked by a body of Turkiſh horſe, and defeated; not above a thouſand, out of four times that number, eſcaping. Barbadico was killed in the tumult, and being afterwards known by his armour, his body was impaled [l]. Capello, not diſcouraged with this loſs, landed all the forces, and briſkly attacked the city; but was repulſed by a vigorous ſally, and forced, after great ſlaughter of his men, to ſeek refuge on board the fleet. He was ſo much affected with this loſs, that he fell ſick and died a few

c days after [m] (D). A. D. 1466. Venetians defeated before Patras.

THE republic, in the mean time, was involved in a war in Italy in ſupport of Bartholomeo of Bergamo, who came to a rupture with Ferdinand of Naples. However, before their troops joined him, a battle was fought, which brought on a peace. The next year was memorable for the loſs of Nigropont, which the Turks took in deſpite of all the attempts of the Venetian fleet, and obſtinate defence of the garriſon. All the garriſon was put to the ſword, and not even the ſick, the decripid, women, or children, ſpared [n]. This loſs greatly af- A. D. 1467.

fected the republic: the barrier of Italy was now in the hands of the enemy; and nothing remained but to lament the indolence, inactivity, and avarice, which had produced the calamity. The ſenate, when it was too late, augmented the fleet with forty-five additional

d ſail; a force more than ſufficient to have protected this important place, though unable to recover it. Nicolao Canalis, who commanded the fleet, determining, if poſſible, to regain the public eſteem, which he had undeſervedly forfeited for not covering Nigropont, to which his ſtrength was inadequate, ſailed immediately in queſt of the Turkiſh fleet, which had quitted Nigropont a few days before he was joined by Venieri, and the fleet from Venice. He got ſight of the enemy at Chios; but the Turkiſh admiral found means to elude an engagement. He then ſteered his courſe back to Nigropont, in hopes to ſurpriſe it; but the attempt miſcarried, with the loſs of two hundred men, and Giovanni Trono, one of the braveſt officers of the fleet. Here he was ſuperſeded by Pietro Mocenigo, to whom Canalis ſaid, that had he remained longer in his office, he doubted not of recovering Nigropont.

e Mocenigo replied, that if his hopes were well founded, he would willingly ſuſpend his authority for the good of the public; and at the ſame time offered him all the aſſiſtance he could in a ſubaltern capacity: an inſtance of public ſpirit rarely compatible with private ambition [o]. Canalis, upon this, declined continuing in a ſtation of which he was deprived by the republic, and returned to Venice; from whence, immediately on his arrival, he was baniſhed for life. Thus did this unfortunate officer fall a victim to popular diſcontent, and the miſconduct of the adminiſtration [p].

MOCENIGO no ſooner aſſumed the command than he returned with the fleet to the Morea, there to winter, deferring to enter upon action until the ſpring. Othoman ſpent the winter endeavouring to conclude a peace with the Venetians; for this politic prince appre-

Hiſtorians are profuſe in his praiſes; and indeed his actions beſpeak him one of the greateſt men ever Italy produced. Sabellicus equals him with Julius Cæſar; and perhaps not unjuſtly, had his ſituation admitted of actions ſo glaringly ſtriking as thoſe of the dictator: Baronius (1) ſays, he never loſt a battle, and calls him eloquent, juſt, chaſte, and pious. How far he might deſerve ſome of theſe epithets, the reader muſt judge from what we have related. Certain it is, that ambition and pride were ſtrong ingredients in his character.

How long this treaty which Othoman ſet on foot might have laſted, we know not: from this time to the death of the doge nothing is related by hiſtorians beſides an alliance formed with the ſophi of Perſia [q], which was concluded a few months before Moro died, and three years after the loſs of Nigropont. Moro's reign was

A ſort of ſlow cautious prudence ſeemed to characterize him, and produce the meaſures which had nearly terminated in the ruin of the republic: had Othoman been leſs employed in Hungary, he would undoubtedly have made his advantage of the important acquiſition of Nigropont.

NICOLAO TRONO, Doge LXVIII. b

Nicolao Trono, doge LXVIII. A. D. 1471.

NICOLAO TRONO was elected by the unanimous conſent of the ſenate and people to the ſupreme magiſtracy: his reign, though not very long, was proſperous, the event confirming the judicious choice of the ſenate. Upon his acceſſion, with the conſent and approbation of the republic, he ſent ambaſſadors to the pope and Ferdinand, to exhort them to arm againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendom: he likewiſe diſpatched an envoy to the king of Cyprus, with ſimilar inſtructions, all of whom received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of powerful ſuccours.

A. D. 1472. LITTLE was performed this year by the fleet under Mocenigo, beſides the ſurpriſal of ſome unimportant places in Ionia, and protecting Lemnos, upon which the Turks meditated a deſcent. Early in the ſpring he ſet ſail for Aſia Minor, where he waſted, deſtroyed, and c ſpread terror all over the coaſts, defeating the enemy in ſeveral encounters and ſkirmiſhes. On his return to the Morea he was joined by Ferdinand's admiral: having victualled the fleet at Modon, without waiting for the pope's auxiliaries, he ſailed directly for Rhodes, where he defeated a Turkiſh ſquadron that lay before the chief city, and blocked up the Chriſtian inhabitants: having likewiſe deſtroyed all the enemy's forts and works in the iſland, he ſet ſail for Capraria, and joined the pope's fleet under the conduct of a legate [r]. Mutual compliments and congratulations having paſſed, Mocenigo ſailed with his whole fleet, conſiſting of forty-ſix Venetian gallies, thirty-ſeven auxiliary veſſels, and two gallies from Rhodes, in all eighty-five gallies, for Satalia, which city he reſolved to attack. The Venetians attack and deſtroy Satalia. troops being landed the trenches were opened, and the city taken in a few days: all the d rich merchandize of the Eaſt, cinnamon, cloves, and ſpices, with great quantities of rich ſilks, were burnt and plundered by the ſoldiers, after which the citadel was ſtormed. The firſt wall was taken after a bloody encounter; but the ſcaling ladders proving too ſhort for the interior wall, Mocenigo was forced to raiſe the ſiege, which he did with great reluctance [s]. Thence he ſailed to Rhodes, where he met with the Perſian ambaſſador, who came to ſolicit fire arms and a train of artillery for his maſter to begin the war with the Turks, which Mocenigo promiſing, diſmiſſed him highly ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his ambaſſy, and the power of the republic [t].

Turks enter Italy. THE Turks in the mean time were not idle; for a large corps entering Italy croſſed the river Sancino, and ſpread terror and deſolation over the whole country of Friuli, but ad- e vanced no farther. Paul the ſecond ſeeing the danger to which Italy and the church were expoſed ſummoned a council, at which the ambaſſadors of a great number of princes and ſtates attended. Paolo Moroſini was ſent by the republic: this miniſter repreſented, in an elegant and pathetic oration, the ſhare the republic had for a ſeries of years taken in oppoſing the Turks, and defending the Chriſtian religion: he affirmed, that Venice alone had ſuſtained the whole weight of the Othoman power in Thrace, Illyrium, and the iſlands of the Archipelago; but that the enemy was now, through the indolence of the Chriſtian princes, arrived at ſuch a pitch of power, as not only threatened the extinction of the republic, but of Italy, and even of all Europe. Frederic the third was preſent; to him Moroſini chiefly addreſſed himſelf, affirming there was now a poſſibility of cruſhing the proud Othoman, if his f imperial majeſty would undertake the Chriſtan cauſe with chearfulneſs equal to his great power. Baronius relates, that the emperor ſlept while the ſecurity of the church was debated, ſo ſoundly, that not the noiſe of the Turkiſh cannon could have waked him. Indeed, ſays Campanus, nothing could have withſtood Frederic had he fought half ſo vigorouſly as he ſnored: ſuch was the reſult of the council from which ſo much was expected.

MOCENIGO was in the mean time ravaging the coaſts of Aſia towards Chios and the promontory of Thermena: here Ferdinand's fleet parted with him and retired for the winter, notwithſtanding which Mocenigo reſolved to lay ſiege to Smyrna. Sailing from Neſſo the fleet arrived in three days before the city, to the no leſs aſtoniſhment than confuſion of the ina town than a horrible ſlaughter began without diſtinction of age or ſex: all were put to the ſword, in deſpite of Mocenigo's endeavours to prevent this maſſacre; the city was laid waſte, and immenſe ſums of gold and ſilver coin, plate, jewels, and other rich booty taken. The governor of the province having collected a conſiderable army marched againſt the Venetians, who firmly renewing the attack gave him ſo warm a reception, that the Turks were utterly defeated and broke, though the action was not of ſufficient duration to make the number of ſlain conſiderable. After this the Venetians returned to the city, and in revenge laid it in aſhes [u]. Thence the fleet ſteered to Clazomene, which having plundered, Mocenigo returned to Napoli in the Morea to winter (E). The pope's legate returned with his fleet to Italy, after paying the higheſt compliments to the Venetian admiral upon his con-

b duct and ſucceſs. Mocenigo diſpatched the Perſian ambaſſador in a galley to Venice: upon which the ſenate not only granted his demand, of a large train of artillery and ſtores; but likewiſe ſent great quantities of gold and ſilver, curiouſly wrought plate, a ſum of gold ducats, and ſeveral pieces of fine Verona ſcarlet cloth to Uſſan Caſſan.

Defeats the Turks.

AFTERWARDS Mocenigo ſteered his courſe towards Cilicia, and entering the harbour of Theodora, near Selucia, he met ambaſſadors from Caſſambet, the Caramanian, brother to Piraneet, king of Cilicia, to requeſt his aſſiſtance in the reduction of Sechin, Coria, and Selucia. Caſſambet doubted not but the ſurrender of thoſe three cities would re-eſtabliſh his family in the regal dignity, from which they were expelled by Othoman. The plan of the operations of the fleet and army being ſettled, Sechin was attacked with great fury, and carried through

c the vigour and conduct of Mocenigo. Coria and Selucia ſhared the ſame fate ſoon after, tho' the Turks exerted all the ſkill, courage, and power they were poſſeſſed of in their defence [w]. Thus the Caraman brothers were reinſtated in the kingdom of Cilicia, and Othoman deprived of one of his richeſt provinces by the vigour, addreſs, and intrepidity of the Venetian admiral. From hence he ſailed to Cyprus, where he found James, the old ally and friend of the republic, on his death-bed. The king, who was married to Catherine Zeno, a Venetian lady of quality, recommended his queen to the protection of Mocenigo and the republic, in oppoſition to his ſiſter Charlotta, who claimed the kingdom, in the moſt pathetic and moving terms; and Charlotta, upon the death of her brother, ſent an ambaſſy to Mocenigo, acquainting him with her claim, and requeſting his aſſiſtance. Mocenigo anſwered the ambaſſadors

d with great reſpect, informed them of the king's will and his own promiſe, as well as the duty of the republic, to protect Catherine. During his ſtay at Cyprus the queen was delivered of a ſon, of whom ſhe was pregnant at the death of the king; and a few days afterwards advice arrived of the death of the doge [x], who, during a ſhort adminiſtration of two years, had diſplayed every quality which could gain the hearts of the people, and the eſteem and reſpect of foreign ſtates: his reign was remarkably ſucceſsful, owing to his own wiſe conduct and judicious choice of admirals.

NICOLAO MARCELLO, Doge LXIX.

THE ſenate elected Nicolao Marcello, a nobleman of great prudence, to the ducal chair, e with no leſs applauſe than they had done his predeceſſor. Marcello purſued the plan laid down by Trono, and was too wiſe to change men and meaſures, which were attended with all imaginable ſucceſs.

Nicolao Marcello, doge LXIX.

AFTER the doge's death Mocenigo departed towards the end of autumn to the Morea, and wintered at Modon, leaving a ſquadron at Cyprus under Cornaro for the defence and ſecurity of the iſland. In the beginning of the ſummer he received advice of commotions and factions excited in Cyprus, which endangered the ſafety of the queen and kingdom. The juncture was too critical to admit of delay; he haſtened thither, but before his arrival, Cornaro, with his nephew Bembo, were murthered in a conſpiracy formed by the biſhops, the queen's phyſician, and other perſons of diſtinction: the queen herſelf was likewiſe cloſely be-

f ſieged in the citadel. Souranza, the proveditor, who was diſpatched with eight gallies, arrived ſome days before the fleet; but finding his force too ſlender to compel the conſpirators, he had recourſe to negociations, which, however, terminated in nothing. Mocenigo at laſt arriving ſtruck ſuch terror into the rebels, that they quitted the ſiege, and many left the iſland; but the diligence of the admiral was ſo great, that he ſeized upon the ringleaders

(E) While Mocenigo lay at Napoli, a young Sicilian, who had been taken by the Turks and carried to Gallipoli, having made his eſcape, came to him and undertook to ſet fire to the Turkiſh fleet and magazines, if he would give his conſent. The admiral commending his courage he departed, and had actually ſet fire to both. The flames were ſoon extinguiſhed, and the Sicilian taken and carried before Othoman, where he behaved with incredible magnanimity. Being put to death, the ſenate ſettled a penſion on his family in reward of his bravery.

of the rebellion and murtherers of Cornaro, all of whom he inſtantly put to death. Soon after he received a commiſſion from the doge and ſenate, appointing him governor of Cyprus [y]. After he had reſtored tranquility in the iſland, thinking it more for the advantage of the republic that he ſhould enter upon action, he departed to relieve Scutari, then beſieged by a powerful Turkiſh fleet and army, leaving Souranza with a ſufficient force, deputy-governor, for the protection of the queen and kingdom (F). a

OTHOMAN, who thought the poſſeſſion of Scutari a neceſſary ſtep towards acquiring the dominion of Italy, to which he aſpired, ſent Soliman with ten thouſand janiſſaries and ſeventy thouſand other troops, with a prodigious train of artillery, and a ſtrong fleet, to inveſt this city. The trenches were opened, a bridge thrown over the river Bojana, and the batteries played furiouſly againſt the walls. At this time Mocenigo [a], ſailing up the Bojana, as far as was navigable, landed the troops, and encamped within five miles of the city, giving notice by rockets of his approach. The Turks endeavouring to block up the fleet brought on an action, in which they were totally defeated, leaving Mocenigo maſter of the river. Cornovich of Sclavonia being ſlow in the operations, and the city hard preſſed, the admiral reſolved to ſuccour it at all events, which he effected with a conduct and reſolution hardly to be paralleled in hiſtory [z]. Seizing on the bridge Soliman had thrown over the river, which was defended by ſtrong batteries and a large body of troops, he forced two thouſand men, with a conſiderable quantity of proviſion and ammunition, into the city, amidſt the enemy's fire, and thro' a quarter of their camp commanded by Ali Beg. This reinforcement enabled Loretano the governor to ſuſtain the general aſſault the next day. Soliman thinking the breach conſiderable enough ordered it to be ſtormed by ten thouſand janiſſaries, ſupported by the reſt of the army. The action was dreadful for near two hours, when at length the Turks were driven from the walls with great ſlaughter: the garriſon ſallying out after them ſlew the confuſed Turks in heaps, leaving about four thouſand dead upon the field, after which they returned into the city laden with rich booty and glory. In a word, Soliman, tired out with the obſtinacy of the beſieged, broke up his camp and retired to Macedonia, after he had ſpent three months and loſt twenty thouſand of his beſt troops before Scutari [b] (G). b c

MOCENIGO on account of his health returned to Venice, as ſoon as he had accompliſhed his buſineſs at Scutari, and Marepietro, who was left with the fleet, retired to a wholeſomer air, the crews being ſickly, owing to the moiſt air of the river, and the unwholſome vapours exhaled from the marſhes. Great rejoicings were made at Venice on advice that Scutari was relieved: preſents were ſent to the governor Loretano, and the whole garriſon was rewarded according to their merit. As to Mocenigo he was received with the moſt extraordinary honours; preſents were heaped upon him, and a few days after his arrival he received the juſt reward of his fidelity, intrepidity, and prudence; for Marcello dying, he was unanimouſly appointed his ſucceſſor [c]. Marcello's reign was ſhort, not exceeding a year and two months: he died much regretted and eſteemed, but his loſs was the leſs obſerved on account of the ſhining qualities and extraordinary virtues of Mocenigo. He was buried with great ſolemnity and pomp before the ſenate proceeded to the election of a new doge, the ſovereign authority remaining in them during this ſhort inter-regnum [d]. d e

MOCENIGO, on his acceſſion to the ducal throne, reſolved to take vigorous meaſures for proſecuting the Turkiſh war: his firſt act of authority was appointing Loretano, who had ſo bravely defended Scutari to be captain of the gallies. In the ſpring Soliman undertook the ſiege of Lepanto, with an army of thirty thouſand men, of which Loretano receiving intelligence ſailed from Pola, where he wintered, to the relief of the city. On his way thither he took and ſunk a large Genoeſe argozoy, laden with Turkiſh merchandize of immenſe value; then ſailing to Lepanto he entered the harbour, and ſupplied the town ſo plentifully, that Soliman's attempts were baffled, after he had ſpent four months in the ſiege, and loſt near five thouſand men [e]. The Turkiſh fleet ſteered for Lemnos, and laying ſiege to Coccina furiouſly battered the walls: the enemy were preparing to ſtorm the town, when Loretano ſeaſonably arrived, and conſtrained the infidels to raiſe the ſiege and abandon the f

There was a modeſty and moderation in his carriage and conduct peculiar to real merit; nor did his virtues appear until they were drawn forth into action, his diffidence and reſerve throwing a cloud over his great abilities: it was ſaid of him that chance only gained him reputation; for had not the occaſions of the ſtate furniſhed an opportunity of diſplaying his capacity and courage, he would have died as low in the eſteem of mankind as now he was deſervedly exalted. His extreme baſhfulneſs gave him an air of timidity and weakneſs, which only his extraordinary actions could prevent men's conſtruing to his prejudice. In ſhort, no man ever more faithfully ſerved

ANDREA VENDRAMINO, Doge LXXI.

THE funeral obſequies of this valuable prince having been duly celebrated, the ſenate met for the election of a ſucceſſor. Their choice fell upon Andrea Vendramino, more remarkable for his age than any qualities of his mind, he being at this time in his eighty-fourth year. He was not long eſtabliſhed in his authority when the Turks laid ſiege to Croia, a city of Albania. The army of the beſiegers conſiſted of ten thouſand horſe and foot, with a numerous train of artillery: they had battered the walls for two months before the garriſon had any proſpect of relief. At laſt Antoniato Doria and Lodovico Teſernato aſſembled a corps of c two thouſand Venetians and other Italians, with which ſmall force they determined to hazard a battle [h]. On approaching the enemy they drew up in a ſquare, the foot being intermixed with the horſe: in this manner they advanced againſt the infidels, who came out of their lines to meet them. The battle began, and courage and addreſs was oppoſed to multitudes: the Turks at laſt began to give way; their ranks once broke, they found it impoſſible to rally, the Venetians preſſed them ſo cloſe. In this manner were they driven to their intrenchments, where they were purſued and entirely defeated with the loſs of one half of their army: their camp was taken, and in it an incredible rich booty, which was wholly divided among the ſoldiers, in reward of their bravery, the commanders generouſly reſigning their ſhare to the private men [i].

d NEXT day the Turks, having joined their detachments, returned and aſſailed the Venetians with great fury: they were, notwithſtanding the ſuddeneſs of the attack, received with bravery, and would have been defeated a ſecond time had the cavalry done their duty; but the horſe being put in diſorder abandoned the field, leaving the foot to ſuſtain the whole force of the enemy. This they did, animated by the example of Contareni the proveditor and other officers, with amazing firmneſs: but their number being greatly diminiſhed, and Contareni killed, they were intirely ſurrounded. Reſolved to make one more effort, they formed themſelves into a wedge, and puſhed through the enemy's ranks, with prodigious ſlaughter on both ſides: by this means a few of thoſe brave men eſcaped, and what is remarkable, carried off their ſhare of the booty. The Turks, though they were maſters
e of the field, did not care to reſume the ſiege, but encamped at ſome diſtance from Croia, waiting for reinforcements [k].

Return to the charge and beat the Venetians.

THE death of Contareni, and ſo many intrepid ſoldiers, was greatly lamented at Venice, nor was the ſafety of Croia eſteemed equivalent to this loſs; but what augmented the conſternation and grief of the ſenate, was intelligence that the Turks, in ſpite of all their precaution, had broke a ſecond time into Italy. A. D. 1476.

WHEN the Turks were retired, after their firſt incurſion into the province of Friuli, the Venetians drew a line and ſtrong works from the bridge at Goricia to the marſhes of Aquileia: this they imagined would be a ſufficient barrier againſt the further attempts of the infidels; but they were no leſs amazed than terrified at hearing that a powerful army was
f encamped on the banks of the river Lizonza. The troops who defended the works behaved with all imaginable courage, and would have foiled the endeavours of the enemy, had they eſcaped a ſnare laid for them by the Turkiſh general. The Venetians being defeated, though with great ſlaughter of the enemy, the Turks were at liberty to proceed, which they did, laying waſte the whole province [l]. Immediately the ſenate diſpatched a fleet and body of forces to oppoſe their progreſs, but the Turks were retired before their arrival. As the

(H) Sabellicus relates an extraordinary inſtance of filial duty and courage in a young lady on this occaſion: her father being wounded in an attack, ſhe took his ſword and target, and fought with an intrepidity that amazed every one, drove the Turks from the walls, and ſaved the city. Hence the hiſtorian concludes, that however the cuſtoms of the iſland may be altered, the diſpoſition of the women is ſtill the ſame, the Lemnian ladies having always been diſtinguiſhed for their courage. GIOVANNI MOCENIGO, Doge LXXII.

Giovanni Mocenigo, doge LXXII.

GIOVANNI MOCENIGO, brother to Pietro, a man ſcarce inferior in merit to that excellent prince, was raiſed to the ducal dignity, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, who equally reſpected him for his own virtue and his brother's memory.

THE Turks, after their retreat from Friuli, reſumed the ſiege of Croia, and at laſt reduced the place after an amazing obſtinate defence. Immediately they again inveſted Scutari, with an army of forty thouſand men, provided with every neceſſary: Othoman himſelf arrived before the trenches were opened, with another army ſtill more numerous. Though b the garriſon did not exceed two thouſand men, yet, relying on the ſtrength of the place and ſpeedy aſſiſtance, they made preparations for a vigorous defence. Othoman's batteries began to play, and ſoon effected a breach, which he ordered to be ſtormed. The aſſault was furious and the defence valiant; Antonio Legiero, the proveditor, who commanded in chief, omitted nothing which became an experienced and good officer. The Turks, we are told, ſhot ſuch quantities of arrows in the different aſſaults, that the garriſon for months uſed no other fuel. The moats round the town were filled with heaps of ſlain, which produced a ſtench intolerable to the beſiegers, and was one cauſe of Mahomet's relinquiſhing the enterprize: he made ſeveral attempts to cleanſe the ditch, but was always attacked with ſo much reſolution as obliged him to retire. At laſt, wearied out with the tediouſneſs of the ſiege, and c perceiving the great diminution of his army, he ordered a retreat to be ſounded, and broke up his camp with precipitation, the invincible garriſon ſallying out on his rear, and deſtroying multitudes of his troops [n]. Hiſtorians tell us that the ſiege laſted eight months, and coſt Othoman no leſs than thirty thouſand men, a number almoſt incredible, if we conſider the ſmall force of the garriſon.

A. D. 1478. DURING the ſiege of Scutari, Othoman detached a body of thirty thouſand men to enter Italy by the forts of Lizonza; but finding theſe ſtrictly guarded, the infidels turned towards Meſan, marching to the foot of the mountains, and propoſing to enter Germany by paths thought impaſſable: they proceeded, horſe and foot, over precipices and mountains almoſt incredible. One circumſtance which Sabellicus relates exceeds any thing performed by d Hannibal, if not probability itſelf: he ſays, that ſome of the rocks were ſo ſteep as rendered it impoſſible for horſes either to mount or deſcend them: here they had recourſe to engines, by means of which the cavalry were drawn up or let down at pleaſure; a method which muſt have protracted their march to a great length, as their horſe amounted to twelve thouſand. Having thus conquered one part of the Alps, they deſcended to the foot of mount Cargna: here they received intelligence that the next mountain was defended by a great number of the natives, through which they muſt either fight their way or return. Determining upon the former, they began climbing the mountains by means of hooks and grapples contrived for the purpoſe, with which the natives were ſo terrified, that they abandoned their poſts, leaving the Turks at liberty to purſue their march. In this manner did they e enter Germany, where they committed horrid devaſtations, and ſuch as were truly worthy of barbarians [o].

Peace with the Turks.

OTHOMAN, having raiſed the ſiege of Scutari, inveſted Liſſa, on the banks of the river Drimon, and took it, and two Venetian gallies which lay in the harbour (K). Here commiſſioners were ſent to treat about peace, which at length was concluded, upon theſe conditions, that Scutari, together with Tenarus, a promontory in Laconia, ſhould be ceded to Othoman, and that the ſenate ſhould annually ſend him a tribute of eight thouſand crowns: he, on the other hand, granting the Venetian merchants particular commercial privileges within his dominions [p]. Scutari was accordingly ſurrendered, and of two thouſand men who compoſed the garriſon when the ſiege began, only four hundred and fifty remained: they f choſe rather to abandon the town and ſeek their fortune in the Morea than live under Othoman, though out of their regard for their courage, he offered them very extraordinary and tempting immunities and rewards.

THE iſland of Zant was like to be the occaſion of renewing the war; the Turkiſh fleet having made a deſcent upon it, when Loretano the Venetian admiral coming up, forced them

(I) It was in this prince's reign that fine paintings were firſt ſeen in Venice. Gentile Bellino finiſhed the beautiful ceilings and pieces in the council-chamber. BEFORE the republic was clear of this dangerous war she found herself involved in another, in defence of the liberties of her ally the republic of Florence. The occasion was a conspiracy formed against the family of Medicis, by which Juliano de Medicis was murthered, and his brother Lorenzo in imminent danger of his life. Salveato, archbishop of Pisa, was the author of this plot; him the Florentines immediately hanged, and imprisoned a nephew of pope Sixtus, who was supposed to be a confederate in the conspiracy. The pope, enraged against the republic for the affront offered his nephew, first interdicted the Florentines, and then raised an army to inflict temporal punishment. Frederic of Urbino, and Alphonso b duke of Calabria, the inveterate enemies of Florence, were appointed generals, with orders to march directly into Tuscany [r]. The Florentines, finding themselves unable to cope with this powerful army, solicited the succour of the Venetians, which at that time they were not capable of affording in a manner suitable to their inclinations and the majesty of the republic: but the Turkish war being ended, next season they sent a powerful body of horse, under the conduct of Carolo Montone to their assistance. Upon his death, which happened a few days after his arrival on the continent, Roberto Malateste was appointed to the command: he crossed the lake Pergia, making furious incursions into the country of the Perusins, and taking several towns of small importance. About the middle of the summer, Malateste meeting with the army under Matthao Campana, governor of Rome and nephew to pope c Sixtus, a bloody battle was fought near mount Sparalla. The victory was warmly disputed for the space of two hours; but the enemy's first line falling back, the whole army was put into confusion, and Malateste left master of the field, their artillery, baggage, and a considerable number of prisoners: after this exploit he wasted the Perusin and Siennois territories, then returning into winter-quarters [s]. The Florentines were soon after defeated by the Neapolitan forces, which produced a peace, and occasioned the republic of Venice to recal Malateste and their army into Lombardy.

War with the pope.

FOR the two following years we find the republic but little concerned in foreign transactions: her care was employed in relieving and alleviating domestic calamities, which befel her at this period. In the year 1480 a plague broke out with the utmost fury, sweeping off d 300 persons in a day, and desolating the city, until the severity of the winter checked its ravages. A dreadful fire, which consumed a great part of the doge's palace, St. Mark's church, and the great hall of the pregadi, with an infinite quantity of rich furniture and moveables, rendered the next year unfortunate. As a small alleviation of these calamities, the island of Coritia, or Veia, in Dalmatia, was annexed to the Venetian dominions: it had been given in the time of Riniero-Zeno to count Schinchinello, surnamed Frangipane, whose posterity possessed the supreme jurisdiction for the space of two hundred years, acknowleging their tenure of the republic by a small tribute: they had afterwards, during the troubles in Dalmatia, been subject to a variety of masters: now, upon some disputes arising between Maerblaisius the prince and his people, he resolved to quit the authority, and surrender the e island into the hands of the Venetians, which he executed, himself retiring to Venice, where he had a pension settled for life. The Hungarians made an attempt to seize on the island, but were frustrated by the arrival of Victor Souranza, who secured it to the republic [u].

SO extensive were the connections of the republic, that the Venetians did not remain long disengaged from foreign wars. A quarrel now arose with Hercules duke of Ferrara, the particular cause of which it will be necessary to recite: Borsia, the father of Hercules, and indeed all the dukes of Ferrara, had for a series of years been closely cemented in interest and friendship with the republic. Hercules seemed to inherit the disposition of his predecessors, until his marriage with Leonora, daughter of king Ferdinand, had wrought a change in his sentiments, and produced a coldness towards the Venetians. The first action declara- f tive of this alteration was the permitting the salt works at Commachia to be opened, contrary to an express treaty with the republic: he next laid a tax upon all Venetian merchandize imported to his dominions, though for time immemorial the commerce of the republic had been exempted from all impositions and duties. At last he proceeded to extremities, built a fort at Cap Dargre, a gross infraction of the compact subsisting with the Venetians; and not contented with this instance of defiance, drove out of the city all the Venetians, ordering the bishop at the same time to excommunicate the subjects of the republic. This extraordinary conduct can only be accounted for by ascribing it to the influence of Leonora and intrigues of Ferdinand [w]. The senate remonstrated with Hercules, sent frequent ambassies to him, and even employed pope Sixtus to mediate the differences between the two states; but every endeavour of theirs was superseded by the cunning of Leonora and pride of Her- cules, who inſolently attributed the patience of the ſenate to puſillanimity. Violent debates upon his conduct aroſe in the ſenate; ſome were for bearing with every inſult rather than be provoked into a war, at a time when they dreaded the power of Othoman, and lived upon ſo precarious terms with the moſt powerful monarch in the univerſe: they likewiſe alledged the hazard of a war with a warlike prince, allied by blood and marriage to two potent princes, who would not fail to embrace his quarrel, as a fair opportunity of wreaking their vengeance on the republic, whoſe proſperity they envied [x]. A majority anſwered, that theſe were the arguments of fear and puſillanimity; that the city had ſupported wars of more conſequence than this, and entered upon them with leſs provocation; that patience under ſuch indignities would only draw upon them contempt and inſults from other petty princes, and make the world imagine that the ſpirit which had raiſed the republic to its grandeur was degenerated. It was then affirmed, that the finances were never in better order, and that the ſhort peace they enjoyed had more than reimburſed the whole expences of the Turkiſh war; that the power of Ferdinand was greatly magnified, and the Hungarian fully engaged in his war with the emperor: but, admitting the power of Ferdinand, it was aſked what aid could he afford to his ſon-in-law? He had his own coaſts to protect from the incurſions of the Venetian fleet; and, as for his land forces, the pope's dominions, Sabinia, Spoleta, La Marca, and all Italy from the mouth of Tiber to Ancona, was a ſufficient barrier againſt his entrance into Lombardy. The pope, the Genoeſe, and the prince of Montferrat, would out of policy join the Venetians [y]. In ſhort, theſe and a number of other arguments were urged, which in the end prevailed and determined the republic to come to a rupture with Hercules. War was accordingly denounced, with the uſual ſolemnities, and the inclinations of the people were viſible in the univerſal joy with which this proof of the ſpirit of the republic was received.

Two fleets were immediately equipped, the one to enter the Po and the enemy's country, the other to keep Ferdinand in awe, and, if he took the field, to ravage the coaſts of Calabria and Apulia: this laſt was committed to Souranza, the conduct of the other to Damiano Moro, both officers of repute and experience. Two land armies were likewiſe raiſed to carry on the war on both ſides the Po: Malateſte commanded in chief, and under him Sanſeverino. Volunteers from all corners of Italy flocked to the Venetian ſtandards, and the levies were completed in an incredible ſhort time. Sanſeverino, who commanded the army north of the Po, reſolved to paſs into the enemy's country, which he effected, and immediately laid ſiege to Miraſole on the Po: his army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men, who aſſaulted the town ſo vigorouſly that the garriſon made but a ſhort defence [z]. Upon his approach the enemy abandoned Tracenta and other places, which encouraged Sanſeverino to march to Caſſelnuovo, which he reduced in three days: here he received intelligence that a numerous army of the enemy lay at Oſtiglia, under the command of Frederic of Urbino, appointed general of the Ferrareſe and Arragonian forces. After ordering the cauſeways and banks between Miraſole and Oſtiglia to be broke down, to prevent the incurſions of the enemy, he beſieged Figarola [a].

While Sanſeverino was engaged before this town, the fleet under Moro took Hadria by ſcalade, and ſubdued in conſequence Commachio and all the adjacent country. Moro had in his voyage up the Po taken three forts, built to obſtruct his paſſage: here likewiſe he defeated a body of forces, under the conduct of Sigiſmund D'Eſte, brother to Hercules, and

A. D. 1482. Giovanni Bentivoglio of Bologna. Afterwards he joined the army at Figarola, and the place was inveſted by land and water, but powerfully ſupported by Frederic, encamped on the oppoſite ſide, who found means not only to annoy the Venetians with his artillery, but to ſupply the town plentifully with every neceſſary. We are told, that at this ſiege Frederic continued an inceſſant fire day and night from his artillery; upon which Sanſeverino ſent a trumpet, acquainting him, that if he did not deſiſt from ſo unuſual a method of making war, he would turn his cannon upon his camp [b]. It was then agreed that Frederic ſhould only ſerve his cannon while the Venetian batteries played upon the town. At laſt, after a great number of ſkirmiſhes between both camps, and a variety of aſſaults, the town was taken by ſtorm, after having ſuſtained a ſiege of ſix weeks: few priſoners were made, moſt of the garriſon being killed in the action, or drowned endeavouring to eſcape [c]. As Sanſeverino was repairing the walls, both he and Loretano the proveditor falling ſick, they were carried to Padua, where the latter expired: Moro too was forced to return for his health to Venice, and died. Indeed a prodigious mortality raged over the whole fleet and army, no leſs than fifteen thouſand men having periſhed of fluxes and fevers during the campaign.

In the mean time the pope was beſieged in Rome by Alphonſo duke of Calabria. Reſolving to ſuccour his brother-in-law Hercules, he was under the neceſſity of marching through a the pope's dominions: in this reſolution he was ſtrongly ſupported by the powerful families of the Coloneſſi and Savelli, who had long been the implacable enemies of the holy ſee. Two cardinals of theſe families were impriſoned by the pope's order: a circumſtance that redoubled the diligence of their friends to aſſiſt Alphonſo [d]. The pope, thus blocked up, wrote to the ſenate for ſuccours: in conſequence of which Malateſte was ordered to march to Rome; Souranza to lay waſte the coaſts of Calabria and Apulia, and the Venetian ambaſſador at Rome empowered to levy forces at the expence of the republic. Malateſte haſtened by long marches to the capital, where, after an obſtinate battle, he defeated Alphonſo, and raiſed the ſiege. Here he died in a few days, owing to the fatigue he underwent during the engagement [e]. Beſiegers defeated by Malateſte.

b WHILE the Venetians were gaining laurels in the pope's dominions, their officers were not idle on the Po: a detachment from Sanſeverino's army, under his ſon Fracaſſo, in conjunction with Victor Souranzo, obtained a complete victory over Sigiſmund D'Æſte, making ſeventy officers of diſtinction priſoners, with a prodigious number of ſoldiers. Sanſeverino himſelf, as ſoon as he recovered his health, returned to the army, and marching from Figarola, laid a bridge over the Po, and proceeded directly to Ferrara: encamping within a mile of the city, he repaired a fort the enemy had abandoned, drew lines of circumvallation, and the natural ſituation being ſtrong, fortified them with ſo much art as not only ſecured his own camp from ſallies, but greatly diſtreſſed Ferrara [f]. In this manner was Hercules
c incloſed within the walls of his capital, when Sixtus, unmindful of his late obligations to the republic, by an unaccountable policy, fell off from the Venetians, and joined the enemy. Franciſco Diedo, the Venetian reſident at Rome, ſoon perceived this alteration in his holineſs, A. D. 1483. and acquainted the ſenate with his ſuſpicions. Every means was employed to preſerve the friendſhip of Sixtus, but to no effect, his holineſs not only joining the enemy but commanding the republic to lay down her arms and reſtore to Hercules all her conqueſts. Unwilling to loſe the fruits of a war undertaken with juſtice, deſirous of keeping upon terms with his holineſs, and likewiſe of ſhewing the world the motives of their conduct, the ſenate employed Bernardo Juſtiniano, the greateſt orator of his age, to draw up a memorial to be preſented d at all the foreign courts. In ſubſtance this memorial contained an aſſurance that they had declared war not only with the pope's conſent but at his inſtigation, and after numberleſs injuries and affronts; that now they not only preferred peace to war but even to victory, could it be obtained on terms not injurious to the honour of the republic; that though the Venetians were willing to treat his holineſs with reſpect, yet they feared his conduct on this occaſion would be conſtrued into a cunning and ſubtle policy, unbecoming the ſimplicity and openneſs of the head of Chriſt's church; that while the Venetians, for twenty years, withſtood the weight of the Turkiſh power, not one Italian prince thought themſelves obliged to engage in a quarrel which affected their religion: now that property became the object in diſpute they were ready to unite in oppreſſing that ſtate which had been the bulwark of the lie berties of Italy. The ſenate requeſted of his holineſs diſpaſſionately to weigh their circumſtances, to follow the dictates of his own underſtanding, and not be miſled by the artifices of certain perſons, whoſe intereſt was the rule of their conduct. As to themſelves, they were determined to proſecute a war begun at his ſolicitation, and after repeated injuries; the event they committed to Providence. Conduct of pope Sixtus.

SIXTUS, inſtead of admitting or even deigning to anſwer their arguments, immediately excommunicated the ſenate, and entered into a cloſe alliance with Ferdinand and the other enemies of the republic. A congreſs was held at Caſſel-Maggiore, and a ſtrong confederacy formed againſt the Venetians by all the powers in Italy, the Genoeſe excepted: the duke of Auſtria likewiſe favoured this alliance by denying a paſſage through his dominions to ſome
f French and Savoyards, who enliſted with Renatus of Lorraine, at that time in the pay of Venice [g]. Renatus ſtrengthened the Venetian army with one thouſand foot and four hundred horſe, and every other meaſure was purſued to oppoſe the formidable league: one part of the Venetian army marched into Lombardy, the other remaining before Ferrara, from whence two of Sanſeverino's ſons went over to the enemy. The afflicted father ſent apologies to the ſenate, requeſting that they would accept of the redoubled diligence of the parent, and fidelity of his two remaining children, in attonement of the treachery of his ſons, whom he ſhould ever diſclaim. Perfectly ſatisfied of the innocence of Sanſeverino, the ſenate ſent meſſengers to comfort and aſſure him of their continued eſteem and affection [h]. League formed againſt Venice.

ALPHONSO, in the mean time, throwing a bridge over the river beyond Caſſan, entered g Ghiradadda and paſſed to the Bargamaſco, where he took ſeveral towns, after which he reduced all the Breſcian country. Sanſeverino's army was greatly inferior; ſo that he neither could come to a battle, nor cover all the towns of conſequence to the republic [i]. Barbaro, Liſſa taken by the enemy's fleet.

DURING theſe tranſactions forty of the enemy's gallies, under Frederic of Arragon, ſon to Ferdinand, took Liſſa on the coaſt of Dalmatia; then ſailing to Corfu made ſeveral fierce attacks on the iſland, but were always repelled by the bravery of Georgio Viari and the garriſon. At laſt, having loſt about one thouſand men to no purpoſe, Frederic retired; but neither by ſea nor land did a general action happen during the campaign, which was ſpent in marches, counter-marches, and ſieges, without any conſiderable progreſs. The loſs of Gazolo, indeed, gave the republic uneaſineſs, as it was a place of importance; ſhe confided in the fidelity of the inhabitants, and was betrayed [k]. b

ALPHONSO, preſſed by repeated letters to come to the relief of Ferrara, quitted the Breſcian by long marches, but was outſtripped by the vigilance of Sanſeverino, who arrived at Caſſelnuovo before the enemy imagined he had moved; here he put his army into quarters and went to Venice, where he was received with great honours; but before his departure he recovered all the towns the enemy had taken that campaign between the Po and the Breſcian. The ſenate likewiſe beſtowed very conſiderable favours on the Roſſi of Parma, who had bravely maintained their ground againſt Lodovico Sforza. As they were then baniſhed their country, a penſion of thirty-two thouſand crowns was ſettled on the two brothers Guido and Giacomo [l].

ON this occaſion the ſenate, by the advice of Sanſeverino, ſent ambaſſadors to the emperor, c the French king, and the German princes, to requeſt that a general council might be called, in order that the unjuſt conduct and perfidy of Sixtus might be examined. By their mediation peace was eſtabliſhed about the middle of the following ſummer, previous to which Marcello, the Venetian admiral, took Gallipoli, in which enterprize he loſt his life, a ball having entered his breaſt and pierced the vital organs. Before this accident he performed every duty of a commander and ſoldier, animating the troops in the ſcalade, calling them by their names: he was praiſing the valiant, and upbraiding the backward, when he dropt; his ſecretary threw a cloak over his body, and gave out that Marcello was ſlightly hurt and gone to be dreſſed, and that he had authoriſed him to aſſure the ſoldiers the plunder of the city ſhould be the reward of their bravery. Peace between the Venetians and Italian princes.

OTHER actions of leſs conſequence happened by land before preliminaries of peace were adjuſted: at laſt the following articles were accepted by all parties; viz. that the Venetians and Hercules ſhould each reſtore their conqueſts, and be reinſtated in the ſame poſſeſſions they held at the commencement of the rupture [n]; that the Venetians ſhould withdraw all their garriſons ſouth of the Po, and raze the forts built on the banks of the river; and that Sanſeverino ſhould remain in the pay of the republic, and at the ſame time be acknowleged the commander in chief of the forces of all the Italian ſtates. This agreement being ratified, the different armies were recalled, and the appearance of tranquility reſtored to Italy. One e may judge of the importance of this ſhort war from the charges to which it put the Venetians in little more than two years: the ſum of three million ſix hundred thouſand ducats in gold, an immenſe ſum at that early period [o], was diſburſed by the treaſury. Great rejoicings were made not only in the city but over all the dominions of the republic: tournaments and games of various kinds were held at Venice, to which the young princes flocked from all parts of Italy. Upon the whole, this war, which might be deemed a kind of civil war, on account of the long friendſhip ſubſiſting between the ſtate of Venice and Ferrara, ended more happily than could have been expected.

PEACE being reſtored, the doge applied his attention to civil affairs, and repairing the palace, greatly damaged by a fire that happened the beginning of this year. A plague likewiſe committed great ravages in the city [p]; but all the loſſes of the republic were ſoon made up by a ſhort interval of peace, the whole commerce of the world being in a manner engroſſed by this induſtrious people. Every port of Europe, Aſia, and Africa, was filled with their ſhips, laden with the richeſt merchandize, and the Venetians were without diſpute the richeſt and moſt potent maritime ſtate in the univerſe. Even during their fierceſt wars commerce flouriſhed; nothing could make them neglect what they well knew to be the pillar and ſupport of their government and conſideration in Europe [q]. Yet, amidſt profound tranquility the Venetian trade met with a rough check and very conſiderable loſs: four gallies returning from the Eaſt, laden with ſpices, ſilks, and diamonds, young Columbus, ſon of the famous Genoeſe mariner, attacked them with ſeven men of war off Cape-Vincent. a bloody battle was maintained, notwithſtanding the diſparity of forces: but the Venetians were forced in the end to yield to the enemy's ſuperiority, who carried them into Lisbon. We are not told whether the encounter happened in conſequence of any commercial quarrel, or whether it was an act of piracy in Columbus[r]: nor do we find that the republic ever reſented it, or even demanded reparation of the wrong; the bare fact is all that Sabellicus relates. Battle with young Columbus.

TOWARDS the end of this year died Giovanni Mocenigo, a prince endued with every quality to make his people happy: his virtues were ſimilar to thoſe of his brother[s]; his capacity little inferior, and his reputation equal. A. D. 1485.

b MARCO BARBARIGO, Doge LXXIII.

MARCO BARBARIGO was choſen by the ſenate to ſucceed Giovanni: he was equally loved while a private citizen, and reſpected during the ſhort period of his adminiſtration. The republic enjoying a happy repoſe, he employed his whole time in enforcing the laws, relieving the poor, encouraging virtue and merit, and ſuppreſſing vice and indolence. Amidſt theſe acts of piety and good government he was ſeized with a fever, which cut him off in a few days, and left the republic to lament the loſs of thoſe bleſſings they had but juſt taſted. One act of his adminiſtration, in favour of the poor, deſerves to be particularly mentioned: he got a decree paſſed that all thoſe, of whatever quality, who demanded the redreſs of grievances, ſhould caſt lots whoſe ſuits ſhould be firſt preſented. By this means c he prevented bribery, corruption, and influence, and put the poor, in points of juſtice, upon a level with the richeſt[t]. Marco Barbarigo, doge LXXIII.

AGOSTINO BARBARIGO, Doge LXXIV

THE ſenate having met for the election of a ſucceſſor, Agoſtino Barbarigo, brother to the deceaſed, was choſen in his room; a promotion extremely acceptable to the people, as Agoſtino was the perfect archetype of his brother. He was at this time procurator of St. Mark's, an office which he diſcharged with a fidelity and integrity auſpicious of his good conduct in a higher capacity. His firſt act was to ſend an ambaſſy to the Grand Seignior, to thank him for preſents made to the republic a little before the death of his brother, and d likewiſe to procure ſome priviſeges for the merchants of the ſtate trading to the Turkiſh dominions[u]. A. D. 1486. Agoſtino Barbarigo, dego LXXIV.

WHILE he was thus engaged a quarrel aroſe between Sigiſmund, brother to the emperor Frederic, and the republic. Sigiſmund was lord of the country of the Griſons on the Alps, and had for a number of years lived upon terms of ſtrict friendſhip with the Venetians: their merchants traded into the cities of each without impoſt or duty, and particularly met at an annual fair kept in Bolzano, a town of the Griſons, to which numbers of the Venetian inland traders reſorted. Here they were this year, all of a ſudden, contrary to their eſtabliſhed correſpondence and the laws of nations, ſeized, impriſoned, and their goods confiſcated, without any other reaſon aſſigned than that the ſubjects of Sigiſmund on the lake La Garda e were ſome years before driven from thence by the Venetians. Immediately after the impriſonment of the Venetian merchants, Sigiſmund levied troops with all expedition, to the amount of ten thouſand men, entered the Veroneſe, and over-ran the country along the Adice: the enemy were commanded by Gaudentio Amaſio, who laid ſiege to Rovero, and took it after ſome reſiſtance. We are told he laid the fort in aſhes by means of bombs, at that time not much known in Italy[w]. A. D. 1487. War with the Griſons.

THE ſenate, to oppoſe this army, ordered the ſoldiers quartered in the Treviſan, Lombardy, and Friuli, to aſſemble, and requeſted of old Sanſeverino to take charge of the army. Before he could get together a force ſufficient to oppoſe the enemy, the Griſons had made incurſions into the territories of Vincenza, Feltre, and Friuli: they were at laſt repulſed, f and their detachments defeated by Jeronimo Savorgnano, who had raiſed a body of peaſants for the defence of the country. Sanſeverino no ſooner joined the army than he entered upon action; but a detachment, which he commanded in perſon, falling into an ambuſcade, was defeated, and himſelf ſaved by the bravery of his ſon from being taken priſoner[x]. Upon this he reſolved to march into the enemy's country, and lay ſiege to Trente, which he doubted not would put an effectual ſtop to the enemy's incurſions into the Venetian territories, by recalling them to the defence of their own country. The ſcheme, however, though plauſible, was warmly oppoſed by old Lucca Piſani the proveditor: but as a majority conſented, the reſolution was taken, and the army ordered to proceed to the country of the Griſons. On his march he was attacked and his army ſurpriſed by a thouſand regulars and a large g corps of boors, aſſembled by George count Pietro. The ſoldiers not expecting to ſee the face

ing to rally them. Thus died the brave old Sanſeverino, one of the beſt and moſt faithful Sanſeverino's death, and the army fly in a panic. officers the republic ever employed. In this inſtance his good fortune ſeemed to forſake him, though not his courage, for he fell with his ſword in his hand, fighting with the vigour and ſpirit of youth, at the age of ninety [y]. His death produced a total rout: the panic became general; nor could all the ſkill and diligence of the proveditors bring the ſoldiers back to their colours, or withſtand the charge of a militia not ſufficient to encounter one-fourth of their army. Andrea de Bargo, colonel of infantry, imagined that cutting the bridge and ſtopping their progreſs would, from neceſſity, recal their courage and preſence of mind: this he performed to the almoſt utter deſtruction of the army, though well and prudently intended; for ſo great was the conſternation of the troops that they plunged into b
the water, and loſt their lives endeavouring to eſcape with ſwimming [z]. Guido de Roſſis alone, with his troop of horſe, withſtood the enemy: he made his way through the thickeſt of the enemy's ranks with about fifty men, and ravaging their country returned home loaded with plunder [a]. As for Bargo, he was recalled and impriſoned; but Guido and other officers appearing in his defence, and aſſerting his bravery and diligence, he was not only reinſtated, Peace with Sigiſmund. but promoted. Orders for new levies were now iſſued by the ſenate; but before they were complete, a peace was offered by Sigiſmund, tired with the expences of the war, and accepted by the republic, on condition, that the merchants ſeized at Bolzano ſhould be ſet at liberty and indemnified, and that mutual reſtitution ſhould be made of places taken during the war [b]. c

Soon after this ſeveral ſumptuary laws took place in Venice, and the expences of private families in their table, cloaths, diverſions, gaming, travelling, &c. were rated by a decree of the ſenate, in proportion to the ability of the individual. The regulation concerning dice was, that no family of the higheſt diſtinction and fortune ſhould preſume to ſtake above a fifth of an ounce of gold in one night [c].

This year likewiſe it was that the ſenate reſolved in a manner to annex Cyprus to the dominions of the republic, by ſending Cornaro to aſſiſt the queen his ſiſter in her affairs. To this two circumſtances contributed, which in fact determined the ſenate in their intention. The firſt was a Turkiſh fleet that ſailed up the Mediterranean, which created ſuſpicion that Bajazet formed deſigns upon the iſland: the other aroſe from ſecret intelligence that Ferdi- d nand was taking meaſures to annex this kingdom to his own dominions, by a marriage between the queen and his ſon. The ſenate had been left protectors of the queen by James Luſignan her huſband. Under their countenance ſhe had governed peaceably for the ſpace Cyprus annexed to the ſtate. of fifteen years, the firſt commotions quelled by Mocenigo excepted. As her only ſon was dead the republic looked upon herſelf as the natural ſucceſſor of a queen who was daughter to one of her ſenators: thus, it was the buſineſs of the ſenate to exclude both Bajazet and Ferdinand, for which purpoſe Franciſco Priuli was ſent with a fleet to the defence of the iſland. Cornaro went before, and, exceeding his commiſſion, prevailed on the queen by his eloquence to relinquiſh the government to the ſenate, and return to her native country Ve- e nice, where ſhe ſhould always live with the dignity and affluence of a ſovereign [d]. The queen unwillingly aſſented to his arguments, and every thing was fixed for their departure: he diſpatched intelligence of his ſucceſs to the ſenate, who, delighted with his conduct, ſent rich preſents to the queen, and whatever could ſweeten the reſignation ſhe had made of pomp and grandeur. Before ſhe left Cyprus, the Venetian ſtandard was erected in the market-place of Nicoſia, the capital, by her orders; and thus the iſland became a Venetian province. At laſt ſhe arrived in Venice with a large retinue, and was met by the ſenate and chief ladies of the republic, who conducted her to the palace, where ſhe was entertained with the ſtate and magnificence her quality demanded. Soon after a houſhold was appointed her, and the caſtle of Azolo in the Treviſan aſſigned for her reſidence, with a revenue of fifty pounds in gold for her yearly expence, and a preſent of ten pounds for her immediate f uſe [e].

A. D. 1490. This year ambaſſadors from Africa, from the prince of Tremizan, came to Venice to deſire the ſenate would appoint a magiſtrate to diſtribute juſtice among the Venetians dwelling in three of his cities, leſt he ſhould be led into differences with the republic from ſuch inadvertencies or omiſſions as might ariſe from his ignorance of their laws. A magiſtrate, equivalent to our conſuls abroad, was appointed, and his revenue fixed at an hundredth part of all the merchandize ſold in that country.

About the ſame time the uſe of firelocks was introduced in Venice; and, for inſtructing the youth in the exerciſe, the council of ten paſſed a decree that two in each village ſhould be taught the manual exerciſe and evolutions; that theſe young men ſhould all meet on certain g a days to give proofs of their progreſs, by firing at a mark; and that the public taxes for that year ſhould be remitted to the village of the beſt markſman, and a ſum of money given him beſides [f]. Little occurs deſerving notice for the ſpace of four or five years, except that the republic was daily growing in wealth, grandeur, and power. The diſcoveries of the Portugueſe in 1494, round the cape of Good Hope to the Eaſt-Indies, opened the way for the gradual decline of their commerce, but it did not become apparent for a number of years: at preſent the ſea was covered, and all the harbours in the world crowded with the Venetian merchantmen [g].

While the republic was reaping the benefits of her long tranquility, an ambaſſy from Charles VIII. of France came to Venice: the purport was to ſound the inclinations of the re-
b public, and demand the continuance of the league ſubſiſting between the ſtates, as he propoſed marching into Italy to reduce Naples. The doge and ſenate aſſembled the great council to deliberate upon an affair of ſo much conſequence: they foreſaw that Italy muſt be wholly embroiled, and were willing to act with caution in a buſineſs ſo delicate. At laſt, after various debates, a kind of equivocal anſwer was returned to the ambaſſador, with which and civilities he was diſmiſſed. Two other ambaſſies ſucceeded this, and all were diſmiſſed with the ſame anſwer, and ſtrong aſſurances of the deſire the republic had to live upon terms of amity with the king [h].

We need not enter upon the origin of this war; it has been explained already in our hiſtory of France. Sufficient it is, that the report of Charles's intention made Ferdinand uſe
c every poſſible meaſure for his own defence: he levied troops, equipped a fleet, and did all in his power to draw pope Alexander into his alliance. Ferdinand was ſo expeditious in his preparations, that Lodovico Sforza, who excited Charles to this attempt, fearing he might be oppreſſed before the king could enter Italy, ſent an envoy to Venice, requeſting that the ſenate would march a body of troops to the river Oglio; but this miniſter was diſmiſſed with mere profeſſions [i]. Mean time Ferdinand died, and was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Alphonſo: he immediately upon his acceſſion diſpatched an ambaſſy to the republic, to ſolicit their influence with Lodovico to deſiſt from joining the French, and promiſing in return to leave him the undiſturbed poſſeſſion of Milan. The ſenate undertook to mediate, but could obtain no direct anſwer from Lodovico.

d Many attempts were made by both parties to engage the Venetians in the quarrel, but they were deaf to all arguments and promiſes. Charles, by his ambaſſador Philip Commines, offered them a great ſhare of the conqueſts he ſhould make in Naples, if they would join him; but the ſenate replied, they had no right to a foot of ground in Naples, and it was their determination to adhere to the juſt maxim of their anceſtors, never to carry on war for conqueſts, but to repel injuries, protect their liberties, and maintain their alliances [k]. It would be digreſſing from our purpoſe to purſue Charles in his conqueſt of Naples: it is enough that the republic preſerved a ſtrict neutrality until the great power of France rendered it neceſſary to throw their weight in the oppoſite ſcale. Some haughty expreſſions the king dropt before the ambaſſadors of the republic, made them conclude it was full time
e to check his progreſs before he ſhould be in a condition to over-run Italy. The purpoſes of the ſenate were greatly forwarded by the arrival of a Spaniſh armament, under Lorenzo Suarez, at Leghorn, for the defence of Sicily: this fleet conſiſted of ſixty ſhips of war, having on board ſix thouſand foot and five hundred horſe. Suarez went himſelf to the Ve- netian ſenate and told them, "That the king his maſter, ſenſible of the ambition and power "of the French king, had ſent him with a fleet for the defence of Sicily: he was well aſſur-
"ed that Charles would not ſtop with the reduction of Naples, if effectual meaſures were "not taken to clip his wings and bound his ambition; his maſter, he added, authoriſed
"him to enter into an alliance with the republic, with whoſe wiſdom he was too well ac"quainted to imagine ſhe could be blind to the neceſſity of oppoſing a prince who meaſured
f "right only by power". The ſenate lent a willing ear to Suarez [l], ſuch an alliance they ſaw was neceſſary for the ſecurity of Italy; they likewiſe knew that the pope was equally deſirous with them, and that the emperor and duke of Milan might eaſily be induced to engage in the league againſt the French monarch. At laſt, in the month of April 1495, a treaty was concluded between the emperor, the king of Spain, the pope, Venetians, and the duke of Milan, and with ſo much ſecrecy, that Philip Commines, who reſided the whole time in Venice, had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of the negociation [m]. Treaty with the emperor, Spain, the pope, &c.

We cannot, without repeating facts already related, enter upon all the particulars of this war, ſo well deſcribed by Philip Commines, and the judicious and penetrating Guicciardini:

We ſhall, however, endeavour to ſeparate the ſhare the republic bore in it from thoſe tranſ- a actions which properly belong to the hiſtory of other ſtates (A).

It was ſtipulated among the confederates that an army of twenty thouſand foot and thirty-four thouſand horſe ſhould be raiſed, the different quotas as follows: the emperor Maximilian was to furniſh ſix thouſand horſe and a proportion of foot; the pope four thouſand horſe and a body of infantry: the Venetians, Spain, and Lodovico of Milan, eight thouſand horſe each, with their different proportions of foot [n]. It was farther agreed, that if any of the contracting powers, by reaſon of their diſtance, found it inconvenient to ſend the forces ſtipulated, that in this caſe ſix hundred pounds of gold for eight thouſand, and the ſame proportion for a leſſer number, ſhould be paid to any of the other ſtates who would undertake to raiſe the troops [o]. Charles had determined upon returning to France before he had b intelligence of the league; but this haſtened his meaſures: he accordingly ſet out for Rome in a few days after, and from thence ſent an envoy to Venice to demand whether the ſenate were his friends or enemies. To this no other anſwer was given, than that wiſe men were directed by contingencies; and that it was in his majeſty's power to make the Venetians either the one or the other [p].

CHARLES was highly incenſed at the pope's departure from Rome, and his equivocal conduct; nevertheleſs, he paſſed through the territories of the church in a friendly manner, excepting at Tuſcanella, where the inhabitants were put to the ſword for refuſing quarters to his army: he likewiſe ſeized on Oſtiglia, and thereby gave great offence to the Venetians, and quickened their preparations. Antonio Grimani with the fleet had orders to ſail directly c for Puglia, and preparations were made in Lombardy to obſtruct the king's return and protect Milan. Galias of St. Saverini was detached by Lodovico with ſeven hundred men at arms and three thouſand foot, to ſeize upon Aſti in Piedmont, where the duke of Orleans with a ſmall corps lay: but before his arrival the duke received powerful ſuccours from France, acted offenſively, and took ſeveral towns [q].

In the mean time the vanguard of the king's army was got to Pontremo; and the Venetian and Milaneſe troops, to the amount of eight thouſand infantry and two thouſand light horſe, were aſſembled in the duchy of Parma, under young Gonzaga of Mantua, a prince of conduct and valour ſuperior to his years. Here the king ſent a trumpet to the confederates, deſiring a free paſſage, and aſſuring them of the ſtricteſt regularity and diſcipline among his d troops: but no reply was made to the meſſage. The Taro, a rapid ſtream, fortified on the one ſide by the confederates with a number of batteries, ſeparated the two armies, when Charles, unwilling to engage before he had tried the effects of a conference, ſent a trumpet deſiring a meeting with the Venetian proveditors. The conference was agreed to, but Charles altering his purpoſe, did not chuſe to wait the iſſue [r]: he ordered his van to paſs the river, in ſpite of the enemy's fire from the oppoſite batteries. John Trivulcio, with an hundred lances, three thouſand Swiſs infantry, and three hundred archers and croſs-bows on horſeback, formed the van: Charles in perſon commanded the main army, which followed, and the earl of Foix led up the rear. Before Trivulcio had croſſed the river and advanced to the right of the confederates, Gonzaga, at the head of five thouſand infantry and ſix hundred e

(A) The two excellent hiſtorians above-mentioned ſpeak harſhly of this league; though, to ſay the truth, we can ſee nothing more reaſonable than a confederacy of this nature. If the Venetians uſed falſe pretexts, it was only to deceive Commines, and prevent his giving intelligence which might ruin their meaſures. Guicciardini, who was a Florentine, ſeems glad of every occaſion of attacking the Venetians; and in this reſpect betrays a prejudice and partiality which it is almoſt impoſſible for a writer of thoſe times to avoid. Commines, with all that air of ſimplicity and candor, is tinctured with a vanity that diſgraces his hiſtory. Even the learned Baronius himſelf cannot keep clear of national reflections and prejudices. Every act of Charles is ſet in the beſt light; his very faults are ſo repreſented as to appear virtues, or, at leaſt, the ſhadow of virtues: while the Venetians, in particular, are taxed as a ſelfiſh, proud, and vain people, jealous of another's proſperity, and ſticking at nothing to compaſs their own ambitious purpoſes: a picture very different from what the hiſtorians of this republic draw, and indeed very remote from the truth. We have ſeen that the republic kept herſelf diſengaged from this quarrel as long as the meaſures of prudence and ſound policy would admit. We have ſeen her refuſe the offers of Charles, advantageous in themſelves, had the ſenate regarded nothing beſides the aggrandizement of the ſtate. Charles's propoſal to ſhare Naples with them, was rejected with a moderation and juſtice that leaves no room for the charge of ambition and envy, with which thoſe writers would ſtigmatize her conduct. Charles's behaviour to the Venetian ambaſſadors, after the reduction of Alphonſo's kingdom, the abdication of this prince, and expulſion of his ſon, afforded the ſenate great room to ſuſpect the ambition of the French king would not end with the conqueſt of Naples. The arrival of the Spaniſh fleet at Leghorn, and the pope's conduct, plainly evince, that the republic was not particular in this notion; and, indeed, if we do not eſteem the ballance of power in Italy, a maxim of politics merely ideal, it was full time for her to exert herſelf in oppoſing the conqueſts of a prince born for great enterprizes, impelled to them by his miniſters, and ſupported in them by a numerous and brave army. This much we thought neceſſary to advance in behalf of a ſtate, in our opinion, acting on principles prudent, moderate, and juſt, to obviate the reader's prejudices from the ſuggeſtions of writers tinctured with national jealouſies; and whoſe ſeeming candor, elegant ſtile, and deep reflection, give them weight and credit, which, in this particular, they do not deſerve.

men at arms, paſſed by a ford higher up, in order to attack the king's rear, ordering certain corps under the proveditors to charge him in flank [s]: this obliged the French to face about, when immediately a ſharp action began. Gonzaga preſſed on with great reſolution, and was as bravely received and repulſed in ſeveral charges; but ſtill renewing his attacks the enemy were put into ſome confuſion, and the king's perſon greatly endangered. Charles, however, was ſaved by the intrepidity and gallant conduct of his troops, who flocked round for his defence; ſo that here the battle was pretty equal. On the other ſide the marquis de Giës put the confederates in diſorder, and would have totally defeated them, had not Gonzaga in time repaſſed the Taro and come to their relief, which ſtopt the purſuit [t]. Here the battle ceaſed, victory declaring for neither ſide, though the king's intention of croſſing the b Taro was fruſtrated. The next morning he propoſed attacking the confederates in their camp, but was prevented by the violent rains which ſwelled the river in the night, and likewiſe by the advice of his officers, who thought it more adviſeable to march round, notwithſtanding the inconveniences of the roads. This reſolution was accordingly executed, his majeſty decamping with great ſilence without beat of drum [u]. In the action the loſs of the confederates amounted to three thouſand infantry, and near three hundred men at arms; a circumſtance which gave the French room to claim the victory, as their loſs did not exceed two hundred men at arms. On the other hand, the Venetians formed the ſame pretenſions, and challenged the glory of the day, becauſe, beſides the king's being diſappointed in his deſign of croſſing the Taro, they had not only ſaved their own camp and baggage, but
c taken a conſiderable booty from the enemy, ſome rich apparel of the king's, and part of his artillery. Baronius taxes the republic with vanity on this occaſion [w], though we think very unjuſtly, as they undoubtedly had an equal claim with Charles to the victory, which is not to be always eſtimated by the number of ſlain, but a variety of other circumſtances and conſequences.

A battle.

Both ſides lay claim to a victory.

THE confederates ſent a detachment of three thouſand men, under Sanſeverino, to moleſt the enemy's rear, but being forced to take a long circuit, as the river was not fordable from the late rains, he came up too late. Suſpicions concerning his fidelity aroſe, and ſome hiſtorians affirm, that inſtead of annoying he actually conducted Charles to Aſti through the difficult paſſes and roads he had to encounter. It afterwards appeared that he acted in cond ſequence of ſecret orders from Lodovico, who began to wave in his alliance, and carry on a clandeſtine correſpondence with the king [x]. Gonzaga, however, as ſoon as the river was fordable, marched in purſuit of the enemy with his whole army: as he found he could not come up with them he returned from the Tortoneſe, and joined Lodovico Sforza before Novara. The ſenate ſent two proveditors to aſſiſt at the ſiege of Novara, and a ſtrong reinforcement; ſo that the army amounted to three thouſand men at arms, three thouſand horſe, and fifteen thouſand foot [y].

DURING this ſiege the Venetian fleet at Genoa was ſucceſsful: it not only took Rappalla, putting the French garriſon to the ſword, but defeated the king's fleet, which he had ſent thither on his departure from Naples. This, and his inability to relieve Novara, obliged e Charles to make overtures of peace; for which purpoſe commiſſioners met, and after a number of difficulties and obſtructions, ſigned a treaty between Charles and Lodovico. The Venetians complained loudly of Sforza's conduct in ſtriking up a ſeparate peace, after they had refuſed hearkening to any propoſals without the conſent of their allies: they called him treacherous, perfidious, undeſerving of allies, and unworthy to be truſted. Lodovico, ſtung with reproaches which were but too juſtly levelled, gave ſecret orders to the garriſons in thoſe places through which the army of the republic muſt paſs, to block up the way, and prevent their return. Intelligence of this coming to Contareni, he offered the council of ten to aſſaſſinate Lodovico in open council; but the republic rejected this propoſal, as reflecting upon the honour of the ſtate, and gave inſtructions that he ſhould tempo-
f rize with him until he got out of his dominions: this accordingly was done ſo artfully, that the army arrived unmoleſted at Mantua, and then proceeded to Venice [z].

Peace between Charles and Sforza.

CHARLES had not left Naples long before Ferdinand returned to Calabria, and ſeized the city of Reggio. Grimani, the Venetian admiral, conquered Puglia and ſome towns in the Hither Calabria, which ſucceſs ſoon produced a general revolt in favour of Ferdinand. The ſenate, apprized of theſe tranſactions, ſent orders to Grimani to wait inactive at Monopoli until farther orders; but the pope's influence prevailed upon them a little after to ſend the admiral to Naples to aſſiſt Ferdinand [a]. As Grimani was taken ill about the time he received theſe inſtructions, he contented himſelf with diſpatching twenty gallies to aſſiſt at the ſiege of Tarentum; and upon his recovery ſailed with the reſt of the fleet to Corfu, it being ſuſg pected that the Turkiſh armaments were intended againſt that iſland [b].

ABOUT

ABOUT the ſame time the Piſans ſent ambaſſadors to Venice, to beſeech the protection of a the republic againſt the Florentines, who were preparing to reduce them. The ſenators were divided in ſentiment concerning this propoſal, ſome not chuſing to come to an open rupture with Florence; while others, moved either with compaſſion or actuated by ambition, were for granting the requeſt. Piſa indeed ſtood extremely convenient for extending the dominions of the ſtate, gaining a ſure footing in Tuſcany, and ſtretching the boundaries of the republic as far as the Mediterranean ſea, the gulph of Genoa, and the whole breadth of Italy. The latter opinion for theſe reaſons prevailed, and the manner of aſſiſting the Piſans was referred to the determination of the council of ten [c].

BEFORE any meaſures were formed by the council, the ſenate received ambaſſadors from the pope, requeſting they would order part of the army, returned from the ſiege of Novara, b to aſſiſt Ferdinand in expelling the French out of his dominions, in conſideration of which certain ſea-port towns ſhould be ceded to the republic; but neither did this ambaſſy meet with an immediate anſwer. At laſt Ferdinand's ambaſſadors, under the mediation of the pope, the emperor, and king of Spain, concluded an alliance with the Venetians, in which it was ſtipulated that Brunduſium, Troni, and Otranto ſhould be annexed to the Venetian dominions, in conſideration the republic would ſend ſix hundred men at arms and three thouſand foot to act under Ferdinand, and beſides give him by way of loan one hundred and fifty pounds in gold. Commiſſioners were ſent to take poſſeſſion of the towns, and orders iſſued to Gonzaga of Mantua to lead the troops into Naples [d].

CHARLES, hearing of this league, ſent Philip Commines to Venice to demand the reſtitu- c tion of Monopoli, and remonſtrate with the ſenate on the late alliance with Ferdinand, contrary to the peace with him; for the Venetian proveditors being preſent at the concluſion of the agreement between him and Sforza, he included the republic in that treaty [e]; but Commines was diſmiſſed with an unſatisfactory anſwer.

Treaty for the protection of the Piſans.

LODOVICO SFORZA, having intimation that the ſenate reſolved to protect Piſa, petitioned that he might be admitted as an aſſociate in the defence of this city: accordingly a treaty was concluded between the pope, the Venetians, and Lodovico; in conſequence of which the republic ordered two thouſand foot to be raiſed in Genoa and ſent to Piſa. The Florentines, hoping to become maſters of the city before the allied army could be aſſembled, ſent ſix thouſand foot, one thouſand horſe, and a fine train of artillery, to inveſt it; but the d Piſans, ſallying out upon them before the trenches were opened, defeated and diſperſed the Florentine army [f].

SOON after Paolo Vitelli, deſerting the Piſans, was appointed to the command of a freſh army, raiſed by the enemy and amounting to ten thouſand men, with orders immediately to reſume the ſiege of Piſa; but the Venetians were ſo vigilant in the defence of the city, and Pietro de Medicis, then baniſhed, coming with a powerful army againſt Florence, the army was recalled before it had made any conſiderable progreſs [g]. Piſa was ſcarce delivered from the impending ſtorm, when the ſenate received Faenza into their protection; a little ſtate well ſituated to check the Florentines, Bologneſe, and the other powers of Romagnia.

A. D. 1497. Sforza, Ferdinand, and the Venetians [h]. Sforza, who was moſt expoſed, took every meaſure for his own defence: he diſpatched ambaſſadors to Maximilian the emperor, and to the ſenate of Venice, deſiring their immediate aſſiſtance. The ſenate agreed to ſend troops to Alexandria, but raiſed ſcruples concerning the emperor's ſending forces into Italy: they knew that Maximilian was no friend to the republic, and dreaded the conſequence of granting him a paſſage through their territories; yet, fearing that the refuſal might induce the timid Lodovico to enter into a treaty with Charles, they conſented that an ambaſſy ſhould go to the emperor to ſettle this affair [i].

To paſs over circumſtances in which the republic was not immediately concerned, Fer- f dinand, aſſiſted by the Venetians, laid cloſe ſiege to Atello, the garriſon of which was driven to great extremities for want of water: at laſt it ſurrendered upon honourable terms. This ſucceſs was followed by the reduction of ſeveral other places, in which the republic bore a conſiderable ſhare. Ferdinand in the mean time dying, his uncle Frederic, a prince much beloved, was crowned; and he having no enmity to France, the war in Naples in a manner ceaſed, after Tarentum had yielded to the Venetian fleet [k].

THE ſtrong Venetian garriſon in Piſa excited the jealouſy of Sforza, who by this means ſaw himſelf deprived of the dominion of a city he ſpent ſo much labour to acquire. He began to vent his ſpleen by ſecret practices againſt the republic, endeavouring to bring the pope and king of Spain to uſe their influence that the Piſans might be reſtored to their lia berty; but in this ſcheme he was diſappointed, neither his holineſs nor the Spaniards chuſing to hazard the loſs of the Venetian friendſhip by ſuch a propoſition: however, he ſo far prevailed, that a congreſs was held, at which attended the Spaniſh, Venetian, Florentine, and Milaneſe ambaſſadors, with the pope's legate, but nothing was determined [l].

LEWIS the twelfth of France, who ſucceeded Charles, having, contrary to the opinion of all men, reſolved upon purſuing his claim not only to Naples but to the duchy of Milan, to which he was heir by his grandmother, ſent ambaſſadors to the pope, the Venetians, and Florentines, to acquaint them with his acceſſion to the crown, and deſire their friendſhip, which the Venetians returned with a congratulatory ambaſſy, and ſtrong aſſurances of the good diſpoſition of the republic. They were now arrived at the height of glory, careſſed, b eſteemed, and feared by their neighbours, and reſpected by the kings of France, Spain, the emperor, and even the grand Turk, who had often experienced the power and valour of their fleets. Matthias king of Hungary's ambaſſadors came to Venice to contract an alliance with the republic, which the ſenate readily granted: thus were they courted and ſolicited by the greateſt monarchs [m].

Lewis the twelfth of France claims Naples and Milan.

LODOVICO, in the mean time, envying their proſperity and jealous of their growing intereſt in Tuſcany, reſolved to declare openly in behalf of the Florentines againſt the Venetians and Piſans: he even prevailed on the pope to promiſe to join him with one hundred men at arms, and ſend a ſquadron of three gallies to block up Piſa by ſea, and prevent the city's c receiving ſuccours and proviſions. His holineſs never, however, performed his engagements, from an apprehenſion of quarrelling with the republic; but Lodovico began to declare himſelf, by denying the Venetian troops ordered to Piſa, a paſſage through his dominions, and obliging them to go round by Ferrara. He next prevailed upon the emperor to come to ſome reſolutions oppoſite to the intereſt of the republic: then he induced Giovanni Bentivoglio and the Bologneſe to contract an alliance with him, and extorted a promiſe from the republic of Lucca not to join the Venetians [n].

Sforza declares openly for the Florentines.

THE Florentines were beſieging ſome towns round Piſa, when they received advice that the ſenate of Venice would liſten to propoſals for a peace, provided the ſuperiority of Venice d was acknowleged. Willing to conclude the war upon any terms, they ſent two of their principal citizens to Venice to ſound the republic; but they returned without having effected their purpoſe [o].

DURING theſe tranſactions in Tuſcany, Lewis of France was making preparations to invade Milan by the next ſpring. In this he hoped for the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, who he knew bore a mortal grudge to Lodovico; nor was he miſtaken, for the republic readily executed a treaty with his ambaſſadors. Here it was ſtipulated that the king ſhould invade the duchy of Milan on the ſide of Piedmont, while the Venetians attacked it towards the Parmeſan; and that the Milaneſe being reduced, the territory of Ghiradadda and the Cremoneſe ſhould be ceded to the republic, on condition that, for a time ſpecified, they would ſupport the e king with a certain number of forces. This contract was made ſo ſecretly, that it was ſome time before either the pope or Sforza could procure the particulars [p].

Treaty between Lewis and the Venetians.

WHEN Lodovico came to the knowledge of this unexpected alliance, he was quite thunder-ſtruck; but reſolving to withſtand the Venetians by any means, he ſecretly diſpatched an envoy to Conſtantinople, to excite the Grand Seignior againſt the republic [q]. By ſome means the ſenate came to the knowledge of Sforza's intentions, and hearing that the Turks were preparing a great fleet, ſent Zancani, a ſenator, to the Porte, to ſound the emperor's deſigns, and renew the treaty with the Grand Seignior. Zancani was well received, and the better to deceive him, the treaty was renewed, but in Latin, a language by which the Turk did not think himſelf bound. The ambaſſador was ſoon informed of this part of the Mohammedan religion by Gritti, a Venetian, who had long reſided in Conſtantinople; he therefore f laboured with all his might to have the treaty executed in the Turkiſh language, but was diſappointed [r]. Sforza likewiſe, by means of Hercules D'Æſte, endeavoured to reconcile the Venetians and Florentines, hoping by this means to moderate the indignation of the republic. To ſecure the ſucceſs of this ſcheme he acquainted the Florentines, that as Lewis was preparing to invade his dominions, he ſhould be under the neceſſity of recalling thoſe forces which acted againſt Piſa for his own defence. D'Æſte attended the congreſs in perſon, and was made umpire of the differences between the Venetians, Florentines, and Piſans; but his deciſion proving unſatisfactory to all parties, the congreſs came to nothing. The Piſans, however, were ſo offended with the republic for ſome conceſſions unfavourable to them, that g they took the guard of the city from the Venetian troops, and even obliged them to quit Piſa [s].

IN the mean time Trivulcio had aſſembled a conſiderable army for the French king about Piedmont, and his majeſty was come to Lyons in his way to Italy, whence he ſent an envoy

French and Venetian army aſſembles. Great honours were conferred on the French miniſter: he was preſented with a fine horſe richly capariſoned, and two pounds of gold, together with a complete field equipage [t]. Then the army, conſiſting of ſeven thouſand foot and an equal number of horſe, was directed to begin their march. Alviana had the command, who, croſſing the Oglio, entered the enemy's country, and ſoon reduced a number of towns and forts: at laſt, coming before Caravaggio, he took it by aſſault, together with ſeveral other towns on the river Adda. Lodovico began to tremble for his dominions; and, ſtruck with the rapid progreſs of the Venetian conqueſts, diſpatched an ambaſſador to Venice, with orders to take Ferrara in his way. D'Eſte, who had always countenanced Sforza, ſent a gentleman before the Milaneſe ambaſſador, to requeſt that the ſenate would not deny him an audience [u]: but he was nevertheleſs forbid the city. Frederic of Naples about the ſame time acquainted the ſenate with his intention of ſending five hundred horſe to Sforza's aſſiſtance; and was anſwered that Sforza required much ſtronger reinforcements; but that they would eſteem even that ſmall number an hoſtility commenced againſt the republic, which they would reſent accordingly [w]. b

LODOVICO, deſtitute of all hopes of foreign aid, began to think of gaining the affections of his own ſubjects, by whom he was greatly deteſted: for this purpoſe he remitted one-third of the taxes with which they were oppreſſed, and ſubjoined other popular acts; after which he enrolled the name of every perſon in the duchy fit to bear arms [x].

In the mean time he was hemmed in on every ſide, the Venetians having advanced to Lodi, c
while the French, after taking and ſacking Alexandria, were proceeding towards Milan. Sforza, greatly terrified at their approach, ſent his family to Germany, whither he was preparing to follow: this determined the Milaneſe to acquaint him, by four of the chief citizens, that finding he diſtruſted their loyalty, they were reſolved to ſubmit to the French; and Lodovico, having no farther hopes, ſet out with five hundred light horſe for Germany, having with tears taken leave of the citizens. Bernardino de Corte, with three thouſand foot, in whom he confided, together with ſtore of arms, proviſions, and money, ſufficient for a long defence, were left in the citadel; but Sforza was not gone three days before the ungrateful Bernardino, whom he had bred from a child, and loved as his ſon, baſely betrayed the city into the hands of the French [y]. d

Milan and Cremona ſubmit to the French and Venetians. A. D. 1498. In the mean time the Venetians advanced to Cremona, and ſummoned the governor to ſurrender; but the citizens deſiring two days to conſider of the propoſals, the time was granted, and they ſeized the opportunity of ſending to Trivulcio, the French general, to requeſt he would take poſſeſſion of the city. Trivulcio, however, replying that Cremona belonged to the Venetians by an article of the treaty between his maſter and the republic, they received the proveditors into the city, conducting them to their quarters under a canopy of ſtate. Antonio Battaglioni, to whom Sforza had committed the defence of the citadel, being ſummoned the next day to ſurrender, conſented to betray his maſter for the ſum of one hundred and fifty pounds of gold, the rank of a gentleman of Venice, a houſe in the city, and another in the country near Padua. Cremona being thus annexed to the Venetian e dominions, the ſenate ſent magiſtrates thither to govern in the ſame manner and by the ſame laws as the other parts of the republic. Two ambaſſadors were likewiſe choſen, and theſe, together with the new magiſtrates, ordered to wait upon the king, who was come to Mantua, and to compliment him in the name of the doge and ſenate [z].

But while the Venetians were thus extending their dominions in Italy, and gathering laurels on the continent, they were threatened with a dangerous war in their iſlands, the Morea, and Greek dominions. The governor of Zara ſent advice of the great preparations Bajazet made by ſea and land, and likewiſe of the arrival of two thouſand Turkiſh horſe in the Zaratin. The ſenate immediately appointed Grimani admiral, who, unwilling to loſe time, generouſly lent the ſtate eighty pounds of gold towards equipping the fleet. Before the Vene- f

Having intelligence that Bajazet ſought him, he went to the iſland of Sapienza, near Modon, and there drew up his fleet. The Turks ſoon appeared and joined battle, which was accepted by Grimani, reinforced the day before by Andrea Loretano and ſeventeen gallies which he had equipped at his own expence. Loretano begun the engagement, and a caught the flames, and the whole fleet was in danger of being burnt, the wind blowing from that quarter [a]. Two or three gallies were actually destroyed by the fire; and Grimani found himself under the necessity of sounding a retreat, to prevent its progress.

THE grand master of Rhodes being under apprehensions of a visit from the Turks, he sent to Lewis of France and the republic for succours. A squadron of twenty-two sail was immediately equipped in Provence and Venice, and sent to his assistance: on the arrival of the fleet, it was found that the Turks had some other design, and the allies returned to Zant, and joined Grimani. This admiral was accused of neglecting his duty before the last engagement: it was said that he let slip a favourable opportunity of defeating the Turks the day before he engaged: now he omitted another fair occasion of fighting, for which he

b was recalled, and publickly censured, the Turks in the mean time having taken Lepanto [b]. Nor were they idle towards the continent; for, entering Dalmatia, they scoured the confines of Zara, and, finding no opposition, wasted and destroyed the country as far as Livanza, taking a great number of prisoners. Upon this intelligence Zancani marched to the frontiers with a strong army; but failing in his duty, he was superseded and confined four years prisoner in Padua. Thus stood affairs with the Turks, while the Venetian and French troops, under Cæsar Borgia, son of pope Alexander, proceeded to Romagnia, where they besieged and took certain towns belonging to the patrimony of the church, which the pope resigned up to Borgia.

Turks enter Dalmatia.

THE senate, for the security of their own dominions during the war in Romagnia, sent

c three thousand foot and two thousand horse to Ravenna, under Alviana, to be distributed round their frontiers in such a manner as to form a chain. When Alviana arrived he received a message from Giovanni Sforza, requesting he might be taken into the protection of the republic, and screened from the vengeance of Borgia, who hated him implacably; but Alviana told the ambassador, that he was persuaded the senate would never protect a prince who had so mortally offended them in concealing Lodovico's ambassador, dispatched with design to excite Bajazet against the republic [c].

MEAN time Lodovico, returning with some succours from Germany, conceived hopes of regaining his dominions, from the distaste the Milanese expressed of the French govern-

d ment. The senate, upon intelligence that he was preparing to re-enter Italy, ordered their troops to file towards the Cremonese, and reinforced the army with three thousand Swiss they had taken into the service of the republic. Lodovico arriving at Coma, took it without striking a blow, the French garrison surrendering themselves to prevent being enclosed between his forces without, and the disaffected inhabitants within the city. Thence he sent his brother Ascanio towards Milan, where there was a strong party formed in his favour. Trivulcio was governor of Milan, and being chief of the Guelph faction in Lombardy, he was extremely obnoxious to the Gibellines, who formed a majority of the citizens: this animosity was carried so far that news of the surrender of Coma was no sooner arrived, than Lodovico was proclaimed, and Trivulcio forced to retire with the garrison to the citadel, and next day to Novara. In this manner Lodovico recovered the Milanese with as much facility

e as the allies had reduced his dominions. Pavia and Parma presently followed the example of the capital; Lodi and Placentia would have done the same, had not the Venetians prevented it by ordering some troops to march thither [d]. He did not long enjoy this prosperity; for while he was besieging Novara, the French army assembled in Piedmont, and, joining the Venetians, poured into Milan, soon after made Lodovico prisoner, and sent him to France: Ascanio was likewise taken and sent after his brother, but released at the death of Lodovico [e].

A. D. 1499: Lodovico returns from Germany.

Recovers his dominions in the Milanese.

Is defeated and made prisoner.

No sooner was this affair concluded than the senate sent Lodovico Manenti to Bajazet, complaining of his having attacked them by sea and land unprovoked, and contrary to the treaty made the year before with Zancani; likewise to solicit the liberty of the Venetian

f merchants, restitution of Lepanto, and the renewal of the treaty. They were induced by two reasons to try the effects of this ambassy; the first arose from the low state of the exchequer, and the other from credible intelligence that Bajazet would not be averse to moderate conditions: but their expectations were disappointed; for Bajazet's demands were insolent, and such as might have been expected in consequence of a war in which he was every where victorious. He told Manenti, that if the senate desired peace they must restore to him Napoli, Modon, and Coron, the three principal cities the republic held in the Morea: and also pay one hundred pounds of gold yearly, by way of tribute. Manenti returning with this answer, the senate resolved upon prosecuting the war with vigour [f]. The first care was to fortify the frontiers of Friuli against the incursions of the Turks; then they sent Quirini and Lodovico Canalis with a small body of foot, for the defence of Corfu:

they likewiſe diſpatched ſtores and troops to Napoli, upon advice that Bajazet, with a prodigious fleet, intended a deſcent on the Morea. Melchior Treviſan, the Venetian admiral, aſſembled his whole force, amounting to ſeventy ſail, at Zant; but the Turkiſh fleet, which exceeded two hundred veſſels, arriving on the coaſt of Napoli, landed a body of horſe to ſcour the country as far as the walls of the city. The garriſon ſallying out upon them, obliged the Turks to retire; upon which they filed towards Modon, ſending a large detachment to lay ſiege to Junca. The garriſon was well ſupplied with every neceſſary, and commanded by Contareni the proveditor, a brave officer. Sallying out upon the Turks, they entirely defeated and forced them to raiſe the ſiege the day after the trenches had been opened. Treviſan, general of the Venetian army, dying, the command, to the great joy of the troops, devolved upon Contareni, until the ſenate ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of the vacancy [g].

In the mean time Bajazet, with all his force, laid ſiege to Modon, which Contareni determined to relieve at all events. The garriſon was badly provided with ſtores and proviſions, the chief ſupplies having been ſent to Napoli, from a notion the ſenate entertained the firſt attempt would be againſt that city. Contareni ſet out from Zant with the fleet, determined to fight the enemy though greatly ſuperior: as ſoon as he deſcried the Turkiſh fleet, he bore down upon it in order of battle, and was received by one hundred ſtout gallies. Not diſcouraged at the enemy's numbers, Contareni began the engagement, which continued with great fury and advantage to the Venetians for the ſpace of five hours; but the wind ſlackening and a perfect calm ſucceeding, they loſt the fruits of their ſuperior ſkill in navigation, and were forced to fight upon equal terms: they had almoſt ſunk under the powerful weight of the enemy, when a gale ſpringing up enabled Contareni to diſengage his fleet and retire to Zant, with the loſs of two of his largeſt ſhips, and great damage of the remainder. Bajazet preſerved the honour of the victory, but his loſs was more conſiderable; for, beſides a prodigious ſlaughter of his men, ſix gallies were ſunk and deſtroyed [h].

The Venetian, having refitted the fleet, was ſtill bent upon ſending ſuccours to the beſieged. To this end he choſe five of the ſtouteſt gallies, with reſolute officers, who engaged at all events to puſh through the Turkiſh fleet, and ſupply the city with proviſions. Thinking it neceſſary to acquaint the beſieged of his intention, he diſpatched a yacht, manned with certain deſperadoes, to deſire the garriſon would make a diverſion in favour of the ſquadron coming to their relief. The boat entered the harbour amidſt the enemy's ſhot, with the loſs only of one rower; and the ſquadron ſoon following, kept a running fight with the Turks, and in ſpite of all their endeavours got ſafe to port. Their arrival was joyful, but it occaſioned the loſs of Modon; for ſo eager were the garriſon to receive ſupplies, that neglecting their poſts, they flocked in crowds to the ſhore; and the Turks, ſeizing the opportunity, ſcaled the walls, and entered the town in ſuch multitudes, as baffled all the valour of the garriſon [i]. Thus was Modon loſt by the very means which might have ſaved it, in defiance of all the Turkiſh power. The garriſon and inhabitants were all put to the ſword, excepting the governor, who was ſent in chains and preſented before the walls of Junca, which ſo intimidated the garriſon that the fort was ſurrendered without a ſtroke. Coron ſoon after capitulated upon honourable terms; and of all the towns the republic held in the Morea, none of any conſequence now remained beſides Napoli [k]. This the Turks ſoon inveſted; but after a tedious and bloody ſiege were forced to abandon the enterprize, the city being well ſupplied, and the governor determined to bury himſelf in its ruins (A).

About the time Modon ſurrendered, the Venetian fleet was diſperſed and terribly ſhattered in a ſtorm, which drove ſeveral ſhips ſhattered and diſmaſted as far as Candia. Benedetto Peſſari, who was appointed admiral in the room of Treviſan, came to Zant while the Turks were beſieging Napoli. As ſoon as he had collected and refitted the fleet, he determined to go in queſt of the enemy; but Bajazet, having intelligence of this deſign, commanded the baſhaw to raiſe the ſiege of Napoli, and return with the fleet to Conſtantinople. Peſſari ſent a frigate to view the enemy, who had ſailed the day before the cruizer arrived, which determined the Venetian to ſteer his courſe to Legina, the Turks having taken and

(A) The conduct of one Contareni, a Venetian officer, who was made priſoner at Coron, deſerves notice: this gentleman had been ſent with a party by the Turks to ſummon the garriſon of Napoli to ſurrender, in hopes he might prevail on his countrymen to ſave their own lives, and avoid the ſeverities and rigours of a ſiege. As Contareni was parlying with the governor on the oppoſite ſide of the moat, he ſuddenly ſpurred his horſe and plunged into the ditch. Having gained the oppoſite ſide, he uſed all his influence to perſuade the garriſon to ſupport the utmoſt miſeries of a ſiege rather than ſurrender; after which he returned priſoner to the Turks like a ſecond Regulus.

The plunder of this iſland he diſtributed among his troops, and ſailed for Tenedos, which having burnt to the ground, he attacked the rear of the Turkiſh fleet as it was entering the ſtreights, and took nine gallies, the crews of which he put to death [l]. After this exploit he proceeded to the iſland of Samothrace, where, underſtanding that the inhabitants ſubmitted from neceſſity to the Turkiſh dominion, he received them into the protection of the republic, and left a garriſon and governor, upon whom the natives ſettled a ſalary of a tenth of the produce of the iſland. Next he went and ſacked Caviſta, returning from b thence to Napoli loaded with booty, and adored by the troops, whoſe hearts he had gained by his generoſity and valour [m].

HERE receiving advice that the Spaniſh fleet under Gonſalvo Ferdinandes, was come to Zant to join the Venetians, he immediately ſailed thither; and paſſing by Junca, he ordered Charles Contareni to be beheaded on the prow of his galley, for having ſurrendered that ſtrong fort to the Turks upon being ſummoned. Both fleets in conjunction went and beſieged Cephalonia, which they carried by the obſtinate intrepidity of the Spaniſh and Venetian infantry. Junca likewiſe was recovered by means of one Demetrius of Modon, who concerting meaſures with ſome of his friends ſucceeded ſo happily, that killing fifty Turks, the reſt made their eſcape over the walls, and abandoned the fort [n]. Cephalonia taken by Peſſari.

c PESSARI ſailed with fourteen ſtout gallies to Preveze, where he was told the Turks were preparing a fleet: here he took three gallies ready to put to ſea, and burnt ſeveral others on the ſtocks; then he ſteered to Corfu, where he ordered the fleet to rendezvous and refit. Before he went on this laſt expedition, Gonſalvo took his leave and retired to winter in Sicily: Peſſari made him a preſent of ſome rich wines, and ſeventy thouſand weight of ſweet-meats which he had ſent him from Venice. After refitting the fleet he ſailed to the mouth of the river Bojan, with intention to deſtroy a Turkiſh fleet which lay there; but the enemy, drawing their ſhips fourteen miles up the river, prevented his deſign. Peſſari leaving a ſmall ſquadron to block them up returned to Corfu: here the ſenate rewarded the courage of the troops by a liberal gratuity to every ſoldier who had diſtinguiſhed d himſelf, and by taking care of the families of thoſe who had died or were killed in the ſervice [o].

WHILE Peſſari was performing wonders at ſea, the ſenate ſent an ambaſſador to Ladiſlaus king of Hungary, to engage him in an alliance againſt Bajazet. In this treaty the pope deſired to be included; and it was ſtipulated that the king, with all his forces, ſhould attack the Turks, in conſideration of a ſubſidy of three thouſand pounds in gold from the Venetians, and four hundred from the pontiff. Towards the cloſe of this alliance Auguſtino Barbariga died, after he had governed fifteen years, with the reputation of a temperate and prudent prince, who was ſparing of the public, and profuſe of his own money; but with all his good qualities, there was a tincture of jealouſy and moroſeneſs, which rendered his cha- Treaty with the king of Hungary.

THE new doge begun his government by propoſing, in the firſt great council held after his acceſſion, that Peſſari the admiral ſhould, in reward of his ſervices, be made a procurator of St. Mark's, in the room of Trono deceaſed. He was accordingly elected, in his abſence, to this dignity, one of the firſt in the ſtate [q]. The ſenate had juſt received advice from Andrea Gritti, that Achmet, the grand vizier, was not averſe to an accommodation; they accordingly ſent an ambaſſador to Hungary, to deſire the king would ſend plenipotentiaries to Conſtantinople; and the king conſented, on condition of the republic's continuing to him a yearly ſubſidy of three hundred pounds of gold [r]. The treaty was accordingly concluded, on ſome trifling conceſſions which the republic made to Bajazet, tired out with the war he carried on in Aſia as well as in Europe. The Peace with Bajazet. grand ſeignior diſpatched an ambaſſador extraordinary to Venice, who made his entrance in great magnificence, and was received with particular marks of diſtinction, as the repreſentative of a great monarch and ſoldier. Thus did this war, which the republic had

THEY were scarce delivered from this war when ambassadors arrived from Lewis the twelfth, to engage the republic in an alliance against Spain, which the senate absolutely rejected, though they agreed to continue the ancient treaty. The death of pope Alexander the sixth; the election of a new pope; his death a few days after; and the choice of a successor to Pius the third, occurred in this interval of tranquility which the republic enjoyed. Upon the accession of Julius the second to the papal chair, the republic sent an ambassy of eight of the chief nobility to congratulate his holiness: they were kindly received, and mutual professions of esteem were exchanged. b

THESE professions produced no real cordiality. Julius was jealous of the extraordinary acquisitions made by the republic: he even advised the duke of Valentinois to recover the towns the Venetians had torn from his dominions [s]. This obliged the senate to caution the proveditors in Romagnia, to take every step they thought necessary for the safety and interest of the state; upon which the proveditors laid siege to Tassignana and Meldola, two strong
A. D. 1504. towns, which surrendered upon the first summons. Highly incensed against the senate, pope Julius sent the bishop of Tivoli to Venice to reprehend them, and procure the restitution of Faenza and Rimini, and also to request the assistance of the republic towards recovering the other towns in the hands of Valentinois. The nuncio delivered his instructions, but was answered, that the pope had no authority over the towns he mentioned; that they never had been claimed by any of his predecessors, nor esteemed a part of the church-patrimony; and that they had been renounced in open consistory to the Valentinois family: they added, that this exertion of despotism was not suitable to professions of friendship and the good offices which had passed between his holiness and the republic, which they were willing to maintain as long as it could be done with justice to the honour and majesty of the com-
Quarrel between the pope and republic. monwealth. With this answer the nuncio was dismissed [t]; but Julius maintaining his point, yet knowing his strength unequal to support it by arms, had recourse to menaces and threats that he would stir up all the princes of Europe against the republic. Justiniano, their ambassador at Rome, endeavoured to appease the pontiff; but he would listen to no propositals, until the towns were first ceded. The ambassador acquainted the senate with d the pope's declaration, and they immediately assembled to deliberate upon an answer; but while they were sitting, the nuncio returned with haughty letters, delivered with an air and speech no less imperious. Greatly perplexed in what manner to conduct themselves, the senate at length determined to send ambassies to the emperor and king of France, to refute the complaints made by Julius. The remonstrances of their ambassadors had a good effect for the time. Both monarchs seemed satisfied of the equity of their plea; and the pope's ambassadors returned chagrined and disappointed, they having obtained nothing more than the princes would send commissioners to debate the cause at Rome [u].

A. D. 1505. HOWEVER, the emperor soon forgot his complaisance to the republic; for next year he sent ambassadors to Venice to desire that Faenza and Rimini might be surrendered. He had e a right to this demand, he said, as the natural protector of the holy see; that if they thought the demand unreasonable they would submit it to arbitration; that he would labour to procure the pope's consent; and lastly, that he would be umpire, and decide according to equity, without prejudice, passion, or partiality. The senate, being well assured of the emperor's inclinations, and in what manner he would determine the point in dispute, answered, that their claim was so clear as to render an umpire unnecessary, with which they dismissed the ambassador [w].

A. D. 1506. IN the mean time a confederacy was formed between the emperor and the French king; upon which the latter sent John Lascari to Venice to entreat the senate to compromise matters with the pope, in order to pave the way for a general league against the Othoman em- f pire: he added, that he had swore to the league with Maximilian, not to attack any christian state, but only to support each other, if attacked. To this the senate replied, that they had taken all possible means to be reconciled to his holiness, and had even offered to hold the towns in dispute of the church, and to pay any reasonable tribute: they congratulated his majesty on the treaty with Maximilian: but as it was stipulated in the treaty between the republic and the king, that neither should contract other alliances, they requested to know why his majesty had given them no intimation of his intentions. The ambassador was a good deal embarrassed with thus unexpected question: however, he answered, that though he was ignorant of his master's motives for the treaty, he could assure the senate, that the Venetians would be joyfully received into the alliance.

UNSATISFIED

a UNSATISFIED with mere compliments, the ſenate determined to try the iſſue of another ambaſſy to the pope, by which they made propoſals; firſt, to reſtore Rimini and all they had taken in Romagnia ſince the death of Alexander the ſixth, except Faenza and its appendages; ſecondly, to reſtore Faenza under certain reſtrictions and limitations. This laſt propoſal the pope ſeemed to reliſh; but a ſeries of intrigues and negociations between him, the French king, and the emperor, for the ſpace of two years, fruſtrated the effects. The Venetian grandeur and wealth excited the jealouſy of thoſe great powers as well as of the little princes and ſtates, the neighbours of the republic. It would be endleſs, however, to recite all the ambaſſies, treaties, and negociations, that occurred during this period; ſufficient it is that they ended in a confederacy againſt the republic, the moſt powerful which Europe
b had the never beheld.

A YEAR before the league of Cambray was formed, a kind of war broke out between Maximilian and the republic. It had been ſuggeſted to the emperor, that Lewis's deſign in coming to Italy was to ſeize upon the patrimony of the church, and to diſmember the holy ſee. This notion the Venetians, who were not pleaſed with the king's reſolution, took care to confirm. The emperor upon this aſſembled the diet of Conſtance, wherein it was determined that his imperial majeſty ſhould go into Italy, attended by a retinue of eight thouſand foot, twenty-four thouſand horſe, and a train of artillery. The pretext was, to receive the imperial crown at the pope's hands, a form which had not been paſſed through, notwithſtanding he wore the diadem for ſeveral years [x]. A. D. 1507. Diet of Conſtance.

c BOTH Lewis and the republic were greatly perplexed at this reſolution, and left no means untried to prevent it by means of the princes of the diet. Maximilian diſpatched four noblemen to Venice, to ſolicit a paſſage through the dominions of the republic, giving the ſenate the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that he would offer no moleſtation to the meaneſt Venetian ſubject. Lewis laboured hard to perſuade the ſenate to deny this requeſt, promiſing to aſſiſt the republic with all his forces to oppoſe the emperor. The king's requeſt was agreeable to the inclinations of the ſenate, who knew how deſirous Maximilian was of an opportunity of ſupporting his claim by force of arms to certain towns annexed to the republic, which the emperor pretended were a part of the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria. The ambaſſador was therefore told, that the republic would chearfully grant the emperor a paſſage, if he d would diſmiſs his formidable retinue, which they could not ſuffer to paſs into Italy conſiſtently with their treaty with the French king. Maximilian gave the republic to underſtand that he would force a paſſage, and accordingly prepared to execute his menace. In the month of February, notwithſtanding the extreme inclemency of the ſeaſon, he paſſed the Alps, and, after a march ſcarcely credible, arrived within four leagues of Verona. The French governor in Milan ſent ſix hundred men to the aſſiſtance of the republic, which, with the Venetian forces, formed an army of two thouſand ſoldiers, under Alviana. Had the emperor known how to uſe the good fortune which almoſt always attended him, this body muſt have ſunk under his power; but, having ſurmounted the greateſt difficulty, he approached Vincenza without taking any meaſures to beſiege it, though ſtrenuouſly adviſed by the mare quis of Brandenbourg. As this city was but poorly garriſoned and provided againſt a ſiege, it muſt probably have ſurrendered before Alviana could come to its relief; and hence a way into the Venetian dominions would be opened, and a retreat ſecured, beſides poſſeſſion gained of a town, otherways of great importance to the ſucceſs of the expedition; but the emperor declined attacking it, under pretence that he was not prepared to undertake a ſiege of ſo much conſequence and hazard; that he would not lead to deſtruction troops it was his duty to ſave; that, leaving the Venetians within their walls, he would retire to Trent, where the army could be better ſupplied. Thus abandoning the conqueſt in his power, he actually marched ſeveral leagues farther from the frontiers of Italy. A. D. 1508. The emperor marches into Italy.

THENCE he went to attend the diet at Ulm, leaving his troops a prey to the enemy. Al- f viana, ſeizing on a paſs left unguarded by the Germans, entered the valley Cadorino, and there attacked the imperial army. The Germans, perceiving they were ſhut in, determined to force their way: a battle enſued, in which both ſides fought with great courage; at laſt, after continuing the engagement for three hours, the imperialiſts were broken and defeated, leaving five thouſand dead on the field. Upon this Alviana laid ſiege to Cadorino, Gradiſk, Goritz, and a number of other places belonging to the houſe of Auſtria. On the other ſide Contareni, with the fleet, inveſted Trieſte, Cap-Iſtria, Rovigno, and Pola, with many other cities on the coaſts of Iſtria and Friuli. Every thing ſucceeded with the Venetians by ſea and land, and it would have been difficult to aſſign bounds to their conqueſts, had Trivulcio, with the French troops, remained firm to their engagements. Alviana had formed a deſign g of beſieging Trent, in expectation of being ſupported by Trivulcio; but this general, under- The Germans defeated.

ſtanding that the treaty between his maſter and the republic was only defenſive, refuſed to enter upon offenſive meaſures. a

BESIDES Trivulcio's refuſal, other impediments obſtructed Alviana's deſign; ſome of the wiſeſt perſonages in the republic declared againſt an open rupture with the emperor. Dominico Moroſini, in particular, a procurator of St. Mark's, aged ninety, of great experience and ſound judgment, told the ſenate, "That though the German princes were not pleaſed "with the emperor's quarrelling unprovoked with the Venetians, yet they would reſent any "indignity offered to the imperial crown; that as they had ſufficiently avenged the injury, "and compenſated the loſs ſuſtained from Maximilian, proceeding farther would look as if "a paſſage through the Venetian dominions had been refuſed, only to promote a war in "which the ſtate hoped to be gainers; that laying down their arms now would ſhew b "their moderation, gain the eſteem of the German princes, upon whom a great part of their "commerce depended, and convince the world the republic had ſpirit to reſent, but juſtice "to refrain from giving an injury. It was indeed glorious, he ſaid, to vanquiſh an enemy "in the field, to extend the limits, and raiſe the power of their ſtate; but it was ſtill more "glorious to ſubdue their paſſions, bridle their ambition, and merit the reputation of juſt, "the greateſt character of an individual or community. The events of war, depending "on contingencies, were variable and uncertain; but councils, proceeding from delibera- "tion, weighed in the nice balance of true judgment, and abſtracted from furious zeal and "blind paſſion, were ſure, and the neareſt to certainty that the weak ſtate of humanity "would admit [y]."

THIS ſpeech from the venerable old man had its effect in aſſwaging the heat of thoſe who warmly declared for proſecuting the war. The ſenate at that time determined nothing, but referred the iſſue to another ſitting: in a few days after, intelligence was received that the emperor was levying forces on the confines of Verona, and in the country of the Griſons, which determined the ſenate unanimouſly to proceed in the war. Moroſini now eagerly preſſed this meaſure, which he had ſo lately oppoſed. The reſolution was tranſmitted to the proveditors upon the frontiers and in Iſtria, with reinforcements of troops, and ſupplies of money and ſtores. In conſequence of theſe orders Alviana took Protonovi, then Fama, a city of Sclavonia, which he burnt; and croſſing the Alps, he laid ſiege and took Preſsburg, a ſtrong town on the confines of Hungary [z].

WHILE the Venetians were purſuing their conqueſts, the emperor's army aſſembled at Trent, attacked and defeated a corps of three thouſand republicans near Calliona; but this victorious army ſoon dwindled away, the ſoldiers mutinying and deſerting for want of pay. The Griſons, to a man, left the imperial general, who was reduced to ſeven thouſand men, and forced to retire: upon which the Venetians, advancing as far as Trent, laid waſte the country, and took ſome towns and forts of little conſequence. Maximilian, being in great want of men and money, daunted likewiſe with the loſs of Trieſte, and the ſucceſs of the republic, made overtures for a peace. After ſome altercation, a congreſs was fixed to ſit at Venice. The emperor's commiſſioners were the biſhop of Trent, and Lorentano his ſecretary. Lewis appointed Trivulcio and Charles Godfrey to attend; and the affairs of the republic were committed to Zachary Contareni, a perſon in great eſteem. The great point which the imperial commiſſioners laboured was to diſunite the French and Venetians. To ſucceed the better in this, they promiſed Contareni to make him acquainted with the nature of the late ſecret treaty between the emperor and the king, if he would, on the other hand, renounce the alliance of Lewis. This propoſition was rejected by the Venetian with diſdain, who declared he would conquer or die with his allies [a]. The imperialiſts, finding themſelves diſappointed in this project, made another propoſal, which was accepted, though in its conſequences it anſwered the emperor's purpoſe as well as the former. This was, that a truce of three years ſhould take place, including the three powers concerned in the Italian war, in order to ſettle preliminaries for a general peace: that in the mean time all conqueſts ſhould remain in the hands of the poſſeſſors, who ſhould have the liberty of fortifying all the places which they retained after peace was concluded. Contareni did not diſlike this propoſal, but he deſired leave to conſult the ſenate before he returned an anſwer. This circumſtance, which occaſioned the warmeſt diſputes, was obviouſly calculated as a bait for Contareni to draw him from the alliance of France, ſince Lewis reaped nothing by the war, and the emperor had loſt by it dominion as well as reputation. The French commiſſioners not only refuſed their aſſent to this article, but likewiſe to accede to the truce unleſs it was made general, and the duke of Gueldres, whoſe ruin Maximilian had planned, was included [b].

THE ſenate's inſtructions to Contareni were, that he ſhould cloſe in with the propoſals of the imperialiſts; that he ſhould endeavour to get Trivulcio and Godfrey to ſign them, but a upon their refuſal conclude a ſeparate truce, with this proviſo, that ſix months ſhould be granted to the French plenipotentiaries to determine. Upon this Contareni ſhewed ſo much eagerneſs and zeal to finiſh the truce, as made the French plenipotentiaries ſuſpect the republic had very little regard to the intereſt of her allies; and that they were the dupes of her politics in the late alliance, which had not produced a ſingle advantage to ballance the expences of the war: however, the treaty was concluded, and the French left to complain of the ingratitude of the republic, and the cunning of Maximilian [c].

In this meaſure the ſenate certainly miſtook their aim, as appeared by the conſequences. Nothing could be more contrary to the true intereſt of Venice than a rupture with a monarch the moſt powerful and natural protector of the republic. Lewis, by the acquiſition of Mi-
b lan, had a ſtrong intereſt in preſerving the rights and privileges of the Venetians, and fighting their cauſe againſt all enemies. Their contiguity to his duchy made them the natural guaranties of it, and this again obliged him to protect them by means of the large army which he neceſſarily kept on foot in Italy; but the iſſue is the beſt proof of the miſconduct of the ſenate [d].

ALVIANA, after having given orders concerning the fortifications of Goritz and other conqueſts, returned to Venice, where triumphal honours were decreed him. The order was new, and it is difficult to aſſign the ſenate's motives for falling in ſo late with a practice they had ſo long neglected. The moſt probable reaſon is, that they accommodated the reward to the diſpoſition and genius of the general, who eſteemed nothing ſo much as glory, and c thought all his ſervices ſufficiently repaid by honours which diſtinguiſhed him above others. Barre alledges, that this inſtance of vanity conſiderably forwarded the league againſt the republic. Undoubtedly the emperor was greatly piqued at ſo open a declaration of victory, which he thought a blot upon his own glory, as well as a reflection on the empire; and it is certain that he determined upon vengeance, and even to ſmother his reſentment againſt France, in order to wipe off this diſgrace. But the great ſpring of the league of Cambray was Lewis's indignation: he complained to Condelmere, the Venetian ambaſſador, of the injury done him by concluding a ſeparate treaty; of the ingratitude and ſelfiſh motives of the republic; and even dropt ſome menaces, which plainly indicated his intentions of ſeeking revenge [e].

d To aſcertain preciſely the juſtice of the claims made by each of the powers engaged in this league, it will be neceſſary to take a retroſpective view of the government of Italy for ſome ages. Before France and Spain got footing in Italy, the popes were the common arbiters among the different ſtates, rather ſpiritual than temporal ſovereigns. In a few centuries they loſt great part of the dominions of the church; and in the time of Otho the firſt
A. D. 1509. the patrimony of St. Peter was compoſed of the city of Rome and its appendages, ſome of the maritime parts of Tuſcany, the duchy of Spoleto, marquiſate of Ancona, Ravenna, all Romagnia, and in general thoſe dominions contained under the exarchate. During the broils between the Guelphs and Gibellines, the emperor deprived the holy ſee of all Tuſcany, and ſeveral other places. In fine, after the pope's dominions had been diſmembered, the emperor e Rodolph the firſt, ſold liberty to moſt of the cities of Italy, who gladly embraced the opportunity of throwing off both the imperial and papal yokes. In conſequence, the moſt powerful ſoon reduced under their dominion the weaker cities, while in their turn they fell under the tyranny of certain families, who had acquired power and influence. In this manner did many petty ſtates of Italy acquire ſovereignty, and within their reſpective juriſdictions, all the power formerly lodged in the emperors and pontiffs.

During the pontificate of Alexander the ſixth, the dominions of the church were ſtill more retrenched, though the pope preſerved the right of ſovereignty over many places of which he had loſt the property: among theſe were Ravenna, Bologna, Faenza, Urbino, Ferrara, Frivola, Rimini, Peruſia, Peſaro, and Ceſana. Notwithſtanding theſe loſſes the popes
f ſtill, by means of their ſpiritual authority, were powerful, this giving them great influence over their neighbours, and drawing conſiderable revenues from all the Chriſtian princes. When Lewis the twelfth ſucceeded to the dukedom of Milan, and Ferdinand got poſſeſſion of the crown of Naples, a thorough change was introduced in the affairs of Italy: then the temporal power of the pontiffs was wholly abſorbed in the authority of thoſe powerful monarchs, who, beſides their dominions in Italy, were the ſovereigns of other conſiderable kingdoms. The popes tried every method to expel them out of Italy; but, unable to effect this by their own force, they fomented diviſions and jealouſies between them, in order to weaken both. Even this policy was found ineffectual, as the power of the one encreaſed in proportion as that of the other was diminiſhed. For a ſeries of years this was the ſole aim of the politics of the court of Rome: ſometimes foreigners were called in to incline the ſcale; but it was remarkable that hereby no advantage enſued to the holy ſee, as the ſuperiority which was given to one party was more deſtructive of the papal influence than the equal balance before mentioned. a

It muſt alſo be conſidered, that beſides the general intereſts of the ſee of Rome, every pope had his particular views and intereſts, that of aggrandizing their families, and raiſing to high dignities their brothers, nephews, or natural children. Alexander the ſixth, for inſtance, formed a plan for making Cæſar Borgia, his baſtard, a powerful temporal prince. For the execution of this deſign it was that Borgia, either by fraud or force, became maſter of Peruſia, Urbino, Frivola, Faenza, Rimini, &c. under pretence that the poſſeſſors had not properly acknowleged the tributes and ſervices to the holy ſee: however, after the death of Alexander, his ſon, who then was not firmly eſtabliſhed in his uſurpation, loſt theſe dominions, which reverted to the lawful proprietors. b

JULIUS the ſecond was no ſooner raiſed to the papal dignity than he formed the ſame ſcheme in favour of the houſe of Rovera: for this purpoſe it was inſinuated to the Venetians, that his intention was to reunite to the church all thoſe places alienated from it; with this view he deſired they would ſurrender Faenza and Rimini. On their refuſal, he demanded the aſſiſtance of the emperor Maximilian, which was the firſt ſtep towards the league of Cambray.

As to the Venetians, they had long been the admiration and wonder of mankind, on account of the wiſdom of their ſenate, eſteemed the moſt politic body on earth, and the prodigious pitch of naval power to which they arrived. It was by their prudence, induſtry, and addreſs, that they gradually eſtabliſhed a very conſiderable territory on the continent, ſupported by a ſtrong maritime power, in the latter ſuperior to any ſtate in Europe, and in the former upon a footing with the moſt formidable potentates of Italy. The Venetian dominions on the continent at this time conſiſted of the provinces of Friuli, the Treviſan, the Bergameſe, the Veroneſe, the Breſcian, Vicenza, Padua, Rovigo, with their dependencies, the Cremoneſe, the Poleſin, Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini; all of which provinces and cities had formerly conſtituted a part of the kingdom of Italy. Afterwards they became ſubject to the emperors, whoſe vicars in time aſſumed the reins of ſovereignty: theſe being in courſe of time expelled, the cities recovered their liberty, only to fall under a more petty tyranny, in which ſtate they exiſted when the Venetians, either by meaſures of force or policy, annexed them to their dominions. c d

Although the imperial ſovereignty was no longer acknowleged, yet it is certain the emperors never ceded their pretenſions to thoſe places. The Germanic body often put in their claim, founding their right upon the ſovereignty of Otho the firſt, and of ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, over Italy. Thus there was hardly a city or province belonging to the republic, to which the emperor did not claim an original right; and the popes and kings of France pretenſions of a later date, either as ſuperiors of the church, or dukes of Milan.

FRIULI was annexed by Otho the firſt to the ſee of Aquileia; Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini, had been a part of the holy ſee; Rovigo and the Poleſin were dependencies on the duchy of Ferrara; Cremona and Ghiaradadda belonged to the duchy of Milan, and were ceded to the republic by Lewis the twelfth of France; Breſcia, by the right of war, was likewiſe annexed to the Milaneſe, under the Viſcontis; and Crema had voluntarily ſubmitted to Sforza, the ſucceeding duke: beſides, the five maritime cities held by the republic in Naples, proved extremely irkſome to that prince, notwithſtanding he had ſolemnly renounced them, in conſideration of the aſſiſtance of the Venetians againſt the French king. e

From this view of Italy we ſee another cauſe of the formidable league now formed. Italy was divided among ſix different princes and ſtates, viz. the pope, the king of France as duke of Milan, the king of Arragon and Naples, the republics of Venice and Florence, and the duke of Ferrara; this latter deriving his ſecurity from the mutual jealouſy of the Venetians and the holy ſee. To theſe may be added the emperor Maximilian, who without poſſeſſing an inch of ground in Italy, laid claim to all that belonged to his anceſtors, and more particularly to the Venetian dominions on the continent. Thus did ſeven powers imagine themſelves intereſted in a partition of the territory of the republic, and of conſequence in her deſtruction. Maximilian was eager to poſſeſs ſome place which would ſecure him an entrance into Italy, in order to re-eſtabliſh the imperial power. Julius the ſecond, as we have obſerved, had formed the project of reuniting to the church the places diſmembered from it; a deſign which could not be compaſſed without the ruin of the republic, ever attentive to oppoſe the aggrandizement of her neighbours. Lewis the twelfth repented his having ceded the Cremoneſe and Ghiaradadda, carefully watching an opportunity to reclaim thoſe places, as well as the Bergameſe, Breſcian, and whatever formerly appertained to the dutchy of Milan. Ferdinand of Naples, without having money to pay for them, was deſirous of getting theſe five maritime towns out of the hands of the republic; the duke of Ferrara longed to recover Rovigo and the Poleſin; and laſtly, the Florentines, incenſed at the aſſiſtance the Venetians f g a tians had afforded to Pisa, joined with pleasure in a league which was likely to give them the dominion of this city, and at least deprive it of the aid of Venice (A).

THESE were the true motives of the league concluded at Cambray. Cardinal Amboise, and Margaret of Austria, governess of the Netherlands, met to settle preliminaries. She was invested by Maximilian with full powers to finish a treaty, upon such conditions as she thought proper. Margaret and the cardinal struck up a league to the following effect [f], that the pope, the emperor, and the kings of France and Arragon, should mutually aid and assist each other for the recovery of all those places usurped by the Venetians: that Ravenna, Cervia, Rimini, Faenza, and the other towns of Flaminia, should belong to the pope; that Verona, Padua, Vicenza, the Trevisan, Friuli, and all the country bordering on b the Adriatic should be restored to Maximilian; that the Brescian, the Bergamese, Cremonese, Crema, Ghiaradadda, and all the ancient dependencies of Milan should be ceded to France; and that Ferdinand of Arragon should have the towns of Apulia ceded to the Venetians by the late alliance. It was farther stipulated, that their armies should take the field in April; and, to obviate the difficulty of the truce for three years, which the emperor had concluded with the republic, that the pope should summon him as protector of the church, to his assistance; that in the mean time the other three powers should attack the Venetians with all their forces, the pope all the while thundering out anathemas and excommunications against them, if they refused to restore what they had unjustly usurped. It was farther agreed, that the kings of England and Hungary, the dukes of Savoy and Ferrara, together with the marquis c of Mantua, should be invited to join in this alliance; that during the course of this war, the emperor, or his son the prince of Spain, should in no shape molest the king of Arragon, touching the pretensions of the young prince to Castile in the right of his mother; that Maximilian should grant a new investiture to Lewis of the dutchy of Milan, comprehending all the above-mentioned dependencies; that if the republic should have recourse for assistance to the Turks, in this case the allies should redouble their efforts, and esteem the present confederacy a league against infidels; that no party should conclude either truce or peace without the joint consent of all the allies; and lastly, that no differences between the emperor and Ferdinand might arise to disturb this alliance, arbiters were chosen amicably to determine their disputes [g] (B).

Conditions of the league.

d THUS was the league of Cambray concluded, the most formidable confederacy Europe had ever beheld, and kept so secretly that the senate had not the least suspicion of the impending storm. Cardinal Bembo relates, that the Venetian ambassador in France asked the king the purport of that long congress at Cambray, and received for answer the most solemn assurances that nothing was intended against the republic, for whom he had the sincerest esteem; an answer which the minister reported to the senate, and by that means confirmed their security.

POPE Julius, in the mean time weighing with himself the consequences of this league, and the probability that it might establish in Italy a power more formidable to the papal authority than the Venetian, began to enter upon measures for recovering the towns of Romag-
e nia, without acceding to the league [h]. For this purpose he insinuated to Bodoario, the Venetian resident at Rome, that if the senate would yield Rimini and Faenza to him, he would not only break off from the confederacy, but prevail on Maximilian to follow his example. Constantine, a French refugee, was employed to insinuate this affair to Bodoario, who tampered so artfully with the refugee, that he drew from him the whole secret, and every particular of the league, which he immediately transmitted to the senate. The pope's proposal was then debated in a full assembly, and rejected with indignation.

IN the mean time Stella, who had long resided at the emperor's court, and enjoyed his friendship, was dispatched to Maximilian to endeavour to disengage him from the alliance; but this point miscarrying, the republic thought seriously of making preparations [i].
f The French ambassador was ordered to quit the city, and Condelmere was recalled. Lewis, on his departure, either out of personal esteem or policy, presented him with a gold chain of great value, which the ambassador refused, saying, that he never accepted the favours of

(A) The Florentines, notwithstanding their acceding to the league, made no great figure: they were at that time harrassed with civil divisions, which prevented their taking part of the politics of Italy. Nor did the duke of Ferrara prove of any great use before the time that Julius, renouncing the league and breaking with Lewis, attacked his ally the duke of Ferrara.---B. l. 7.

(B) According to Bembo, Barre, and Guicciardini, the league was signed in October, 1508, though Sansovino, whose chronology we have followed in general, places it early in the spring 1509, possibly meaning the time when it was ratified by the pope, and acceded to by the king of Arragon, and the duke of Savoy.

thoſe who were enemies to Venice (C). An army of eight thouſand heavy armed cavalry, a three thouſand light horſe, and thirteen thouſand foot, was levied, two thouſand of whom were auxiliaries from Epirus. At the ſame time the ſenate iſſued orders for equipping a conſiderable fleet, both to make incurſions upon the coaſts of Naples and defend their own harbours. Andrew Bodoario was likewiſe diſpatched to England, to ſolicit ſuccours from that monarch, to prevail on him to make a deſcent on France. Bodoario had reſided long at the court of London, and was perfectly ſkilled in the Engliſh language. A treaty likewiſe was ſtruck up with four of the Swiſs cantons, in conſideration of a ſubſidy of two hundred weight in ſilver, to be paid them annually for the ſpace of ten years.

DURING theſe preparations pope Julius ratified the league with Maximilian and the French king; but with this proviſo, that he ſhould be the laſt to commence hoſtilities: the duke b of Savoy alſo acceded to the propoſals made to him, and became a confederate againſt the republic, with the flattering expectations of having the iſland of Cyprus yielded to him in the partition to be made of the Venetian dominions. Maximilian was raiſing money for the war in the Netherlands; Lewis had levied an army of five thouſand horſe and two thouſand foot, with which he entered Italy in the month of April; the king of Arragon was buſy in raiſing forces and equipping a fleet; and the pope had got together an army of ten thouſand men, rather to be ſpectators of the event than to engage in the quarrel (for ſtill he was endeavouring by negociation to procure the ceſſion of Faenza and Rimini) at the ſame time that he was playing his ſpiritual weapons againſt the republic. He began with laying the Venetians under an interdict, while the ſenate paying, as uſual, but little regard c to the thunder of the Vatican, aſſembled an army little inferior in number to the confederates, but raw and undiſciplined. Count Petellian was appointed general, Bartolemeo Alviana lieutenant-general, and Georgia Cornelio and Andrea Gritti proveditors [k] (D). Petellian was an officer of great prudence and experience, Alviana of fire and courage; their ſentiments generally claſhed, and the iſſue of the firſt engagements was unfortunate, but perfectly conſiſtent with the diſſentions of thoſe two officers. The latter accuſed the former of cowardice, while he in his turn reproached Alviana with raſhneſs and temerity. Petellian was for diſpoſing the army in ſuch a manner as to protect the frontiers and country of Ghiaradadda; Alviana propoſed carrying terror and deſolation into the Milaneſe and the enemy's country. The ſenate joined in opinion with the former, well knowing, ſays Bembo, d that nothing can withſtand the impetuoſity and firſt fury of a French army (E).

BEFORE Lewis entered Italy he ſent a herald to Venice to denounce war, and publiſhed an edict commanding all his ſubjects in the Venetian dominions to withdraw on pain of death. The ſenate oppoſed this edict by a decree, forbidding all artizans and uſeful members of ſociety to depart, under the penalty of cloſe impriſonment and confiſcation of goods and chattels. This had its effect, and preſerved to the republic a great number of valuable mechanics: leave was likewiſe granted to the German merchants to trade as uſual into their dominions, notwithſtanding the ſtate was at war with the emperor, and every ſtep and precaution taken that could poſſibly enable them to weather the terrible ſtorm impending. The French herald, leſt his menances might terrify the people, was met without the city, and e introduced into the ſenate, where he ſpoke his declaration with great bitterneſs and pride. The doge anſwered him with a compoſure and gravity that aſtoniſhed the Frenchman; he told him, that the infidelity of which their maſter accuſed the republic belonged properly to himſelf; but as the Venetians were not accuſtomed to make war with their tongues, they doubted not but the juſtice of their cauſe would furniſh them with weapons more becoming their dignity, and worthy of the perfidy of his maſter [l].

a Venetian infantry that compoſed the garriſon. The marquis of Mantua laid ſiege to Caſſel-Maggiore, which he had ſurrendered to him, and in conſequence a number of other places of leſs importance. The Venetian army advancing obliged Chaumont to repaſs the river, after which Petellian retook Treviglio before Lewis could arrive from Milan to its aſſiſtance. Both armies remained for ſome days within a ſmall diſtance of each other, Lewis deſirous of coming to a battle, and the Venetian general of avoiding one: at laſt the king finding means to cut off the communication between the Venetians, the Cremoneſe and Cremoſco, whence they were ſupplied with proviſions, forced Petellian to a motion which produced a battle. The French van attacked the rear of the Venetians where Alviana commanded, and were received with ſo much ſpirit and reſolution, that being ſoon put in confuſion, b they muſt have retreated had not the king ſent a ſtrong reinforcement to their relief. The action was now renewed with freſh vigour, Alviana performing wonders, and expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers: he placed ſix field-pieces upon an eminence, from whence they played with great ſucceſs upon the enemy; but at laſt the Venetians were oppreſſed with numbers, and conſtrained to quit the field with precipitation. Had he been properly ſeconded by Petellian, it is more than probable, Alviana would have been victorious, notwithſtanding Lewis and his troops behaved with great courage; a wound he received, which diſabled him, and occaſioned his falling into the enemy's hands, was another cauſe of the defeat of the Venetian army [m], whoſe loſs on this occaſion amounted to five thouſand men, which was nearly equalled by that of the enemy.

c THOUGH this victory was glorious to Lewis, and attended with important conſequences, yet was it by no means general, as Petellian and the greater part of the Venetian army was not engaged, that old general retiring in good order, and imagining he had diſcharged his whole duty in rigidly following the ſenate's directions to avoid a battle, though by ſuccouring his lieutenant, he might have gained a complete victory; and, indeed, his conduct was greatly applauded at Venice, where he was regarded as a ſecond Fabius in caution and wiſdom [n].

AFTER this battle, fought on the fourteenth of May 1509, Lewis marched to Caravaggio, which he took by capitulation, and ſoon after received the ſubmiſſion of Breſcia (F) and Bergamo. The rapidity of his conqueſts made the ſenate try once more to effect a re- The ſenate makes propoſals to the pope and emperor.
d conciliation with the pope and emperor: they wrote to the cardinals Grimani and Cornari, both Venetians at Rome, to offer his holineſs the ceſſion of Faenza and Rimini. Propoſals equally advantageous were made to the emperor, the ſenate having commiſſioned Antonio Juſtiniano to inform him, that they would ſurrender Trieſte, Portonovo, and all the places taken from him the preceding year, and acknowledge his ſovereignty in Friuli, Lombardy, and the country anciently called Venetia. The emperor would hear of no terms, and the pope recovered Faenza, Ravenna, and the other towns to which he laid claim, in conſequence of the late victory; ſo that the republic was forced to redouble her endeavours to proſecute the war. Loretano, the doge, ſent a meſſage to Paolo Barbo, a procurator of St. Mark's who, by reaſon of his age, had not attended the ſenate for a great number of years, to e come and aſſiſt them with his advice. Accordingly the good old patriot, calling for his ſenatorial robes, was conveyed into the ſenate, and no ſooner ſet down than he ſpoke to this effect: 'Though infirm in body and mind he immediately obeyed the ſummons of 'his prince and country, to lend them all the ſmall help in his power, and offer ſuch ad-'vice as the ſituation of affairs would admit; but, ſays he, through ſo thick a cloud of 'misfortunes what human eye can pretend to penetrate? The circumſtances of the ſtate 'are really lamentable; broken and exhauſted, where can it look round for ſuccour! Yet 'there is an immortal and juſt God, the avenger of perfidy and broken vows; him nei-'ther the arms of men can terrify, nor cunning deceive: his providence has often relieved 'us under our moſt preſſing afflictions, and will not fail ſtill to do ſo while we confide in raiſing ſupplies [o]: but the progreſs of the French conqueſts confounded the wiſeſt reſolutions of the ſenate, all the provinces and towns ſtipulated by the treaty of Cambray to belong to the king and the holy ſee being already reduced (G). The Poleſin was yielded to the duke of Ferrara; the towns of Azole and Lunet to the marquis of Mantua; and the emperor's army, commanded by the duke of Brunſwic, was in the very heart of Friuli, after having reduced the cities Trieſte, Feltre, and Belluni. Beſides theſe loſſes, the republic ſuſtained others from new enemies, each of whom hoped to profit by her misfortunes and ſhare in the ſpoils. The earl of Sodron had ſeized upon certain caſtles and towns, contiguous and convenient for him; and the biſhop of Trente reduced Riva di Trente and Agreſta, to which he had no other pretenſions than what opportunity afforded. Padua and Treviſo alone remained firm to the republic in her diſtreſs: the former raiſed the ſum of ſixty pounds weight of gold for the payment of the army; the other, though abandoned by the Venetion garriſon, drove out the emperor's commiſſioner, and again erected the Venetian ſtandard: however, theſe inſtances of fidelity were ſo rare, that the ſenate had once thoughts of entirely abandoning the continent, imagining that by this meaſure only they could preſerve the city [p].

(F) We know not how to reconcile this fact, aſſerted by all the other hiſtorians, with what Bembo relates of the fidelity and public ſpirit of the Breſcians, and the defeat of the French at Caravaggio (1). Guicciardini (2), Baronius (3), Mariana (4), and Barre (5), aſſert, that thoſe places ſurrendered to Lewis after a ſhort reſiſtance. Bembo, on the contrary, takes no notice of the ſiege of Breſcia till the following year: he even ſays, that the Breſcians raiſed an army at their own expence, of ſix thouſand men; and that Lodovico Avagori alone levied a troop of ſix hundred horſe, an example which was ſoon followed by Verona. As to Caravaggio, he mentions the ſiege, and ſays the French were ſhamefully repulſed. It is poſſible that he relates this of the reſiſtance it made to Chaumont; though other hiſtorians ſay, that he repaſſed the Adda after he took Treviglio; and that the Breſcians might have raiſed this army before the battle.

But nobler reſolutions ſoon took place of theſe gloomy reflections. Orders were iſſued for fortifying the city; engineers were appointed to examine the places where forts and outworks were requiſite; batteries were erected at all the fords; a militia was raiſed, and fleet equipped, for the ſafety of Venice: magazines were formed, and every precaution taken as if a ſiege was expected. Nor indeed was the conjecture ill founded; for Maximilian had actually propoſed to inveſt the city, but was forced to lay aſide the deſign, on account of Ferdinand's refuſal to ſuccour him with a fleet [q]. He then directed the prince of Brunſwic to lay ſiege to Padua: ſome hiſtorians alledge that he led the army thither in perſon. This city was inveſted by an army of forty thouſand horſe and foot: the trenches were ſoon opened, the batteries began to play with great fury, and ſeveral breaches were made in the walls, which the Imperialiſts ſtormed, but always with little ſucceſs. Petellian commanded in the city, and the Paduans were even emulous of diſtinguiſhing themſelves in the ſervice of the republic. The enemy were repulſed in every aſſault with great loſs; but ſtill continuing their reſolution either to periſh or ſubdue the city, Petellian aſſembled the inhabitants, and after animating and exhorting them to perſeverance, received an oath of eternal fidelity to the republic. The emperor having placed a battery of cannon of enormous weight againſt the baſtion of Codolonga, continued to play upon it for nine ſucceſſive days without intermiſſion: having at laſt effected a breach, orders were given to a ſtrong body of choice troops for ſtorming. They were obeyed, and the breach mounted with great reſolution, and defended with equal courage. The engagement was long and bloody, when at length the Imperialiſts were totally routed, with prodigious ſlaughter, and the loſs of many priſoners of the firſt diſtinction: upon this the emperor, deſpairing of ſucceſs, raiſed the ſiege with precipitation, and retired to Rimini, after he had lain twenty days before Padua [r].

Stormed, and the ſiege raiſed.

This happy event inſpired the republic with courage; it was the firſt they had experienced during the war; but it ſufficiently proved what courage was able to effect, and that the enemy was not invincible. Maximilian's return into Germany, and ſome growing differences between the pope and Lewis the twelfth increaſed their reviving hopes: his holineſs had never heartily eſpouſed the league, and above all things dreaded the extenſion of the French dominions in Italy: he now acquired, by a ſudden revolution of affairs, the patrimony of the church which he claimed; and this point gained, his enmity to the republic ceaſed: he would even have repealed the interdict, had not the ambaſſadors of France and Arragon ſtrongly inſiſted upon the performance of his engagements [s].

In the mean time the Venetians, willing to make the moſt of the diſſentions among the confederates, ſent the proveditor Gritti with a body of forces to Vicenza, upon ſome aſſurances that the citizens were deſirous of the Venetian government. Gritti was immediately admitted into the city, to the great joy of all the inhabitants, who compelled the prince of Anhalt to retire with the garriſon into the citadel, which likewiſe, after a ſiege of four days, was ſurrendered: their fleet at the ſame time entering the Po, ſcoured the enemy's country on both ſides as far as the lake of Sourra.

(G) A circumſtance, atteſted by all the hiſtorians, reflects great honour on the Venetians. a with civil disturbances. The people exclaimed loudly against the senate for having so easily quitted towns, won to the republic by the blood of their ancestors: they said, that if some towns had been terrified out of their allegiance, and others subdued by force of arms, that was no reason for abandoning others which were able and willing to withstand the enemy. Verona was no less firm to the Venetians than Padua had shewn itself; but, deserted by the garrison, the inhabitants esteemed it an act of obedience to the republic to submit to the emperor. They were mistaken, the people said, who imagined the enemy were to be appeased by humility, which only encreased their insolence; and having easily gained a part, were by that induced to seek the conquest of the whole republic: but if some places were yielded to Lewis in consequence of his victory, and on account of the power and strength b of his army, how came others to be surrendered to the emperor and the pope, before they had struck one blow? Or, how came overtures to this effect to be made to them, who were as impotent in their friendship as they were contemptible in their enmity [t]?

To these and other complaints the senate answered, that, like prudent mariners in danger of shipwreck, they had lightened the ship of part of her cargo with a view to preserve the remainder and their lives; that such towns only were ceded as by reason of their distance could not be defended; that they were tubs thrown out to the whale, to stop the progress of an enemy they were unable with their broken forces to resist; and that the event had plainly proved the wisdom of such measures, since the pope's ambition being gratified, there was more than a probability he might soon be gained. These incipient c disputes might have risen to a dangerous heighth, if some lucky strokes of fortune had not intervened and put the people in a good humour. Bassiana, Feltre, and some other places were recovered, and their army marched to reduce the Polesin, which in a short time it effected: the Venetians then separated in three divisions, for the greater security of the towns A. D. 1510. in their possession; for Chaumont had advanced to Vincenza with a strong detachment. The duke of Ferrara was in the utmost distress, being cooped up on all sides by the Venetian fleet and army; but the arrival of Chaumont relieved and inspirited him. An attack was made Siege of Ferrara raised. with such vigiour on the fleet, that, unable to withstand the enemy's efforts, the Venetians were put in confusion, and the admiral Trevisano obliged to save himself in a skiff [u].

THUS ended the siege of Ferrara, after it had been successfully pushed for near a month, d and the city on the point of surrendering. Loretto soon fell into the enemy's hands; and Padua, owing to the differences among the leading citizens, surrendered to the emperor, with- Padua surrenders to the emperor. out the formality of a siege, after it had withstood his utmost efforts. Some proposals for a truce were now made to the Venetians by Maximilian; and the emperor having obtained what he at first demanded, would have gladly ended a war which his finances could not support: but the Austrian pride subdued all his policy, and made him insist on terms too arrogant for the republic to grant even in her state of humiliation. The pope was disappointed that the treaty with him was broke off; for, jealous of the French, he had formed a scheme to join the Venetians, if the republic would have rid herself of so formidable an enemy as Maximilian [w]. Ever true to his own interest, Julius had no regard to public faith, or pri- e vate honour. Ambition and avarice were his predominant passions; in which all the others, together with justice, truth, and virtue, were absorbed.

IN the mean while the senate formed a project for the recovery of Padua, which was conducted with so much address, that it succeeded beyond expectation, and even probability. The resolution was taken, after long and warm debates in the senate, to send Gritti with an army thither, and rely upon the affections of the inhabitants, who by this time were probably tired of the imperial yoke. Some alledged such an attempt would, in all probability, terminate only in increasing the emperor's indignation, and more closely uniting him with his allies, already too powerful: that if the attempt succeeded, the republic could not long expect to retain the conquest, since, without doubt, the allies would employ all their f strength to recover a place so necessary to their farther schemes. The doge and majority were of this opinion, which was opposed by the nobler resolution of Molini and several other senators: they affirmed that the republic would be wanting to itself, if it omitted any opportunity of recovering those cities so unjustly taken from them; that the apprehensions of rousing the enemy, and heightening their resentment, were vain, since they were actuated more by views of ambition and interest than of pique; that at all events the senate was using the means, and whatever the issue might prove, they could not fail of the applause of their own hearts, in having pursued measures worthy of the honour, the dignity of the commonwealth, and of the memory of their ancestors. "I am not, says Molini, "so much terrified by the prodigious power of the confederacy formed against us; cir- g "cumstances of a similar nature have happened to all flourishing states: but it grieves me

zeal and force of argument, that the ſenate was unanimous in attempting the recovery of Padua. A decree was immediately paſſed for giving Gritti ample powers to tranſact this delicate buſineſs; and that nothing, in the mean time, might tranſpire which could fruſ-trate the attempt, they all bound themſelves over to ſecrecy by a ſolemn oath [x].

GRITTI marched in the night towards Padua; and having conveyed ſome choice troops into waggons covered with ſtraw, by their means, and under pretence they were a convoy of proviſions, he ſeized upon a gate of the city, and purſuing his advantage, got poſſeſſion Padua recovered. of Padua. The Imperialiſts made a vigorous defence; but Gritti, joined by the greater part of the inhabitants, totally defeated them, making near two thouſand priſoners. Thus, by the advice of Molini, and addreſs of Gritti, the republic beeame once more poſſeſſed of e the moſt valuable city, on account of its vicinity, ſhe had upon the continent. The recovery of Padua was attended with all the happy conſequences which Molini had predicted:
the public clamour was appeaſed, and the pope, obſerving that the republic was not to be terrified by the power of the league, relaxed his ſeverity, and regarded the Venetians as the only barrier againſt the power of France. The firſt favourable ſtep his holineſs took was to grant the republic abſolution. Maximilian and Lewis laboured hard to divert him from this purpoſe; but it was neceſſary to the plan formed, and nothing could induce Julius to deviate from what he eſteemed his intereſt. He even proceeded farther: he permitted his ſubjects to enliſt in the Venetian ſervice; he granted Paul Baillon leave to command their army, in the room of Petellian deceaſed; he uſed all his influence in an in- f direct manner to induce Maximilian to quit the league; he laboured to prevail upon the Engliſh to declare war againſt France; and laſtly, he drew off the Swiſs from their alliance with Lewis, and even concluded a treaty between them and the Venetians. In this manner, and from a few ſpirited ſtrokes, did the face of affairs receive a total and favourable alteration [y].

THE Venetians being tempted by their good fortune at Padua to make a ſimilar attempt on Verona, where they were alſo invited by the inhabitants, marched thither with great expedition and ſecrecy: but the ladders they applied to the walls being too ſhort, they were diſcovered, and the enterprize fruſtrated, to the utter deſtruction of many of the principal citizens, who, upon ſuſpicion, were put to death by the governor [z]. This accident g did not put a ſtop to the treaty negotiating between Julius and the republic, which at length

a was concluded on these conditions, viz. That the Venetians would cede their claim to the cities of Romagnia to his holiness; that they would renounce their right of placing a magistrate, whom they called Bisdemino, in Ferrara; and that they would permit a free navigation to the subjects of the see in the gulph of Venice. Treaty between the pope and Venetians.

INTELLIGENCE of this treaty coming to Lewis and Maximilian, they charged the pontiff with a breach of the league of Cambray; in which it was stipulated, that none of the parties should make peace with the republic but with the joint consent of his allies, and until all were reinstated in their possessions usurped by the Venetians. In short, they pressed him so hard, that unable to deny the fact, he had recourse to equivocations, and other arts in which he was perfectly well versed; and at last promised to adhere to the articles of the b treaty. But the performance of this agreement was very wide of his intentions: he had two grand projects in view, each of them diametrically opposite to the interest of those two monarchs. The first was to invade the dutchy of Ferrara, and the second to drive both Lewis and Maximilian out of Italy. This was the object of his late treaty with the republic; but he found her strength, united to his own, unequal to the enterprize, which made him labour to engage other powers in his interest; and conclude the treaty we have mentioned with the Swiss. He left nothing untried to induce the Venetians to come to a peace, upon any terms, with Maximilian, even at the expence of the Trevisan and Padua. He wrote to the senate, that no other means remained to expel the French out of Italy, but detaching them from the house of Austria; this once effected, it would be no difficult mat- c ter to recover the Trevisan and Padua from the emperor: in a word, he offered his mediation, and was accepted [a].

A CONGRESS was appointed at Scalà, to attend which Julius sent the bishop of Perusia, an artful prelate whom he had employed in a variety of intrigues. The Venetians offered to reimburse the emperor in the expences of the war: the sum was immense, and they doubted not but the poverty and avarice of Maximilian would gladly embrace the proposal. Their conjecture was well founded, but the event turned out different from their expectations from an unforeseen accident. Maximilian in his return to Germany, to attend the diet at Augsburg, was grosly insulted by the Venetian peasants: some rustic jokes on his poverty so highly incensed him, that he vowed revenge, and to return the following spring. d Deaf to his wants and his passion for money, he sent positive orders to the bishop of Gurtz, his plenipotentiary at the congress, to accept of no terms less considerable than the entire cession of Padua, Vicenza, and the Trevisan, together with a reimbursement of the expences of the war. The bishop obeyed his orders, and the congress was dissolved [b]. Congress for a peace.

JULIUS sent a nuncio, and the Venetians certain agents privately to attend the nuncio, to the diet, which sat in January. Their intrigues and opposition drew out the deliberations of this assembly to a great length, though in the end they could not prevent the states of Germany from concurring with the emperor's design to establish in Italy the ancient authority of the empire. The emperor was warmly supported by Helian, plenipotentiary from Lewis the twelfth. This minister spoke in the assembly with great vehemence; he pro- e nounced against the Venetians a discourse full of fire and spirit, stamped with the marks of genius and erudition, rather than of truth. He laid before them the designs and artifices the republic had employed to possess herself of the dominion of Italy; he recited the different provinces usurped from other princes by the Venetians; he spoke of their usual ceremony of espousing the sea as an instance of their folly, arrogance, and presumption; he gave a long detail of their piracies on the ocean, and cruelty on the continent: he reminded the diet of their conduct to Mahomet the second; of their pride and haughtiness to the unfortunate Paleologus; their opposition to the holy league formed against the Turks by Pius the second; their treason against Christendom, in sending engineers and gunners to the king of Calicut, and persuading the Dutch to attack the Portuguese in the gulph of Persia (A). f He told Maximilian, that unless he crushed that venomous serpent before she recovered the late blow, she would insinuate a poison into the empire, which would be the destruction of him and his successors; concluding this bitter invective with an earnest intreaty, that his Imperial majesty and the circles of the empire would unite to exterminate this odious republic. Enraged at the bitterness of this harangue, the nuncio was going to reply, when, unfortunately dropping some expressions severely reflecting upon Maximilian and Lewis, a

(A) The reader will here observe a palpable anachronism, which we have inserted as we have found it in the Spanish, French, and German historians. Yet it is obvious that the Dutch had no knowledge of any part of India till the latter part of the reign of Charles the fifth; nor was their company established for fourscore years after the diet of Augsburg, or a trade opened to the East Indies, before the oppression of the Netherlands by Philip the second.

A. D. 1511. The pope breaks the league.

JULIUS, incenſed at the affront given himſelf in the perſon of his nuncio, immediately vented his ſpleen againſt the duke of Ferrara, the friend and ally of Lewis: a conduct that greatly perplexed the French monarch, who was deſirous of keeping fair with the church. The Venetians turned this humour of his holineſs to the advantage of the republic; they recovered, during the incurſions of the pope's army into the territories of Ferrara, the towns of Æſte, Monſcleſia, Montagnana, Maroſtia, Baſſano, and ſeveral other places. They laid ſiege to Verona, and were upon the point of carrying it, when Chaumont, with a ſuperior army, arrived to its relief, and obliged them to retreat: however, they found means even in b their flight to reduce Orzola. Their fleet joined the pope's, to make an attempt upon Genoa; but returned without executing their deſign, upon finding the city prepared to receive them, and that no encouragement was given by the malecontents.

Declares war on Lewis and the duke of Ferrara.

In the mean time Maximilian was uſing all his influence to prevail on Ladiſlaus king of Hungary, to declare war upon the Venetians; but all he could procure were ſome menaces and a ſlender body of Hungarian auxiliaries. Julius kept no terms with the king of France; he even declared war againſt him, which obliged Lewis to unite himſelf more cloſely with Maximilian, and conſult his clergy how far it was allowable to repel the inſults of the pontiff. The clergy were unanimous, that if St. Peter, inſtead of his repreſentative, were to attack the temporal rights of chriſtian princes, they might in conſcience defend themſelves. Upon c this Lewis renewed the pragmatic ſanction; an example followed by Maximilian, who carried his views to the papal chair, the depoſition of Julius, and ſucceſſion to the papal dignity (B). Julius, not daunted with the chimerical projects of the emperor, purſued his reſentment againſt France, in the perſon of the duke of Ferrara: he ordered his fleet to join the Venetians, and in conjunction to inveſt Ferrara on the ſide of the Po, while his army laid ſiege to it by land: but the duke's brave conduct fruſtrated the deſign, the fleet being twice defeated with conſiderable loſs to the Venetians, who ſtood the brunt of the action, while the pope's fleet retired into a place of ſecurity [d].

The Venetian fleet and the pope's army inveſt Ferrara.

The Venetians were likewiſe diſappointed in a project formed againſt Breſcia, which was diſcovered before it was ripe for execution: but they were more ſucceſsful before Concorda d and Mirandola, where they acted jointly with the pope's forces. The firſt place ſtood a ſiege of a few days only; but the laſt being well provided with every neceſſary, made a brave defence. His holineſs, thinking his preſence might animate the troops, entered the trenches, contrary to the remonſtrances of the cardinals, and even of the Venetian officers, who could not help bluſhing to ſee the head of God's church preſide at a ſiege, and view the effuſion of human blood ſacrificed to his ambition: indeed, he neglected nothing which could forward the works, or diſtreſs the beſieged. At laſt a breach was effected, upon which the garriſon hung out a flag of truce, and ſent commiſſioners to his holineſs with offers to ſubmit if he would only ſpare their lives; a requeſt he was with difficulty prevailed upon to grant [e]. e

The pope commands in perſon.

About this time a cartel was ſettled, and an exchange of priſoners made between the French and Venetians, in which the numbers appeared pretty equal, as likewiſe did their reciprocal complaints of hard uſage and cruelty. Treviſano the admiral, who commanded their fleet upon the Po, was baniſhed for three years on account of his miſconduct (C). He would have met with more ſevere puniſhment, ſays Bembo, had not the friends of other officers who likewiſe miſbehaved, zealouſly exerted themſelves in his behalf, fearing leſt the inquiry might become general. This year likewiſe an edict of the ſenate paſſed for recalling all perſons outlawed on account of murder or other crimes, on this condition, that they

a purchaſed their pardon by a future regular conduct, and by ſerving the ſtate for ſix months at their own expence. Another law paſſed for raiſing the ſupplies by a tax on all who received daily, monthly, and annual penſions and pay, for mechanical ſervices to the ſtate: this was regulated in the proportion of a tenth of every man's income, if it exceeded a ſum ſpecified in the law. The council of ten paſſed a decree, entitling every citizen, who ſhould pay twenty pounds weight of gold into the treaſury, to the privileges of a ſenator for one year, except that of voting. This money might, after a time ſpecified in the act, be applied after their death to the payment of their debts, and other ſuch occaſions, ſo that it might be looked upon as a kind of loan to the public [f]. The decemvirs enacted another law, which was afterwards extended, viz. That no citizen whoſe ſon, bro-
b ther, nephew, or near relation was an eccleſiaſtic, ſhould be admitted into the ſenate when affairs which related to the pope and the church were debated. The intention of this law was to prevent the actions of the ſenate from being carried to the pope by thoſe who might, in hopes of preferment, be induced to betray the ſecrets of their country. Bembo ſays, that this law was repealed the next year, but we find it afterwards renewed.

EARLY this year a freſh attempt was made upon Genoa, at the inſtigation of the pope. It proved equally unſucceſsful with the former, and in its conſequences more unfortunate; for the Venetian fleet was in its return greatly damaged by a ſtorm, though none of the ſhips periſhed. Verona was alſo beſieged in form; but before a breach large enough to ſtorm the city could be effected, the garriſon was relieved by a ſtrong detachment from Trivulcio's c army, under the conduct of Gaſton de Foix, who ſoon after made priſoners of three hundred Venetian horſe [g].

TRIVULCIO in the mean time advanced to Bologna, where Julius then was. The French had a ſtrong party in the city, headed by the Bentivoglios, which induced Trivulcio to attempt the ſiege, and put the pope in great conſternation for its ſafety. Determined to do every thing in his power for the defence of Bologna, he ſent repeated orders to his general to come directly hither with his army, and, if poſſible, to gain a march upon Trivulcio. At the ſame time he aſſembled the chief citizens, reminding them of his kindneſs, exhorted, intreated, and animated them to a defence of their liberty, and the intereſt of the church. He was anſwered with aſſurances of zeal and affection for his perſon and the holy ſee;
d upon which he retired to Ravenna, not caring to hazard the iſſue of a ſiege, and fully perſuaded that the Bologneſe would be ſufficiently powerful to reſiſt Trivulcio. But he was no ſooner gone than they began to waver in their fidelity; ſome eſpouſed the cauſe of the Bentivoglios, who were in the intereſt of the French; others again continued attached to the church, and thus, before the arrival of the enemy, the city was almoſt deſtroyed by the civil diviſions of its own citizens. The cardinal Pavia, who was left governor, terrified at thoſe civil commotions, endeavoured to introduce a thouſand Venetian infantry into the city for his own defence, and to reinforce the pope's garriſon, which conſiſted of no more than three hundred light horſe and two thouſand foot; but being warmly oppoſed by the greater part of the inhabitants, he deſerted his government. Immediately the Bentivoglio faction
e took arms, ſeized upon the gates, ſent for the Bentivoglios, and introduced them with ſeveral troops of French horſe into the city: the Venetians, with great difficulty, made their eſcape by the paſſes through the mountains of Romagnia, leaving their cannon and baggage to the enemy [h].

INTELLIGENCE of the ſurrender of Bologna being received at Venice, orders were inſtantly ſent to Gritti, who was on the point of marching, to lay ſiege to Legnano, to drop that enterprize, to ſend the artillery on the Po with a detachment for the ſecurity of Padua, and to be watchful of the preſervation of the other towns and cities belonging to the republic; diſtributing his army in ſuch a manner, as to avoid ſurprize, and at the ſame time protect their dominions [i].

f MAXIMILIAN was all this time equally deſirous of revenging the late inſults of the Venetian peaſants, and irreſolute about the manner of proceeding. The expences of the war were great, and the means of continuing it afforded him by the diet but ſlender. After advancing to Rovero with his army he again returned to Trent, and there conferred with the Venetian commiſſioners, but without any intention of coming to a concluſion with them. The count de Palice, the general, was not idle; he took Caſſelnuovo, and then entering Friuli, almoſt reduced the whole province before the Venetian army arrived. At the approach of Baillon he retired to the Milaneſe, and was no ſooner gone, than the Venetians robbed him of all his conqueſts (D).

A. D. 1512. Treaty between the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians.

In this manner ſtood affairs in Italy when Julius, by his intrigues, drew over the king of Arragon to his party, and prevailed upon him to ſign a treaty with him and the Venetians for their defence. The profeſſed intention of this alliance was to preſerve the unity of the church; exterminate the acts of the council of Piſa; recover the Bologneſe, Ferrara, and all the other pretended patrimony of the church; oppoſe all enemies to theſe reſolutions, leaving room for the emperor to engage in the alliance if he choſe it; and finally, to defend Italy againſt the encroachments of all ſtrangers and foreigners whatſoever. It was ſtipulated, that the allied army ſhould conſiſt of two thouſand five hundred men at arms, three thouſand light horſe, and twenty-four thouſand foot, in certain proportions ſpecified in the treaty. They were to be commanded by Don Raymond de Cordoua, viceroy of Naples, who was to take the field early the following ſpring [k]. a b

The temporiſing conduct of Maximilian.

We have obſerved, that Maximilian was greatly offended at the return of the French army to the Milaneſe. Though he had not a man in the field, or had not performed one article of his treaty with Lewis, yet was he highly diſpleaſed that Palice did not undertake the ſiege of Treviſo, and to the full extent obey his imperial mandate. Maximilian's conduct on this occaſion verified the old ſaying, "That a man can never forgive the perſon "he has injured." He bitterly complained of Lewis, and was on the point of concluding a treaty with the kings of England and Arragon againſt France, when his natural inconſtancy ſuddenly checked his intention [l]. In the mean time the pope laboured to induce him to ſettle a truce with Venice, in order to pave the way for a treaty of alliance. While Maximilian perceived that the pope and Venetians were inferior in power to France, he paid his court to Lewis; but finding that the addreſs of Julius had engaged the courts of Spain, England, and Venice, in his quarrel, he only ſought a pretext for quarrelling with his old friend. He firſt complained that he had drawn no advantage from the league of Cambray; that the towns ſtipulated to be ceded to him were ſtill in the hands of the Venetians: he demanded that Lewis would reduce Padua, Treviſo, and the other places on the continent, to be annexed to the empire; that he would enter into a contract of marriage between Renee of France, his ſecond daughter, and the infant Ferdinand, the emperor's youngeſt ſon, and brother to the archduke Charles; that he would give her in dowry the dutchy of Burgundy, afterwards to be united to the imperial dominions; that he would conſent to have arbitrators choſen to determine the difference between the pope and France concerning the dutchy and city of Ferrara, the Bologneſe, and the validity of the council of Piſa; that the French governor of Milan (Gaſton de Foix) ſhould attack no place in Italy, or enter upon any enterprize, but with the conſent of a German prince he would ſend to Milan to preſide in the council; and laſtly, he demanded that Lewis would ſurrender all his conqueſts in Italy, the bare dutchy of Milan excepted. Propoſitions ſo extraordinary ſufficiently indicated the emperor's intention to break with Lewis: he hoped for great advantages from an alliance with the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians, eſpecially as there was a proſpect that the king of England would accede: he now earneſtly deſired to become a party in the league, and actually embraced it on no other terms than a general and vague promiſe, that the dutchy of Burgundy and Milan ſhould be given to his youngeſt ſon Ferdinand of Auſtria [m]. c c

But previous to this a variety of tranſactions paſſed in Carniola and Iſtria. Chriſtopher Fragipan, the emperor's lieutenant in Iſtria, made an attempt upon Maglia, which he hoped to terrify into ſubmiſſion: he came with a ſmall body of troops before the walls in the night, and ordering a great number of trumpets and warlike inſtruments to be ſounded, as if the town was inveſted by a numerous army, he immediately ſummoned the Venetian governor to ſurrender; but was anſwered that day-light muſt firſt diſcover his authority, upon which he thought proper to retire and conceal his weakneſs. The French likewiſe made an unſucceſsful attack upon Treviglio, from whence they were forced to retire with the beſides a body guard of about five thouſand horſe and foot). Palice took the field in May, and had no ſooner received his orders, than he acquainted the emperor with them, and intreated, that his imperial majeſty would put himſelf at the head of a corps not unworthy of his dignity either in numbers or valour. Maximilian declined the requeſt; but at the ſame time ordered him to diſlodge the Venetians from an advantageous poſt they poſſeſſed in the neighbourhood of the Veroneſe. Here they were entrenched, and their camp almoſt wholly ſurrounded by mountains and lakes. Palice knew it would be impoſſible to force them, although his army was four times their number, the Venetians not exceeding five thouſand horſe and foot, under the conduct of the brave Guy Rangone, a French refugee. He contrived therefore to cut off their proviſions, which forced Rangone to quit his ſituation, and retire towards Friuli. In his march he was attacked by the whole French army, and after a brave and obſtinate reſiſtance, defeated and made priſoner. Then it was that Palice entered Friuli, and purſued his conqueſts with extreme rapidity. Here it was that he received the emperor's commands to enter the Treviſan, and undertake the ſiege of the city, to which his ſtrength was by no means equal; and of this he informed the French king, who permitted him to retire to Milan. Upon his departure the whole province of Friuli returned to its allegiance: a circumſtance which determined Maximilian to enter upon new meaſures. Coccin. Bell. Ital. p. 159.

a loſs of ſeveral hundred men, and ſome ſuperior officers [n] (E). The Venetians were very ſucceſsful in Carniola and Iſtria, not only in foiling the enemy's attempts to extend their conqueſts, but in reducing towns to the obedience of the republic. In the latter they took Roſa, one of the emperor's beſt officers, priſoner, notwithſtanding he had with unequal numbers defended himſelf with great valour (F). Fragipane a ſecond time took the field, and with greater force attacked Maglia, but he was defeated and wounded by Andrea Curani, who engaged him in ſingle combat, both armies being ſpectators. Curani, as ſoon as he was victorious, ordered his men to attack the imperialiſts, who were already diſpirited with the diſgrace of their leader, and ſoon obliged to quit the field. Gradonico was no leſs ſucceſsful againſt the French garriſon in Cremona; for going with a ſmall party to the walls, he
b ſummoned the inhabitants to ſurrender, telling them, that unleſs they expelled the French before his army arrived, he would lay the city in aſhes; a peremptory declaration, which produced the deſired effect, and occaſioned the immediate ſurrender of the city [o] (G).

MAXIMILIAN, though he was deſirous of nothing more than being reconciled to the Venetians, and of joining in the league againſt the French king, yet he made a point of having four Venetians of diſtinction ſent to him as hoſtages for the ſincerity of the republic's performance of ſome very indefinite promiſes. The ſenate was at length prevailed upon by the pope to comply with this ridiculous demand. Bembo, indeed, alledges that the hoſtages were never ſent, nor do we find their names in any other hiſtorian [p]. Before this point was ſettled, the troops of Arragon, Venice, and the church, attacked Baſtia with great fury: the c ſiege was carried on with more art, and nearer the modern cuſtom of making approaches, than any we find related before. The garriſon made an obſtinate defence; but the walls being levelled with the ground, the allies entered and put all indiſcriminately to the ſword. It was a few days afterwards recovered by Alphonſo duke of Ferrara, and the garriſon, conſiſting of two hundred Spaniards, made priſoners [q]. At length Maximilian, with great ſecrecy, ſigned the treaty with the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians; and, the better to conceal his deſign, ſuffered his troops ſtill to remain with the French army: he likewiſe endeavoured to apologize to the French ambaſſador for permitting the Swiſs to paſs ſix thouſand troops into Italy through his dominions; this, he ſaid, was in conſequence of a treaty with them A. 1499, though in fact the interpretation of the article alluded to was falſe. The d approach of the Swiſs, the diſpoſition of the emperor, and the formidable army of the allies, obliged Lewis to offer terms of peace, which he would not have liſtened to a few months before; but they were rejected, and his army forced to ſecure itſelf in Pavia and other ſtrong towns [r].

THE ſenate, at the inſtigation of Avogari, and upon an invitation from the inhabitants, who were tired of the French yoke, and deſirous of returning into the obedience of the republic, had formed a deſign of recovering Breſcia. Avogari wrote to the council of ten, that if an army was ſent before the city, he would ſecure an entrance and take poſſeſſion of the gates, which would facilitate the reduction of the citadel. Orders were in conſequence ſent to Gritti to march thither, and appear at a certain gate of the city at an hour agreed conſtrained to ſurrender the town and citadel at diſcretion. All the inhabitants on the lake La Garda, the country adjacent, and the mountains, returned to their allegiance, and the republic once more became miſtreſs of the *Breſcian*s. In Breſcia were made priſoners above two thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; and its conqueſt was ſucceeded by other very ſignal advantages. La Palice, finding himſelf too weak to defend the Milaneſe, retired to Piſqueltana, and from thence to Pavia; while the Venetians, with the Swiſs auxiliaries, after the reduction of Valegia and Peſcara, purſued their conqueſts. Caravaggio and Soncino were taken; but inſtead of admitting the Venetians, as it was ſtipulated in the treaty, into the latter, the cardinal de Sion garriſoned it with his own forces. Bergamo and the Bergameſe, with all the towns, forts, and caſtles, upon the Adda, ſubmitted to the republic. a

At Pavia La Palice was joined by Trivulcio, but the army being entirely compoſed of cavalry, they were ſtill unable to cope with the allies, who were advancing by long marches. In their rout the confederates received the ſubmiſſion of Milan, Legnano, Parma, Placentia, and other places; and the Venetians even brought about a revolution in Genoa, from whence the French were driven. Coma, Crema, Bologna, and Pavia, were at length ſurrendered: nor did Maximilian determine to ſupport the league, although he had ſigned it, until he ſaw the French almoſt totally expelled from Italy. He urged a thouſand difficulties, and inſiſted upon high terms with the Venetians, who were then not to be terrified into conceſſions. The biſhop of Gurtz, the imperial envoy, had the addreſs to gain over Julius to his maſter's intereſt. Maximilian demanded Verona and Vincenza to be ceded in perpetuity to him, and homage done him by the Venetians for Friuli, and the places to which he pretended a prior right. He was peremptory in his demand, and the republic no leſs poſitive in her refuſal, although the pope menaced them with ſpiritual and temporal vengeance. Julius finding them obſtinate, ſtruck up a ſeparate treaty with Maximilian, and endeavoured to engage the Spaniſh ambaſſador to accede to his meaſures; but this he abſolutely denied, under pretence of having no inſtructions for that purpoſe[t]. b c

SECT VI.

Containing the Treaty with Lewis the Twelfth, and Motives which induced the Republic to this Alliance; the Progreſs of the War in Italy; the Acceſſion of Charles the Fifth and Francis the Firſt to the Imperial and French Crowns; their Rivalſhip and Renewal of the War in Italy, together with its Conſequences to the Venetians.

Venetians enter into a treaty with Lewis.

To fortify themſelves againſt this new alliance, the republic entered into a treaty, defenſive and offenſive, with Lewis the twelfth, by means of Andrea Gritti, then a priſoner in France. It was agreed that the Milaneſe, the Cremoneſe, and the country of Ghiaradadda, ſhould belong to the king, who was to cede all claim upon the Bergameſe, Breſcian, and other provinces, then in poſſeſſion of the Venetians. This treaty was to remain in full force, and the parties were mutually to aſſiſt each other with all their forces, until the Milaneſe and its dependencies were recovered by Lewis, and the Venetians reinſtated in all their former poſſeſſions on the continent. Julius, hearing that ſuch a treaty was in agitation, ſent ambaſſies and acknowledgments to Venice of his ſorrow for having broke off his alliance with the republic; but died of a ſlow fever before he had taken any meaſures to regain their confidence[u]. Thus died pope Julius the ſecond, equally deſerving of admiration and eſteem for his good ſenſe, firmneſs, erudition, and the protection he afforded to men of learning; of hatred and contempt for the ambition, avarice, cunning, and intrigue, which diſtinguiſhed his pontificate. d

French recover Breſcia.

A few months before this treaty and the pope's death, a detachment from Trivulcio's army recovered Breſcia; upon which occaſion Avogari, the ſtrenuous aſſerter of the republic's claim, was put to death. The Venetians made another attempt upon it, which proved unſucceſsful; and it was at laſt taken from the French by the Spaniſh troops a few days before the treaty between Lewis and the republic was ſigned[w].

LEO the tenth being raiſed to the pontificate, purſued the views of his predeceſſor, that of humbling the power of France; but in a manner different from Julius. He was no ſooner raiſed to the pontificate than, under pretence of acquainting Henry the eighth with his exaltation, he addreſſed a brief to him, intimating his intention to adhere to the league with the emperor and the king of Arragon, and deſire of contracting a freſh alliance with England. At the ſame time he was ſtriving to reconcile Maximilian with the republic, and to diſengage the latter from France. All thoſe practices could not long be concealed from Lewis: Leo became ſuſpected; in conſequence of which Lewis united himſelf more cloſely with the Venetians. All the endeavours of the pope could not prevail on the republic to de- f a ſert her allies: inſtead of yielding to his remonſtrances, or joining with the ſtronger party, ſhe preſſed Lewis to haſten reinforcements into Italy, in order to ſtrike ſome blow of conſequence before the enemy was prepared. Immediately twenty thouſand French under Tremouille and Trivulcio were ordered to join the Venetian army upon the frontiers of Italy. The republic's army conſiſted of eight thouſand foot, one thouſand five hundred men at arms, and five hundred light horſe, under the conduct of Bartolemeo Alviana, and the two proveditors Contareni and Loretano. Alviana determined to make an attempt upon Verona, altho' he had the ſenate's orders to paſs the river Adda: for this purpoſe he began a clandeſtine correſpondence with ſome of the inhabitants, which being diſcovered fruſtrated the enterprize: but he had the good fortune to balance this unſucceſsful attempt by the reduction of Valegia, b Peſcara, and Cremona[b]. In this latter he erected the enſign of France, ſaying, that he held it for Lewis: but the Venetian affairs wore a different aſpect in the Vincentine and Veroneſe. Alviana was no ſooner departed thence than Roccondolph, an imperial general, and Gonſalvo, an Arragonian, draughting ſome men from the garriſon of Verona and other towns, attacked and defeated Cavalla and Fortino, whom Alviana had left there with a body of one thouſand horſe and foot. The defeat was ſo total, that the enemy, purſuing the Venetians to Colognia, entered the town with them, made them all priſoners, and ſeized upon the garriſon. Elated with this ſucceſs, they formed an enterprize upon Vincenza, which was rendered abortive by the vigilance of the governor[c].

Venetians worſted in the Veroneſe.

c COMMOTIONS were excited in the city of Milan, and the whole Milaneſe, upon the arrival of Alviana, and intelligence that the French army had paſſed the Alps. A few months ago only they rejoiced at the expulſion of Lewis's troops and the reſtoration of the Sforzas; but not reaping the expected advantages, they now again panted after a French governor: upon this Maximilian Sforza retired to Novara, there to wait for a body of Swiſs, on their march for the defence of Milan. His departure afforded a free acceſs to the Venetians; while Trivulcio entered the Milaneſe on the other ſide, and in a ſhort ſpace intirely reduced it to obedience. Ronzo de Cera, going with a body of Venetians to Breſcia, ſummoned the city, and had it immediately put into his hands, the Spaniſh ſoldiers finding themſelves unable to ſtand a ſiege, both on account of their weakneſs, and the ſtrong affection the inhabitants ſhewed for the republic[d].

Breſcia ſurrenders to the Venetians.

d DURING this ſtate of affairs, the Swiſs were aſſembling in great numbers upon the frontiers; but the French, making light of enemies unprovided with cannon and magazines, whom they imagined they could purchaſe over with money, went and laid ſiege to Novara, inſtead of attacking the Spaniſh army, which they might have defeated before reinforcements could arrive. Gritti ſtrongly remonſtrated againſt this ſtep, and was ſeconded by the opinion of the ſenate; but it availed not; the French undertook the ſiege, trifled away ſeveral days before the walls, and were at laſt compelled to abandon the enterprize. The ſiege was no ſooner raiſed than ten thouſand Swiſs entered Novara, and there formed the reſolution of ſurpriſing the French camp, which was pitched within three leagues of the city. They ſet out in the evening, and, arriving before day-light, attacked the French ſo unexe pectedly, and with ſo much reſolution, that they were entirely broken and diſperſed[e].

THIS defeat was attended with fatal conſequences to the republic, of which the firſt inſtance was an intire revolution in Milan, and the abſolute reſtoration of the Sforzas. The viceroy of Naples marched to Cremona, with intention to attack the Venetians; but Alviana, apprehending he might be ſhut up between the Spaniſh and Swiſs armies, abandoned the Cremoneſe, retiring to the Veroneſe: here he determined to lay ſiege to Verona; and while he was thus employed, the enemy became maſters of Cremona, Breſcia, and Bergamo. The tables were now turned upon the French and Venetians, who were no leſs unfortunate towards the end, than they had been ſucceſsful in the beginning of the campaign. Alviana continued to batter Verona with great fury, and had at laſt opened a breach of forty yards, f which he ordered to be ſtormed. The defence and attack were both vigorous, and ſtrongly ſupported by both parties. As the wall was exceeding high on the town ſide, the Venetians fought to great diſadvantage on account of the depth of the deſcent; beſides, the garriſon amounted to four thouſand choice troops, Germans and Swiſs. After great loſs of blood, Alviana, perceiving that the inhabitants, as he expected, did not ſtir in his favour, ſounded a retreat. His chagrin at this diſappointment made him raiſe the ſiege, and lay waſte the whole country, in hopes thereby to excite the Veronois to a revolt[f]. But the approach of the Spaniſh army obliged him to retire beyond the river Adice, where he took every meaſure to ſtrengthen his army, and oppoſe the enemy. For the ſecurity of Treviſo he ſent a ſtrong detachment under Baillon, leading in perſon the main body towards Padua.

g IN the mean time Leo the tenth renewed the ſubject of peace between the emperor and the republic. He did not doubt but Maximilian would liſten to reaſonable terms, as by the friendſhip of the Venetians he would more eaſily procure Burgundy for his grandſon. On the other hand, he imagined, that the defeat of the French; the little probability that Lewis, who was likely to find ſufficient employment at home, could for that year ſend another army into Italy; the approach of the Spaniſh army; the lowneſs of their finances, together with the great want of ſoldiers, particularly infantry, would induce the Venetians to forſake Lewis, and be reconciled to Maximilian: but rational as theſe conjectures were, yet they fell ſhort of truth. The ſenate would hearken to no terms until Vicenza and Verona were yielded to the republic: on the contrary, they warmly ſolicited Lewis to recruit his army, aſſuring him of their fidelity, and ſincere regard for every article of the treaty. They, at the ſame time, exhorted him to a reconciliation with the pope; in which they fell in with the ſentiments of the whole French nation. Lewis promiſed aſſiſtance; but he took more immediate ſteps to gain the friendſhip of his holineſs. For this purpoſe he ſent the biſhop of Marſeilles, in quality of plenipotentiary, to Rome, inſtructing him to aſſure Leo, that he had revoked the decrees of the council of Piſa, and would permit no other than thoſe of the Lateran, to teſtify his reverence for his holineſs, for the apoſtolic ſee, and his determination to defend the church with all his power againſt all enemies whatſoever. The republic likewiſe ſent an ambaſſy of ten chief magiſtrates and ſenators, ordering their reſident at Rome to attend all the ſittings of the Lateran. But the reception they met convinced the ſenate of the pope's diſlike to the republic. He ſeverely chaſtiſed the ambaſſadors; taxed the Venetians with having brought back the French into Italy; and even inſinuated his ſuſpicion of their having formed a deſign to recover Romagnia. Inſtead therefore of affording them any marks of regard, as the ſenate expected, he ſent the emperor the body of troops ſtipulated in the treaty [g]. It was now apparent that nothing but vigour could ſave the ſtate; the republic therefore applied herſelf to levying forces, equipping a fleet, raiſing money, and forming magazines. Alviana, who was encamped on the banks of the Adice, receiving intelligence that the Spaniſh army was proceeding towards Padua, and that Colonna, after being joined by the pope's forces, was in full march to attack him, croſſed the river, and encamped at Montagno, as well for his own ſecurity as the protection of Padua and Treviſo. By this retreat the poſſeſſion of Rovigo fell into the enemies hands, together with the town of Peſcara and all the garriſon. In the mean time the biſhop of Gurtz, coming to the Spaniſh army, ſtrongly adviſed the ſiege of Padua, which, he ſaid, would be giving the Venetians a mortal blow, and ſecuring the emperor in the poſſeſſion of all the towns to which he laid claim. The viceroy, and other officers, joined with him in opinion concerning the importance of the conqueſt; but repreſenting the difficulty and hazard of beſieging a city ſo well fortified and provided: however, the biſhop perſevering in his opinion, the ſiege was undertaken. Alviana had already ſent his baggage and artillery to Padua, that he might with the greater expedition throw himſelf into the city, or Treviſo, as the ſituation of things might require; he now reſolved to enter Padua with his army, and to defend it with the laſt drop of his blood. Courage nor conduct he wanted not; but there was a fire and impetuoſity in his temper that fitted him to execute with rapidity rather than deliberate with prudence. Although the city was already ſufficiently garriſoned againſt a greater force than the enemy could bring, yet the ſenate, knowing its importance, ſent a reinforcement of new levies of Venetians and Iſtrians, together with a ſtrong convoy of ammunition and ſtores. Alviana ordered all the trees, houſes, and every thing that could ſhelter the enemy, to be cut down and razed for a mile's diſtance round the city, which rendered the approaches difficult, as they were greatly expoſed to his cannon. This circumſtance, the vigorous ſallies of the beſieged, and ſmallneſs of the enemy's army to inveſt a town of ſo great extent as Padua, made their operations ſlow, and ſhewed the officers the abſurdity of the attempt, although the biſhop ſtill adhered to his ſentiments. As they were likewiſe deſtitute of pioneers, and that a deep trench was neceſſary to ſcreen the ſoldiers from the enemy's fire, it was at laſt determined to remonſtrate to the biſhop, and if he ſtill remained obſtinate, to ſave the army, and acquaint the emperor with the circumſtances and occaſion of their conduct. Thus, after continuing twenty days before Padua, they abandoned the ſiege without erecting a battery, or firing a ſhot, and took the road of Vincenza, which was deſerted on their approach by the Venetian magiſtrates and the principal inhabitants. Here they made plunder of every thing ſacred and prophane, rather from neceſſity than any diſpoſition to rapine; for the army was entirely ſupported by plunder [h].

The ſenate reſolves to puſh the war.

The viceroy of Naples lays ſiege to Padua.

Siege of Padua raiſed.

THE viceroy permitted his troops to make incurſions even within ſight of Venice, and even took an opportunity of inſulting that capital, by ordering ſome cannon to be diſcharged at the city. Alviana, ſhut up in Padua, could no longer endure this preſumption; he ſolicited, begged, and intreated the ſenate for permiſſion to ſally out upon the enemy,

a but was denied and ordered to keep within the walls, they being determined rather to undergo affronts than to run hazards upon so critical a conjuncture. At last Alviana's pressing instances prevailed, and he had leave to take the first favourable opportunity that offered for attacking the enemy. In consequence he marched out of the city, sending to Baillon who commanded in Treviso, to join him with a reinforcement: his design was to cut off the enemy's return to Vincenza; for which purpose he seized on the avenues leading to Barberana, ordering the peasants at the same time to block up the passes to Germany with felled trees, trenches, and strong intrenchments. Alviana encamped with the main body at Olma, on the road from Vincenza to Verona, there resolving to wait for the enemy. The viceroy was come within four miles of the Venetian camp, and finding all the passes guard-
b ed, and that he was blocked up in a country destitute of every necessary for the support of an army, resolved, after a variety of consultations, to open a path by the sword. As the dangers to which they were exposed could not long be concealed from the soldiers, he thought it most adviseable to acquaint them with the circumstances, and exhort them to their duty as the only means left of safety. His discourse was so spirited and animating, that the soldiers cried out to be led against the enemy, promising to acquit themselves in a manner worthy of the troops of so brave a general. It was not, however, the viceroy's intention to attack Alviana, whose camp he knew was advantageously situated and well fortified, but to force a way by Bassana. He decamped without beat of drum, taking the advantage of a thick fog, and had marched some miles before Alviana suspected his being c in motion: upon this notice the Venetians were ordered to pursue and attack the enemy's rear, which they did with great fury, but in good order: they were received by Prospero Colonna with equal resolution, who, finding himself hard pushed, sent to the viceroy for reinforcements. The battle continued obstinate for an hour, when suddenly the Venetians were seized with a panic, put in disorder, and totally routed, in spite of all the endeavours of Alviana to rally and bring them back to the charge. All the baggage and artillery were lost, and about four thousand Venetians killed or made prisoners. Alviana himself performed miracles of valour, was every where present, animating, exhorting, and menacing his troops; but nothing was able to surmount their unaccountable terrors, by which alone they were overcome (A). So sensible was the senate of Alviana's valour, that upon d receiving news of the defeat, they sent an ambassador to console and assure him of their sense of his merit and good conduct: but their behaviour to several of the inferior officers was different, whom they cashiered and punished with other marks of infamy [i].

The Venetians defeated.

ALVIANA was no less affected with the goodness of the senate than with his defeat; but resolving, after their example, bravely to sustain a misfortune with which he could not charge himself, he took measures for securing Padua and Treviso. The doge Loretano exhibited manifold instances of firmness, intrepidity, and affection for the state. After exhorting the senate to bear up with spirit under their misfortunes, he told them, that now offered an opportunity to shew their fortitude and zeal for their country: that, for his part, he was determined to hazard his all for the defence of his people, and hoped the senate would
e make use of his private purse in the same manner they would the public treasury. It all belonged to the republic, he said, and the man who had not gratitude to return it, when wanted, deserved not to live. Nor was this all; he had two sons, he said, who could never die more gloriously than in the cause of Venice; he therefore ordered they would directly set out as volunteers to Treviso and Padua. All the senators were greatly moved with the generosity and affection of the doge, and their conduct plainly shewed what great things the example and influence of a prince can effect. A contribution for levying a new army was raised among them, which soon became general all over the city, and demonstrated that private coffers were not empty, however languid and exhausted might be the state of the treasury [k].

[i] Paolo Paruta, l. 1. Guicc. ibid. [k] Baron. ad An. 1514.

(A) Mariana acknowledges that the Venetian cavalry broke through all opposition, and totally disordered Colonna; but pushed their success too far. While they were in the pursuit, Roccondolph attacked the infantry with fresh troops. The Venetians, though greatly inferior, and tired with the former charge, received him with obstinate vigour, in expectation of being supported by the cavalry; but finding that they did not return, imagining they were deserted, a panic seized them, which not all the endeavours of the general could conquer. The same historian says, that the Venetians left upon the field four hundred men at arms, and four thousand foot and light horse; that Baillon and Loretano, the proveditors, were taken prisoners, with a great number of other officers; and that, in consequence of the victory, the citadel of Milan and Vicenza surrendered to the conquerors: in short, that the French were dispossessed of all they held in Italy (1).

(1) Marian. Hist. l. 30. p. 97, 98.

BUT the conduct of Prospero Colonna tended more to the preservation of Treviso than all a the preparations of the republic. After the late victory it was proposed by the viceroy in council that Treviso should be invested; but Colonna, beginning to apprehend danger to the ballance of power in Italy, from the ruin of the Venetian state, had influence and address enough to get this resolution procrastinated: his excuse was the difficulty of the attempt, and hazard of abandoning it with equal shame as they had done Padua. It was, therefore, determined to wait the arrival of the bishop of Gurck, and to be directed by his opinion:
this took up the space of near a month, and not only gave the Venetians time to provide for the security of the city, but rendered the attempt impracticable on account of the approach of the winter.

Negotiations set on foot by Leo.

THE rigour of the season prevented the armies from keeping the field, negociations, b therefore, were set on foot by Leo for a peace between Maximilian and the republic. Leo had it always in view to prevent Lewis from recovering the Milanese: he was no less anxious lest it should come into the hands of the house of Austria, and dreaded every overture towards a marriage between Renée of France and Charles of Austria. He even endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation between Lewis and the Swiss, in order that the king might be less inclined to accept terms from the emperor and Henry the eighth; and he wished to see the French monarch ratify that article of the treaty of Dijon which regarded the duchy of Milan: but all he could effect was to prevail on him to accept a truce for three years in reference to the Milanese; and on the cantons of Switzerland to suspend the effects of their enmity to France [l]. c

SEEING, therefore, that little could be done in this way, he turned to the side of the Venetians, and resumed the negociations between them and the emperor: he was sensible that Lewis could not be effectually excluded from the Milanese but by the assistance of the Venetians, at least not while they were in his alliance. Ferdinand, having notice of the ne-gociations with the Swiss, and fearing lest he should be left unsupported, concluded a truce

Truce between Ferdinand and Lewis.

for one year with France, in which was a secret clause, that Lewis should not attack the Milanese during the year 1514. The pope, who was ignorant of this clause, apprehended that Ferdinand might have ceded the Milanese to Lewis; in consequence, therefore, he was indefatigable in bringing about a reconciliation between Maximilian and the Venetians. By mere dint of solicitation, he wrought so far on both parties, as to consent to accede to a d cessation of hostilities for a year, in order to adjust preliminaries. Leo, by a writing under his hand, promised not to pronounce sentence but with the consent of both parties [m].

THE reconciliation, however, was equally obstructed by the breach of the truce on both sides. When the season permitted, the pretensions of each either rose or sunk according as they were successful in the field: when the Venetians were hard pressed, then would they consent to yield Verona to the emperor; but he insisted upon Padua, Treviso, and Vicenza likewise. Upon any change of fortune, the republic would hearken to no terms in which Verona was not included. Leo perceiving this, proposed that both parties should lay down their arms; that Maximilian should deposit in trust to him Vicenza, and what- e ever the Spanish army had conquered in the Trevisan and Paduan; that the republic should do the same with regard to Cremasco, and besides pay to the emperor the sum of fifty thousand crowns; but that this agreement should be void, if the principals of both parties did not ratify what their ambassadors had signed. The Venetians objected to this proposal, from a persuasion that in the present state of affairs a truce would be more prejudicial to them than the continuation of the war. Piqued at their refusal, Leo sent Colonna and Savelli to invest Crema; but Rence di Ceri, the brave governor, sallying out defeated Savelli and the pope's forces, which obliged Colonna to raise the siege and retire to Romagnia [n].

A. D. 1514.

IN the beginning of this year the senate sent an ambassador to the Grand Seignior, to pre- f vent his coming to a rupture with the republic. Their apprehensions from that quarter were soon quieted, on Selim's march into Asia against the sophi, and the war carrying on with Achmet his brother. As soon as the negociations broke off, hostilities commenced in Friuli. Alviana, after taking some towns from the emperor, instead of amusing himself with repairing the fortifications, made a forced march, and attacked the enemy's headquarters at a time when they expected he was at the distance of twenty leagues: here he revenged his defeat in the last campaign, having totally dispersed the enemy, and taken two thousand prisoners. From hence he marched against Moran, a place taken in the winter by the Germans; but this expedition was fruitless: he made several brave assaults, but the enemy was well provided, the garrison strong, and the Venetians forced to relinquish the g enterprize. Some historians say, that Alviana's rear was roughly handled in his retreat.

a Diſappointed before Moran, he yet had the good fortune to ſeize upon the traitor who had occaſioned its loſs, whom he ſent to Venice, where he was hung up by the heels until he expired.

AFTER Alviana's retreat, the Swiſs and Germans attacked and took Udina at the firſt aſ- The Swiſs take Udi- ſault, it being entirely deſtitute of a garriſon and neceſſaries. Hence they marched to Oſo- na. po, which they battered with incredible fury but little ſucceſs; upon which they determined to turn the ſiege into a blockade, hearing that the garriſon was in want of water; but this attempt was likewiſe rendered abortive by ſome heavy ſhowers of rain that ſupplied the beſieged.

THE ſenate, appriſed of the conſequence of Moran to the republic, ordered Savogarni b and the proveditor Vitturi to make a ſecond attempt. Theſe two officers marched to the ſiege with five thouſand horſe and foot, formed trenches, erected batteries, and got every thing in forwardneſs to give an aſſault, when an order of the ſenate came, that they ſhould run no hazards, or riſque the ſafety of the army. In conſequence of this, ſeveral days were loſt before the town in an irreſolute manner; during which the Swiſs and Germans aſ- Venetians defeated. ſembling, attacked the quarters of Vitturi, defeated and took him priſoner. This loſs was in ſome meaſure compenſated by Ceri, who ſallying out of Crema upon Savelli, put him to flight with conſiderable loſs, and opened the way for throwing ſuccours into the city, which had long been greatly diſtreſſed with famine and a plague. Ceri, not contented with relieving Crema, attacked and took Bergamo; but not being able to ſpare a garriſon, it was ſoon c retaken by the Spaniards. After this he went to Venice, leaving the command of the garriſon with Giovanni Urſini, where he was received with great marks of diſtinction and eſteem [o].

IN the mean time Leo X. was alarmed with Selim's return from Aſia, and his great preparations by ſea and land. Thoſe armaments, he doubted not, were intended againſt Italy; and among all the chriſtian powers, he ſaw none who could ſtop the torrent beſides the emperor and the Venetians. To make them act with vigour againſt the common enemy, it was abſolutely neceſſary to make them friends; a point he had often laboured to no purpoſe. However, he reſolved not to deſiſt from an attempt in which Italy in particular, and the liberties of Europe were intereſted. He ſent legates and nuncios to Maximilian and d Venice, to effect, if poſſible, a reconciliation. Pietro Bembo, a Venetian, then ſecretary to Leo, and the elegant hiſtorian of the republic, was appointed to negotiate this important affair. Leo knew his addreſs, and the eſteem in which he was held by the ſenate. Although Bembo was received with the utmoſt kindneſs, and had conducted himſelf with all poſſible addreſs, he could terminate nothing. The ſenate in private communicated to him their ſentiments of the propoſed alliance, and their ſuſpicions of Maximilian and Ferdinand; at the ſame time aſſuring him of their ſenſe of the goodneſs of Leo's intentions. Bembo took his leave, and found at Rome the other nuncio returned from Maximilian with as little ſucceſs [p]. On his departure the ſenate ſent ambaſſadors to Lewis the twelfth and Henry the eighth, to congratulate them on their late peace and alliance; to thank them for the favourable mention e of the republic made in the treaty; to requeſt Lewis to ſend ſuccours into Italy; and to aſſure him of their intention literally to adhere to their treaty with France. Before the Lewis the twelfth dies. arrival of the ambaſſy, Lewis died on the firſt day of January 1515.

HIS death was not attended with thoſe conſequences to the republic which were apprehended; for the duke of Valois, who ſucceeded to the crown by the name of Francis the firſt, was determined, as to the affairs of Italy, to tread in the ſteps of his predeceſſor, though he did A. D. 1515. not declare his intentions. Dandolo, the Venetian ambaſſador, was received by Francis publicly with ſtiffneſs and ceremony; but privately with great cordiality, inſomuch that the treaty was renewed, with ſome clauſes of a ſtricter amity than before. In England the mi- Francis the firſt renews the treaty with the Venetians. niſters of the republic met with equal ſucceſs, Henry aſſuring them of his friendſhip; and f that he would uſe his influence with Francis to haſten his departure for Italy [q].

THE great object of the ſenate's policy was to raiſe the ſupplies for the war they were reſolved to purſue. The treaſury was exhauſted; commerce languiſhing, and private perſons tired of contributions. A variety of ſchemes were propoſed, each of which had its difficulties, and produced warm debates. At laſt, a poll-tax in proportion to every man's property, the higheſt not exceeding three hundred crowns, was decreed, and three commiſſioners appointed to regulate and levy the money. A confiſcation of goods was the penalty annexed either to concealing property or deficiency in payment; which was found to be neceſſary, as large ſums were due to the public from the laſt aſſeſſments.

IN the mean time Francis the firſt was making great preparations. As he was a prince g of courage and ambition, the eyes of Europe were upon him, not doubting but he had formed vaſt projects. He gave out, that his intention was to chaſtiſe the Swiſs for their irruption into Burgundy in the late reign; but Maximilian and Leo ſuſpected other deſigns. Ferdinand apprehended that his preparations were deſtined againſt Navarre, and Maximilian Sforza dreaded they might tend to deprive him of Milan. As to Ferdinand, his doubts were removed when Francis demanded a prolongation of the truce between him and Lewis the twelfth, on condition that the ſecret article belonging to the Milaneſe ſhould be void. He rejected this propoſal, and made it the means of engaging Maximilian and the Swiſs cantons in a league for the defence of the Milaneſe. A treaty was accordingly concluded between Maximilian, Ferdinand, the Swiſs cantons, and Maximilian Sforza, with room left for the pontiff to accede within a limited time. Ferdinand, whoſe chief view was the defence of Navarre, engaged to make a powerful diverſion on the ſide of Fontarabia. The Swiſs were to enter Burgundy, while the emperor, by purſuing the war in the Venetian dominions, ſhould prevent their aſſiſting Francis. It was ſtipulated to pay the Swiſs forty thouſand crowns per month, and not to conclude peace with France, until the king had renounced his pretenſions upon Milan [r].

On the one ſide the Venetians endeavoured to gain over the pope, while the emperor and Ferdinand on the other repreſented to him of what importance it was to the ſecurity of the holy ſee to join againſt France. Leo was greatly embarraſſed; each ſide had its inconveniences: at laſt, ſwayed by the apprehenſions leſt Francis, being poſſeſſed of the Milaneſe, would demand the fiefs of Parma and Placentia, he chimed in with the oppoſite league; but with this proviſo, that his acceding to it might be kept ſecret. This precaution proved uſeleſs; for he was ſoon obliged to march with his cavalry towards Piedmont to block up the paſſage of the Alps againſt Francis [s]. Julian de Medicis remained with the reſt of the troops in Lombardy, ready to join the Spaniards, if neceſſary; while the cardinal of Sion arrived in the Milaneſe with twenty thouſand men he had raiſed upon his own credit, and with the pope's money. Here the Swiſs were joined by Sforza's troops, and all marched towards Suza, the head-quarters, in order to ſtop up the defiles between the mountains of Geneva and mount Ceris, which was the uſual route of the French into Italy.

FRANCIS at length ſet out with an army of twenty-three thouſand horſe and foot, ſending word to the ſenate, to prevent their general from hazarding a battle before the armies were united. He found the paſſes of Suza, Pignerole, Saluſſes, and others, guarded by the Swiſs and the pope's cavalry: upon this he paſſed directly over the Alps, through unfrequented and difficult paths, and on the fourth day's march arrived on the frontiers of the marquiſate of Saluſſes. The Swiſs, ſeeing that Francis had eluded all their vigilance, retired to Novara, where the king followed and made propoſals extremely advantageous to thoſe auxiliaries; which they were inclined to accept, as the allies had but badly performed their engagements. Some of the ſoldiers had mutinied for want of pay, others deſerted, and the majority thought fit to recompenſe themſelves by ſeizing on the pope's military cheſt. The treaty was in great forwardneſs, when news arrived that twenty thouſand of their countrymen were on full march to join the army, having with them money ſufficient for the payment of all their arrears [t]. This intelligence determined them to break off the conferences with the French king, to adhere to their alliance, and give battle to Francis. Before the king arrived at Marignan he ſurpriſed Proſpero Colonna, who was encamped with two thouſand men in the marquiſate of Saluſſes: after this he pitched his camp at Marignan, to facilitate a junction with Alviana. The Swiſs, knowing it was their buſineſs to fight before he was reinforced, broke up their camp without beat of drum, and in the moſt profound ſilence marched with this view, thinking to ſurpriſe the enemy. Alviana, who had come to the camp to concert the operations of the campaign, was at dinner with his majeſty when the conſtable of Bourbon entered the tent, and informed them that the Swiſs army was in ſight. Alviana mounted his horſe and flew to Lodi, to bring up ſome of the Venetian cavalry. The king had ſcarce time to range his army in order of battle when the attack began upon the artillery, defended by the Lanſquenets [u] (B). Already the conſtable

(B) The Lanſquenets are Germans, of which Francis had ten thouſand in his army; a circumſtance that muſt ſtrike the reader when he conſiders that the emperor was at war with France: but the princes of the empire and imperial towns have the privilege of permitting foreign potentates to levy troops in their territories. They may contract alliances and aſſiſt them with all their forces, provided ſuch alliance be not prejudicial to the Germanic body, of which the emperor is head, but not abſolute ſovereign (1). It is cuſtomary too in France that the Lanſquenets, in default of Swiſs, have the guard of the artillery, a poſt of the utmoſt conſequence; the reaſon is, that they look upon the Swiſs as the beſt infantry in Europe, and next to them the Germans, of which the Lanſquenets form a part. The reader who is curious, may conſult on theſe points Hiſtoire de la Milice Francoiſe, t. 3. p. 532. *Ord. had drawn up the advanced guard, which he commanded in perſon, and the German ina fantry, for the defence of the artillery, when the Swiſs, by the advice of colonel Rhoſt, marched ſtraight up to the cannon, bearing the fire both of the artillery and infantry, to avoid being taken in flank by the French cavalry poſted on the wings. Their intention was to make the firſt and principal attack on that ſide, and, after ſeizing the cannon, turn upon the French gens d'arms, whoſe ſhock was formidable. This very fineſſe had ſucceeded at Novara two years before; and now it was imagined that the Swiſs, not willing to break their agreement with the French, were marching againſt the Lanſquenets with the king's conſent, for whom they bore a mortal grudge and antipathy. The ſame opinion prevailing among the German infantry, made them give way for above an hundred paces, keeping b at the ſame time their ranks intire, by which means the Swiſs approached the artillery without any reſiſtance. They were on the point of attacking the French gens d'arms, when the conſtable, imagining that the Lanſquenets had been put in diſorder, attacked them in front to cover the German infantry while they rallied: this aſſault was given with ſuch vigour as it required all the intrepidity of the Swiſs to withſtand. Each ſide maintained their ground without yielding an inch amidſt a cloſe fire, when the king came up with the French infantry, and the bandes de noir, to ſupport the conſtable. The count de la Mark headed this body of Germans, and advanced to occupy the ſpace which the Lanſquenets had quitted. Jealous of that contemptuous proceeding, the Lanſquenets determined he ſhould not acquire honour by their diſgrace, and deſirous of repairing their error, attacked with incredible reſo-
c lution the firſt Swiſs battalion that preſented, while the count de la Mark with a laudable emulation ſupported their efforts. Here the battle continued for two hours with amazing firmneſs, obſtinacy, and conduct, neither ſide ſhewing the leaſt marks of wearineſs or diſorder. Night came on before either French, Germans, or Swiſs thought of ſounding a retreat, and the fight ſtill continued with the ſame impetuoſity with which it commenced. It was now almoſt impoſſible to quit the field, as the darkneſs of the night prevented the ſoldiers from diſtinguiſhing their own colours. The French advanced-guard had ſuffered moſt, and was in great diſorder; nor could they rally, as clouds of duſt and ſmoke obſcured the little glimmering light the ſtars afforded, and the roar of cannon drowned all the orders iſſued. Chance performed actions which by day-light was attributed d to valour: the combatants fought hand to hand, and hardly a blow failed of doing execution. The Swiſs, who as well as the French wore white ſcarfs, could not diſtinguiſh each other: their ſureſt attack, therefore, was againſt the cavalry, which they knew was wholly French, they having only four hundred horſe belonging to Sforza: thus the horſe were expoſed to the greateſt danger. The king's horſe was wounded under him, and his armour pierced in ſeveral places. In this manner did the battle continue for four hours after ſunſet, with the utmoſt confuſion and hazard; when at length both ſides, fatigued with action, were forced to deſiſt and draw breath: every man remained under arms in the place where he chanced to ſtand. The wounded of both ſides were tenderly uſed, and ſpared by mutual conſent. Francis found himſelf within fifty paces of the main body of the enemy, but the e impoſſibility of removing his ſtation, without running into great hazards, determined him to remain in the ſame critical ſituation. All the precautions he could take were to extinguiſh a flambeaux that was lighted near him, and to order all round his perſon to ſpeak low, and omit thoſe terms of reſpect by which he might be diſtinguiſhed. His majeſty ſlept upon the ground in his armour, with his head ſupported by a block of wood belonging to the carriage of a cannon.

The obſtinacy of both French and Swiſs.

At break of day both armies rallied and charged with freſh vigour. The Swiſs made their firſt attack upon the corps where the king ſtood, with ſuch irreſiſtible impetuoſity, that his majeſty would have been in great danger had not the German infantry interpoſed, and f the artillery played furiouſly on the enemy with ſo much ſucceſs, as put them in ſome diſorder. One diſcharge of the cannon had ſwept away an intire line of the fartheſt advanced battalion, by means of which the French cavalry broke in, and ſoon diſperſed the reſt. The battle had now continued for five hours without the ſmalleſt intermiſſion, when the Swiſs, deſpairing of breaking the German infantry, ſent a detachment to attack the French rear-guard. Colonel Molin was ſent on this command, and acquitted himſelf with great courage and addreſs: after taking a long circuit, he fell upon the French, who did not expect him, though he found them prepared. The duke d'Allenzon, who commanded the rear-guard, plied the Swiſs in front, while Amand de Prie, with the cavalry, attacked their right, and Aubigny, with ſome regiments of artillery, their left wing.

g In the mean time Alviana with the Venetian forces came up, and made his firſt effort on Molin's rear, who after an obſtinate reſiſtance was defeated, and the detachment cut in pieces. Penetrating then with his freſh troops to the part where the king charged in perſon, Alviana aſſaulted the main body of the Swiſs with ſo much fury, that they began to give way, but without the leaſt diſorder, obſtinately fighting for every inch of ground they yielded. At laſt laſt they ſounded a retreat, and marched in good order towards the Milaneſe, rather quitting the field than ceding the victory. Neither the king nor Alviana thought proper to purſue them, finding it impracticable to break forces ſo well diſciplined, without which they could expect no conſiderable advantage; and, indeed, the French were too wearied of an engagement which had laſted for almoſt two whole days, and the greater part of the night, to be able to continue it longer. Both Swiſs and French had loſt their beſt troops and officers, above five thouſand on each ſide being left on the field, beſides wounded. On the French ſide fell the duke de Chollellerand, the prince de Talmont, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, the brave Imbercourt, who had eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in preſerving the life of the conſtable of France, the count de Roye, with a great number of other officers of valour and diſtinction. Claude de Lorrain, count de Guiſe, a young prince but twenty years of age, was killed after giving incredible inſtances of fortitude and conduct [w]. In ſhort, ſo hot and bloody was this engagement, that Trivulcio, who had been in eighteen battles, ſaid, 'That the battle 'of Marignan was the fighting of giants, all the others but the play of children.'

It is ſcarcely worth while to inquire how far the Venetians contributed towards this victory, if ſo it may be called; probable it is, that the arrival of ten thouſand freſh troops muſt have conſiderably changed the face of affairs to the advantage of Francis, whatever the French authors allege (C). As the cardinal of Sion had been the chief cauſe of this engagement, in which the Swiſs ſuffered ſo much, they failed not to reproach him in a manner which decency will not permit us to mention. So incenſed were they againſt the prelate, that to ſave his life he was forced to fly to the emperor, who ſoon after employed him in negociations, for which he was extremely well qualified.

Milan, &c. ſurrender to the French.

After this battle the French and Venetians marched to Milan, the citizens throwing open the gates to receive them, and giving one hundred thouſand crowns to be exempted from being plundered. All the other towns of the Milaneſe followed the example of the capital [x]; but the citadels of Milan and Cremona ſtill remained firm. Leo the tenth, finding that the French and Venetians carried all before them, began to temporiſe, and at laſt was forced to renounce his alliance with Maximilian and Ferdinand: he alſo yielded Parma and Placentia to the French monarch, promiſing beſides to reſtore Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, the faithful and antient ally of France. Francis, on his part, engaged to aſſiſt the church againſt all her enemies, and to maintain the houſe of Medicis in Florence.

The ſiege of the citadel, into which Sforza had thrown himſelf, was now undertaken. It went on with ſo much vigour, that he was forced to capitulate upon ſuch terms as the conquerors choſe to impoſe. Before this ſiege began, Alviana ſeparated his troops from the French, in order to fight the viceroy of Naples, who retreated upon his approach. Upon this he marched, by the ſenate's order, to lay ſiege to Breſcia and Verona, after having requeſted of Francis to aſſiſt the republic in the recovery of her territories. The Venetian officers were divided in their opinions which of thoſe cities were to be firſt attacked. Some alledged Verona to be of the greateſt conſequence, ſince the ſurrender of that city would be in fact reducing the whole Veroneſe. Others again adviſed, that Breſcia might be inveſted, that a communication might be opened with Milan. The ſenate, not caring to determine any thing, referred the whole to Alviana, who marched directly to the latter place, in hopes either of ſurpriſing, or in a ſhort time of reducing the garriſon, and then laying ſiege to Verona before the rigour of the winter ſhould oblige him to go into quarters. But cloſe as Alviana took his meaſures, Icaro, the Spaniſh governor of Breſcia, ſuſpecting his intention, procured a reinforcement of a thouſand infantry before his arrival. Alviana was entirely ignorant of this, and relying on the weakneſs of the garriſon, was ſurpriſed at a reſiſtance he did not expect when he gave the aſſault. However, determined to conquer it by force, he made his approaches with ſuch diligence, and applied himſelf ſo cloſely to directing and overſeeing the works, that he was ſeized with a fever, and died in a few days [y].

In him the republic loſt one of her beſt officers, equally eſteemed by the ſenate, and beloved by the ſoldiers, to whom he was profuſely generous, and yet a ſtrict obſerver of diſcipline. In his youth his fire and courage led him to deſperate attempts, the folly of a which he ſaw when judgment ripened with years and experience. He was ſo much the darling of the army, that they kept his body for twenty-five days, carrying it about with them in a mournful pomp whereever they marched. His diſintereſtedneſs was ſo great, that, notwithſtanding he had long enjoyed ſome of the moſt lucrative employments of the republic from his youth, yet he died ſo poor, that his body was interred at the public charge, and his widow and family ſupported by the ſenate [z].

(C) Paolo Paruta, one of the faithfulleſt, and, perhaps, the fineſt hiſtorian of his age, ſcruples not to attribute the victory to the arrival of Alviana with his freſh army. He affirms, that this general not only charged Molin in the rear, and broke his corps, but that he puſhed through to the main body of the Swiſs opportunely, when the king was hard preſſed (1). Simbers, in his hiſtory of the Swiſs cantons, ſpeaks to the ſame effect, and indeed reaſon confirms the fact (2). The French hiſtorians do not conſider that in aſcribing the marvellous to their hero Francis, they deſtroy the credibility of truth. Francis requires not fiction to make him appear one of the greateſt characters of his time, or indeed that ever has filled a throne.

ALVIANA's death made the Venetians raiſe the ſiege of Breſcia, and attempt the reduction of Peſcara, in which they ſucceeded before the arrival of John Trivulcio. This officer had been ſent by Francis, at the ſenate's requeſt, to ſucceed Alviana. He had no ſooner taken upon him the command than he returned to Breſcia, agreeable to the ſenate's deſire; but
b againſt his own judgment. The event juſtified the prudence of his opinion; for the garriſon being little inferior in number to the Venetian army, made ſuch furious ſallies as rendered his approaches impracticable. When the Venetians were beſieging Peſcara it had been ſtrongly reinforced; and Alviana found it difficult enough before to erect his batteries. Juſt as Trivulcio had thoughts of raiſing the ſiege, a large detachment of the garriſon ſal- The ſiege of Breſcia raiſed.
lied out upon him, killed near three hundred of his troops, and took ten pieces of cannon, with ſome baggage, which they carried in triumph into the city. This loſs forced him to retreat with precipitation as far as Coccai, where he waited for a reinforcement from the French army. Before the arrival of ſuccours the winter came on; ſo that the project of again beſieging the city was deferred to the following ſpring [a].

c AFTER the conqueſt of the Milaneſe, Francis returned to his own dominions with the greater part of his army, having left no more than ſix thouſand French and five thouſand Lanſquenets, under the command of the conſtable, in Italy. The loſs of the battle of Marignan put the emperor in great pain for his poſſeſſions in Italy. He was ſenſible that without the Swiſs he could not reſiſt Francis and the republic; and as theſe mercenary allies were bought off at a higher price than his finances could ſupport, he formed the project of involving Francis at home, by engaging Henry the eighth in his quarrel (D) [b]. His firſt ſtep was to gain over cardinal Wolſey, which he effectually did by ſome promiſes extremely A. D. 1516.
flattering to the ambition of that haughty prelate and miniſter. Wolſey artfully repreſented to Henry the danger of ſuffering Francis to grow too powerful, and chiefly applied him-
d ſelf to the paſſions of that young monarch. In ſhort, Maximilian with joy ſaw his intrigues againſt the Venetians and French ſucceed to his wiſh. All the young courtiers were ſtrenuous in a rupture with France, while the older and more prudent part of the nation repreſented the injuſtice of breaking a treaty without the ſmalleſt provocation; and adviſed Henry rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland [c].

IN the mean time Leo the tenth, being informed of what paſſed in England, was not forward in concluding the treaty on foot with Francis: he ſpent a month at Florence quibbling about the expences in which the holy ſee ought to be reimburſed before he yielded Modena and Reggio. He was deſirous that the duke of Ferrara ſhould receive his inveſtiture from the church, though all his predeceſſors had received theirs from the empire; but
e the duke nobly rejected both propoſitions, and although he was acquainted with the combination formed againſt France, yet he refuſed to deſert his ally [d].

THE winter having been wholly employed in negociations and ſtate intrigues, early in Breſcia and Verona beſieged by the French and Venetians.
the ſpring the Venetian army took the field. Trivulcio, who commanded at the ſiege of Breſcia the preceding autumn, loſt ſome reputation by having ſo ſuddenly abandoned the works, and for the defeat ſuſtained, together with the loſs of his cannon. The army, however, had quartered in the Breſcian, in order to reſume the ſiege when the ſeaſon permitted: it was accordingly entered upon under the conduct of Lautrec, who ſucceeded Trivulcio; and another army was at the ſame time ſent to inveſt Verona [e]. Things were in great forwardneſs, notwithſtanding all Leo's intrigues, when news arrived that Maximilian's army was in f full march towards Verona: he had drawn together a number of troops levied in his hereditary dominions to reſiſt Selim, who it was imagined propoſed entering Germany. Beſides this each circle of the empire had given him five thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot; and the five leſſer cantons of Switzerland, who refuſed to treat with Francis, ſent their quota of five thouſand infantry to Maximilian. With this formidable army, his march was ſo expeditious and ſecret, that neither the French or Venetians ſuſpected he had moved out of quarters, until he deſcended the mountains of Trente (E) [f]. The approach of the imperial army obliged the allies to raiſe the ſieges of Breſcia and Verona, with a precipitation that more reſembled flight than a retreat. Lautrec, who commanded in chief at both, ſhewed at firſt great magnanimity: he ſent the king word, that he would prevent the emperor's croſſing the Oglio; but he did not keep his promiſe, having been miſinformed concerning the ſtrength of the imperial army, and likewiſe the depth of the river, which happened to be lower than it uſually was at that ſeaſon of the year. The Imperialiſts paſſed the Oglio, marching to Cremona, where they encamped: there they were joined by Mincio with the forces quartered at Verona, upon which they proceeded with little obſtruction to Milan. The imprudent conduct of Maximilian, in waſting time in the ſiege of Aſola, gave the Venetians time to recover themſelves, and take the neceſſary meaſures for the defence of Milan [g]. They had received ten thouſand Swiſs into their pay, raiſed in thoſe cantons in treaty with France by the baron Alt Saxe. Trivulcio had thrown three thouſand men into Cremona, and had paſſed the Adda to meet the Swiſs, and oppoſe Maximilian's croſſing this river. Accordingly the emperor was repulſed at Picighton; after which he made a feint, as if he intended paſſing at Caſſan, and, in the mean time throwing a bridge over the Adda, detached a body of infantry to defend it, by which means he at laſt ſucceeded. Then marching ſtraight to Milan, he ſent a herald to demand the keys of the gates, threatning the inhabitants with the moſt rigorous treatment, if they refuſed to comply. By this time Trivulcio was returned to the city, and his army was a ſeaſonable reinforcement to the conſtable, who had the utmoſt difficulty to keep the inhabitants, terrified with the emperor's menaces, from ſurrendering. The nearer Maximilian approached the more tumultuous were the Milanois, either from a fickleneſs natural to them, or dread of the imperial power; nor could the commotions be fully quieted until the arrival of the Swiſs. So powerful a reinforcement inſpired them with courage, and now they became no leſs inſolent than they had been humble but a few hours before. Other happy conſequences to the French immediately followed the arrival of the Swiſs [h]: their countrymen in the imperial army began to murmur, and demand their pay with a boldneſs that terrified Maximilian. Staffler their colonel came to the emperor's bedſide, and demanded their penſion in terms ſo diſreſpectful, that Maximilian could not help reproaching him with ill manners, to which Staffler anſwered, 'That the Swiſs 'wanted florins, not breeding; and that if their engagements were not inſtantly fulfilled, 'they would embrace the offers of the conſtable of Bourbon.' This declaration the emperor received as extremely probable; he feared leſt the French might have money enough to corrupt the Swiſs; and he was too well acquainted with the diſpoſition of thoſe republicans to have any doubt of their receiving money upon any terms. To appeaſe Staffler he told him that by the next day he might depend on the payment of the arrears, and alſo a ſum in advance. After the departure of the Swiſs, Maximilian removed his quarters to another part of the camp, where he thought he might be protected by the Germans; but apprehending danger here likewiſe, he raiſed the ſiege, and retired to Bergamaſco with the Germans, where he encamped. The Swiſs, following his example, decamped likewiſe, and took the route of Lodi, pillaging every place in their way. They were proceeding on their march homeward, when the cardinal Sion came up with them, bringing with him ſix thouſand crowns, which the emperor had raiſed in the Bergamaſco by way of contribution. Moreover, he aſſured them of an immediate advance of fifty thouſand crowns, Spaniſh money, depoſited in the city of Trente; upon which they ſuſpended meaſures, and had ſome thoughts of returning to the ſiege, when freſh difficulties occurred. In ſhort, Maximilian not having performed his promiſe, the Swiſs returned home, the Germans encamped in the Veroneſe, the other auxiliaries repaſſed the Alps, and three thouſand Lanſquentes went over to the Venetians. Thus ended the formidable expedition of Maximilian, in the total diſperſion of an army, which under proper authority and diſcipline was ſufficient to conquer all Italy [i].

(E) Colonna, who was governor of Verona, took every meaſure to diſtreſs the Venetian and French army. To cut off their proviſion and forage he kept parties of light horſe at Legnano, with which he ſcoured the country, greatly diſtreſſing the inhabitants, as well as the army. Lautrec ſent a detachment of four hundred men at arms and five hundred light horſe to put a ſtop to theſe incurſions; but Colonna, receiving intelligence of their march, not only reinforced the parties at Legnano, but likewiſe placed an ambuſcade ſo judiciouſly, that the Venetian proveditor fell into it, and was defeated. Another detachment, under Urſini, was more fortunate; for having encountered a body of three thouſand Imperialiſts, he defeated them with the loſs of eight hundred of their beſt troops (1). It may not be unſeaſonable to mention, that Leo, ſeeing the progreſs and ſtrength of Maximilian, thought he could not too early make his court. The emperor had no ſooner obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſieges of Verona and Breſcia, than he ſent a nuncio to congratulate him on his arrival in Italy (2); though, according to the treaty of Bologna, he ought to have taken every meaſure to ſtop his progreſs.

But

a But neither the Venetians or French profited much by the diſorder in the imperial army: the former thought of nothing more than eſtabliſhing themſelves quietly in the dutchy of Milan by a firm peace; while the Venetians in vain complained of a breach of contract in not aſſiſting them in the recovery of their dominions. Gritti the proveditor made ſtrong remonſtrances to Lautrec upon his refuſal to undertake the ſiege of Verona; but they were ineffectual: he even propoſed, in a council of war, that the Venetians alone ſhould enter upon the enterprize; in which he had the concurring ſentiments of the other officers. Lautrec, ſeeing their reſolution, agreed to join them, and they were on their march to the Veroneſe, when the Lanſquenets refuſed to attack a town belonging to the emperor: here they were a ſecond time diſappointed, and at length forced to lay aſide the deſign [k].

Verona beſieged by the Venetians.

b An account of theſe tranſactions coming to the ſenate, they immediately ſent a reinforcement of four thouſand men, money and ſtores, with orders for the army to proceed directly to the ſiege. Accordingly Verona was inveſted, and the ſiege carried on with vigour on the part of the Venetians, but not ſo on the ſide of Lautrec. The proveditors uſed all their endeavours to engage the French heartily in the cauſe; but perceiving they were put off by frivolous excuſes, they began to ſuſpect that Lautrec's conduct was the effects of ſome ſecret orders from court. Intelligence having arrived at the ſame time in the camp of a body of Germans that were on their march for the relief of the place, Lautrec ſent the proveditor notice that he would not hazard a battle, and of his intention to decamp. This he immediately effected, leaving the Venetians alone to conduct the ſiege, and encounter c the approaching enemy [l].

We muſt now inquire into the occaſion of this remiſſneſs in the French general, and the reaſons which induced him ſo obviouſly to break the treaty with the republic. Francis having recovered the Milaneſe, had formed new projects, in conſequence of the death of Ferdinand, which happened this year. He had planned the deſign of adding Naples to the crown of France, in hopes that the archduke Charles would not be in a capacity to lay claim to Arragon before he was well eſtabliſhed in his Spaniſh dominions. Leo, eager for the expulſion of the French from Italy, kept emiſſaries at the courts of the emperor, Henry the eighth, and the archduke Charles: he likewiſe uſed all his endeavours by clandeſtine meaſures to prevail on the Swiſs cantons to break their treaty with France; but his
d intrigues could not be kept ſo ſecret as not to come to the ears of the French monarch: upon this Francis, at once abandoning his ſchemes upon Naples, reſolved to treat with Spain; nor was that crown leſs diſpoſed to terms of amity. The reſult of this mutual inclination was a treaty, ſtruck up at Noyon by the plenipotentiaries of each, in which Francis, for certain conſiderations, renounced his claim to Naples.

Treaty of Noyon between Francis and the archduke Charles.

This treaty was ſoon followed by another ſigned at Bruſſels. According to this, Charles engaged to prevail on his grandfather to conſign the city of Verona into the hands of Lautrec, to be delivered by him to the Venetians upon their paying to Maximilian for that reſtitution the ſum of two hundred thouſand ducats, and to Francis the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns, due to him from Maximilian. Both theſe treaties were diametrically ope poſite to the inclinations and views of Leo, Maximilian, and Henry the eighth. The pontiff paſſionately wiſhed the decline of the French power. Maximilian's chief view was to raiſe enemies to Francis, to prevent his aſſiſting the Venetians: he foreſaw that he either muſt ratify the treaty of Bruſſels and yield up Verona, or elſe defend his Italian conqueſts, without a ſingle ally againſt a powerful enemy. In this extremity he thought the moſt adviſeable meaſure would be to embroil the affairs of Europe in ſuch a manner, that the new war might ſtir up a league againſt France [m].

Maximilian accedes to the treaty; ſo do the Venetians. A. D. 1517.

The ſenate of Venice, ſenſible that the emperor would object to the terms of the treaty of Bruſſels, continued their remonſtrances ſo aſſiduouſly to Lautrec, that not knowing how to excuſe himſelf without an open violation of the treaty, he returned to the ſiege of Verona;
f but in the mean time Maximilian thought fit to ratify the treaty of Noyon, and conclude a truce for threee months with the Venetians, during which preliminaries for a peace were to be ſettled. Thus Verona was put into the hands of Lautrec, which was delivered to the Venetians on their paying the ſum ſtipulated in the treaty of Bruſſels. Gritti and Gradonico received the city from the French, to the great ſatisfaction of the inhabitants, and of the ſenate and people of Venice. Demonſtrations of joy were made in every city belonging to the republic; preſents were ſent to Lautrec, and Gritti was ordered to eſcort him to Milan [n].

Peace being now eſtabliſhed, and the republic reinſtated in the quiet poſſeſſion of her dominions, by a prolongation of the truce to the term of five years, the ſenate's attention g was wholly turned to pacific meaſures. They began with eaſing the people of the burthen-ſome taxes impoſed for the ſupport of the war; enlarging their commerce, and promoting induſtry, trade, and manufactures: nor did this wiſe body neglect the ſtudy of arts and ſciences, which could not be ſuppoſed to flouriſh amidſt a ruinous and bloody war: for this purpoſe the univerſity of Padua, which had been ſhut for the ſpace of eight years, was opened, and particular immunities and privileges conferred on this ancient ſeat of the muſes [o]. To provide the more effectually for the ſecurity of ſcience, which ever blows ſtrongeſt under the ſhade of peace, they added to the fortifications of the city, taking every meaſure which could prevent any farther inconveniencies to learning, or impede the education and ſtudies of youth. a

A. D. 1518. THE ſenate was ſenſible of what conſequence to the republic it was to live upon terms of amity with the Grand Seignior: they had often experienced his power; and the traffic to his coaſts was, perhaps, the moſt beneficial branch of their commerce. In order, therefore, to preſerve the friendſhip of Selim, two of the chief nobility, Lodovico Mocenigo and Bartholomeo Contareni, were ſent to congratulate him on his late victory over the ſophi of Perſia, and requeſt the continuance of his friendſhip to the republic. Selim received the ambaſſadors at Damaſcus; profeſſed great eſteem for the republic; granted the Venetian factories at Tripoli, Alexandria, Bareth, Damaſcus, and elſewhere within his dominions, all the exemptions, privileges, and immunities they deſired. In ſhort, ſo kindly did he receive the ambaſſadors, that they returned loaded with preſents, and highly ſatisfied with the magnificence, generoſity, and friendſhip of that monarch. A treaty of commerce with Spain was likewiſe concluded, by which ſome difficulties to the Venetian trade, which occurred upon the acceſſion of Charles to that crown, were wholly removed [p]. b c

THE pope, the emperor, and the Venetians, were all equally deſirous to preſerve the ſweets of peace which they had juſt taſted. To this end a prolongation of the truce was wiſhed for by all parties, though two years were yet unexpired. The emperor was for referring matters to Leo, and propoſed him as an arbiter of the terms on which it ſhould be extended; but the republic choſe to conſult with Francis, and to put her intereſts into the hands of that powerful and ancient ally. Leo was prompted to eſtabliſh tranquility among the chriſtian princes, from a deſire of uniting them againſt Selim, whoſe power became formidable. Francis, having confirmed the truce between the emperor and the Venetians, the pope then ſet to work to engage them in a new holy war: his utmoſt endeavours were uſed with the republic, whoſe marine he knew would be abſolutely neceſſary to his deſign; but the Venetians, ſenſible of the benefits they drew by their commerce from Selim's friendſhip, returned anſwer that his holineſs might depend on them when the other princes were ready to take the field; ſooner to equip fleets and raiſe armies would only expoſe them to the reſentment of a monarch able at one blow to cruſh the republic. It was plain to the ſenate that ſuch an anſwer laid them under no hazard of quarrelling with Selim, ſince they were aware of the impractibility of uniting in one deſign the ſtrength of ſo many contending and oppoſite intereſts as were required to complete Leo's ſcheme [q]. d

A. D. 1519. Death of Maximilian. SOON after the concluſion of the treaty with the republic, the emperor Maximilian died, after a reign of twenty-five years and five months: his death being known to the frontier garriſons, they began to make incurſions into the Venetian territories, and to commit acts of hoſtility, as if the treaty was extinct by the deceaſe of one of the parties; but theſe irregularities were ſoon prevented by remonſtrances the ſenate made to the princes of the empire. e

Francis the firſt and Charles of Auſtria from pretenſions to the empire. In the mean time Francis the firſt and the archduke Charles of Auſtria, now king of Spain, made preparations to ſupport their mutual pretenſions to the empire. Italy in general was more diſpoſed towards the election of the former, and particularly the Venetians. Francis ſent Taligni in quality of plenipotentiary to the ſenate: his commiſſion was to borrow a ſum of money to ſupport his maſter's election; to procure a body of troops to give weight to his pretenſions; and to conſult the neceſſary meaſures in caſe Charles ſent an army into Italy, to compel Leo to abſolve him from the oath made to Julius concerning the inveſtiture of Naples. The ſenate anſwered Taligni in terms of affection and friendſhip for Francis: as to money, they told him of the low condition of the treaſury, exhauſted by long wars, notwithſtanding which they would raiſe for his uſe one hundred thouſand ducats: with regard to the forces required, they apprehended they would not be granted a paſſage; or if they were, that they could be of little conſequence to the king's affairs, and might involve the republic in a war: however, as to the third article of his requeſt, the ſenate aſſured his majeſty that any attempts to enter Italy in a hoſtile manner, would be oppoſed with all their forces and influence; for that the republic had ever made a point of protecting the holy ſee, and their obligations to Francis would induce them to be no leſs regardful of his dominions [r]. f g a In the mean time the archbiſhop of Mentz, having convoked the diet at Frankfort on the twenty-eighth of June, Charles was there proclaimed emperor by the name of Charles the fifth. The diſappointment of Francis is attributed, by the marſhal Fleuranges, to his refuſing to take into his pay the troops of the circle of Suabia, after their making ſome overtures to that effect.

Soon after the acceſſion of Charles to the imperial dignity, Selim died, and was ſucceeded in the Othoman empire by Solyman, his only ſon, an enterprizing, ambitious, and courageous prince. Lewis king of Hungary, knowing the young emperor's extenſive projects, and hatred of Chriſtianity, prepared for war, inviting all the other Chriſtian princes to unite with him, and particularly the republic. Inſtead of acceding to the propoſals of Lewis, the ſe-
b nate ſent Marco Rinco to Conſtantinople to congratulate Solyman upon his acceſſion, and procure a confirmation of the treaty with his father, which was readily granted. Solyman even conſented to join a ſquadron to the Venetian fleet for the ſecurity of their commerce, at that time infeſted by pirates: and he ſo far honoured the republic as to ſend a plenipotentiary to the ſenate, to notify his acceſſion, and grant the Venetian merchants all the privileges they required. This confirmation of peace with ſo powerful a monarch, afforded the utmoſt joy to the republic; their commerce was thereby ſecured, and the ſtate freed from the apprehenſions of a war it was in no condition to ſupport. In conſequence, their fleet ſailed to the coaſt of Barbary, where it was extremely ſucceſsful againſt the pirates [s].

Not to trace all the cauſes which occaſioned a rupture between the emperor and Francis, c ſufficient it is, that Francis, aware of the approaching ſtorm, prepared accordingly. He ſent ambaſſadors to Rome and Venice, to endeavour to draw the pope and republic into a league for the defence of Italy, and to prevent Charles from going to Rome to receive the imperial crown from the pope. His miniſter at Rome had no ſatisfactory anſwer from Leo, who was reſolved to wait conjunctures, and be determined by circumſtances. At Venice his ambaſſador received a promiſe, that the ſenate would provide for the ſafety of Italy; yet did the republic harbour ſuſpicions that a ſecret treaty between Charles and the king was in agitation. This aroſe from intelligence they had of French and Spaniſh envoys meeting at Montpelier, for a final diſcuſſion of all differences.

The negotiation at Montpelier coming to nothing, Charles ſent an ambaſſador to the ſe-
d nate to negociate an alliance with the republic, whoſe friendſhip he perceived would be neceſſary to his deſigns on Italy. As the ſenate inſiſted upon the entire reſtitution of all the places they poſſeſſed taken by Maximilian, the ambaſſadors took their leave, without bringing things to an iſſue [t].

This year was entirely conſumed in negotiations; in all of which the republic kept aloof, not caring to break with Charles, and yet eager to preſerve the alliance with Francis. Nor A. D. 1520.
did the following year produce any open violence, although Europe was threatened with a terrible ſtorm from an army Solyman had levied, with intention, as was ſuppoſed, to invade Hungary, and extend his conqueſts on that quarter. Near two hundred thouſand men had been raiſed in the Aſiatic provinces and Greece; an armament which ſtruck the Hungarians
e with terror, and compelled them to ſolicit the ſuccour of all the neighbouring powers. Philippo Morotſoſtrot, of Agria, was ſent to Venice to requeſt the aid of the republic. His ſpeech in the ſenate was ſo affecting and pathetic, that this wiſe body, unmindful of their commerce, and the true intereſt of the commonwealth, conſented to ſend ambaſſadors to the courts of Vienna, Paris, and London; and at the ſame time to furniſh Lewis of Hungary with a ſum of thirty thouſand ducats [u].

A few days after the departure of the Hungarian miniſter, died Loretano the doge, after A. D. 1521.
a glorious, but troubleſome, reign of nineteen years and eight months. As he was a prince endued with every human virtue, was wiſe, brave, and generous, his death was much lamented, and no leſs felt by all degrees of men. "He was, ſays Sanſovino, not only learn-
f "ed; but, by his liberality and taſte, the cauſe of learning in others." After an elegant funeral oration pronounced over his body by Andrea Navagiro, he was buried with great ſolemnity, and attended to the grave by the unfeigned tears of his affectionate and ſorrowful ſubjects [w].

At

At his acceſſion the republic was in peace, it is true; but the ſeeds of war were ſo plentifully a ſown every where, that a rich crop of misfortunes and the evils neceſſarily attending might ſoon be expected. Propoſals were ſtill making to the ſenate by Charles the fifth, extremely advantageous to the intereſt of the republic; yet ſo faithful were the Venetians to Francis, that they declined every overture, and even ſending an ambaſſador to congratulate the emperor on his acceſſion. Charles, perceiving their fidelity to their ally, thought of a meaſure which he doubted not would excite jealouſies, and oblige them to have recourſe to him: it was the ſending a plenipotentiary to the court of France, as if he intended to ſettle the affairs of Italy without concerning himſelf with the Venetians. This in ſome meaſure anſwered the intention: however, a treaty he ſoon after concluded with the pope, and a plan formed for expelling the French out of Milan, being accidentally diſcovered, more cloſely cemented the b republic with Francis[x].

THE policy of the ſenate was to preſerve peace, but this was found impoſſible amidſt the intrigues of Charles, Leo, and the French monarch: they endeavoured to mend the breach between his holineſs and the king; but finding their endeavours ineffectual, the army was put in readineſs to march to the relief of Milan, knowing that upon its ſafety depended the ſecurity of their own dominions. Things now being ripe for action, the imperial army, joined by the pope's forces, marched to beſiege Parma. The trenches were not opened when Lautrec, after receiving a reinforcement of Swiſs and Venetians came to its relief, and forced Proſpero Colonna, the imperial general, to abandon his deſign. Proſpero was, indeed, in a condition to defeat Lautrec, had not the ſudden aſſault the duke of Ferrara made upon c Reggio and Modena obliged him to divide his forces.

LEO began to harbour ſuſpicions of the emperor in conſequence of this diſappointment:
he had ſupported the whole expences of the ſiege, and attributed the want of ſucceſs to ſecret orders Colonna had received. Charles, chagrined with the pope's jealouſy, was more than ever deſirous of engaging the Venetians in his party; but all his endeavours could not alter the ſenate's purpoſe[y].

BOTH armies were ſtrongly reinforced by large bodies of Swiſs in the ſervice of each; and Charles, having no hope from the Venetians, ordered Colonna to march directly for Milan. The French and Venetians were commanded by Lautrec, who, hearing of Colonna's intention, ſet out directly for Caſſan, in order to prevent his croſſing the Adda: but Colonna forcing a march d got thither before him, and purſued his route to the capital of the dutchy. Lautrec ſtill determined to give him battle, had he not in his march been deſerted by the Swiſs, who mu-tinied for want of their pay. This circumſtance threw the affairs of Francis and the republic in diſorder, and compelled Lautrec with the remainder of his forces to throw himſelf into Milan, and provide for a ſiege. In the mean time Colonna was advanced, and meaſures Colonna inveſts Milan. taken for inveſting the city: Peſcara made an attack upon that quarter where Trivulcio and the Venetians were on guard. As the fortifications here were not completed, the garriſon was ſoon defeated: but Trivulcio, who was then ſick in bed, inſtantly getting up, marched againſt Peſcara with a few troops he had collected, not doubting but honour and reaſon Trivulcio taken priſoner, Milan ſurrenders. would prevail on the reſt to return. In this, however, he was diſappointed, and after e fighting bravely with a handful of men againſt a multitude, he was made priſoner, with ſeveral Venetians of diſtinction. Lautrec upon this, deſpairing of being able to preſerve the city, put a ſtrong garriſon in the citadel, and retired with the remaining forces to Coma.
Milan was ſacked and plundered for ten days ſucceſſively; nor was there an inſult or cruelty which the inhabitants did not ſuſtain from the rapaciouſneſs of the Swiſs, and brutality of the Imperialiſts[z].

FROM hence Colonna marched to Coma, which he beſieged, and took after a ſhort but briſk aſſault. The ſucceſs of Colonna procured Charles the ſurrender of Lodi, Pavia, Pla-centia, Parma, and ſoon of Cremona, without ſtriking another blow. Thus did the French f loſe Milan, without one battle, or memorable effort, when the approach of winter put a ſtop to the conqueſts of Colonna, and preſerved the remains of Lautrec's army in Venetian quarters. The pope's death likewiſe impeded farther military tranſactions. This event changed the face of affairs, and reduced Colonna to as weak a ſituation as Lautrec[a]. Intelligence of Leo's death was no ſooner received in the army, than of twelve thouſand Swiſs
he had in pay, no more than five hundred remained: the Florentines likewiſe withdrew; and though the Germans kept the field, yet was their number too inconſiderable to undertake any enterprize, or even to reſiſt the enemy, if ſeaſonably reinforced. Francis imprudently neglected his affairs in Italy, and the Venetians alone were not able to ſeize the opportunity, when Milan might as eaſily be recovered as it had been loſt. However, they took every poſſible meaſure: they levied troops; they ordered their garriſons to march in- g to the field; and they tampered with the Swiſs cantons, who ſeemed diſpoſed to receive a their pay, and aſſiſt Francis. Upon this Lautrec was induced to enter upon action in the depth of winter; but the miſconduct of Bozoli, whom he had ſent with a ſtrong detachment into the Parmeſan, obliged him to relinquiſh his deſigns [b].

STRONG bodies of Swiſs and Venetians having joined him about the month of April, Lautrec reſolved to inveſt Milan, and take the advantage the low condition of the enemy afforded. His intention was to take it by aſſault; but the ſtrength of the garriſon, and the enmity of the citizens to a French government, of which they were heartily tired, obliged him to turn the ſiege into a blockade. Maximilian Sforza in the mean time returned to Pavia with ſix thouſand Lanſquenets. Hence he paſſed through the Veroneſe to Caſſel-Major. b Croſſing the Po, he arrived at Placentia, where, joining the marquis of Mantua, he proceeded to Milan; upon which Lautrec removed his camp to the diſtance of five miles from the city. A. D. 1522. French beſiege Milan.

A DETACHMENT from Lautrec's army had beſieged and taken Novara; after which he marched with the main body and inveſted Pavia, where the marquis of Mantua was left by Sforza to command: his batteries played with fury upon the walls, nor did the marquis neglect any thing neceſſary to a vigorous defence: the city, however, muſt ſoon have ſurrendered, had not Colonna found means to convey a reinforcement into it of two thouſand infantry, chiefly Corſicans. This obliged Lautrec to raiſe the ſiege, as he perceived by the ſtrength of the garriſon that the iſſue muſt be precarious, and the execution bloody and c tedious. Retiring to a village called Monce, he reſolved there to wait the arrival of a ſum of money he expected from France: Colonna, having intelligence of this convoy, ſent a detachment under Anchiſes Viſconti to intercept it, which obliged the treaſurer to ſecure himſelf in Arone, ſending from thence advice to Lautrec of his ſituation. Viſconti poſted himſelf ſo advantageouſly, that it was impoſſible for the convoy to paſs or be reinforced but by forcing a paſſage, which the detachment ſent by Lautrec was too weak to attempt [c]. Lautrec inveſts Pavia. The ſiege raiſed.

IN the mean time the Swiſs, for whom this money was intended, became impatient: three days they waited; but on the fourth ſent one of their principal officers to Lautrec with three propoſitions, viz. that he would inſtantly pay them, diſcharge them, or lead them againſt the enemy; propoſitions equally whimſical and difficult. The Imperialiſts were encamped d at Bico, a village three miles from Milan, or rather they were cantoned in a large park, ſurrounded by a deep ditch, which rendered an attack extremely hazardous. Lautrec remonſtrated with the Swiſs; but all the anſwer he could procure was Money, a Diſcharge, or Battle: however, he obtained from them ſome little time to reconnoitre the enemy; after which he divided his army into three bodies for the attack, as this was the only alternative he could embrace. Before the engagement began, Sforza joined Colonna with ſix thouſand Lanſquenets; upon which Lautrec a ſecond time remonſtrated to the Swiſs, but they were obſtinate. No ſooner did the trumpets ſound than the Swiſs, deſpiſing danger, flew over the ditch, and prepared to mount the counterſcarp in the face of cannon and volleys of ſmall arms: the conſequence was, that in the ſpace of half an hour they loſt one thouſand of e their beſt troops. The ſecond line, not daunted with the deſtruction of the firſt, marched on with equal intrepidity, and met with the ſame fate, leaving in the foſſe about two thouſand ſoldiers, Albert de la Pierre, their general, and four other officers of diſtinction. The French and Venetians on the other ſide were not more ſucceſsful, though leſs unfortunate as to their loſs: Lautrec's brother attacked the bridge, which, after a vigorous action, he was forced to quit, having loſt about ſeven hundred of his troops: ſuch was the iſſue of the affair at Bico, which happened upon the twenty-eighth of April, A. 1522. Some hiſtorians alledge, that Lautrec's loſs next day amounted to five thouſand men, of which, on the part of the Swiſs, three thouſand fell. Next day he retired to Trezzo, and the day following the Swiſs returned to their cantons; the marquis of Piſcara was for purſuing them, but was diſf ſuaded by Colonna to run any farther hazards, ſince the ſure conſequence of their victory already acquired, would be the total conqueſt of the Milaneſe, and diſbanding of Lautrec's army [d]. Before the end of the autumn, the Imperialiſts were intirely maſters of the Milaneſe, Cremoneſe, and all the other appendages of the dutchy of Milan. French defeated.

IN the mean time Charles the fifth, knowing of the great preparations the French monarch was making for the recovery of the Milaneſe, made one more attempt to gain the Venetians; but with as little ſucceſs, it being the intention of the republic to keep well, if poſſible, with both parties, although a body of their troops acted in conjunction with the French.

THIS year Adrian the ſixth, who ſucceeded Leo in the pontificate, laboured with all his g might to bring about a truce for three years among the Chriſtian potentates. The great progreſs of the Turks in Hungary, as well as their conqueſt of the iſland of Rhodes, gave his A. D. 1523.

holineſs great apprehenſions about the fate of Italy. Charles Lennoy, his intimate friend and viceroy of Naples, perſuaded him that Francis alone oppoſed his pious deſigns; and the emperor and king of England had filled him with notions of the great authority and power of the head of the church. Flattered with theſe hopes, Adrian publiſhed a bull, by which, in virtue of the power delegated to him by the Almighty, he ordered all Chriſtian princes and ſtates to obſerve a truce of three years, under the penalty of interdiction and excommunication. Francis, paying no regard to the ſacred mandate, and continuing his preparations againſt Italy, the pope joined in the new formed league againſt this monarch, and omitted nothing to gain the Venetians. New envoys were every week coming from Charles, with different propoſals and terms. At laſt the affair was debated in the ſenate with great warmth, ſome adviſing to embrace the emperor's party and the league, others to continue their alliance with Francis, a prince of valour equal to his power [e]. The ſenate would ſeem to be divided into two factions; one in favour of Francis, headed by Andrea Gritti, a man of great authority and merit; the other by Georgia Cornari, no leſs reſpected for his prudence and wiſdom than his opponent. Theſe two noblemen ſupported their different ſentiments with great vehemence and warmth, each producing ſo many ſtrong and ſpecious arguments as rendered it next to impracticable to decide upon their merit. The arrival of the biſhop of Bayeux, ambaſſador from Francis, and of an envoy from Henry the eighth, ſtill more, if poſſible, perplexed their deliberations. The firſt intreated they would ſuſpend their determination, until the arrival of the French army, which he aſſerted would enter Italy in leſs than a month. This was reaſon enough for the Engliſh and imperial miniſters the more preſſingly to ſolicit them to an immediate reſolution; tho' at the ſame time they pretended to disbelieve the aſſertion of the French ambaſſador, under the notion that Francis could ſpare no ſuch army at a time when his own kingdom was in danger.

Adrian the ſixth joins in the league againſt France.

At length, by the intrigues of Charles, of Adrian, and the Engliſh ambaſſadors, a perpetual peace and alliance between the emperor, Ferdinand, the archduke of Auſtria, and Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, on the one hand, and the republic of Venice on the other, was concluded. The conditions were, that the ſenate ſhould ſend, if neceſſary, twelve hundred horſe and ſix thouſand foot for the protection of the Milaneſe: that they ſhould have the ſame number ready to oppoſe the invaſion of Naples by any Chriſtian potentate: that Charles ſhould provide an equal number of forces for the defence of the Venetian dominions againſt all enemies without diſtinction: that the republic ſhould, in the term of eight years, pay to the archduke the ſum of two hundred thouſand ducats, as an indemnification of former loſſes: that the republic ſhould poſſeſs all her cities, towns, forts, and territories on the continent, with the ſame juriſdiction, power, and authority, as at the ſigning of this treaty: that all perſons baniſhed their country, and expelled the ſenate for having engaged in the emperor's cauſe, ſhould be recalled and reinſtated in their former poſſeſſions; and that beſides, they ſhould for life enjoy an annual penſion of five thouſand ducats, in recompence of their ſufferings (A). The pope and Henry the eighth were guarantees of this treaty, and the kings of Poland; Hungary, Portugal, the duke of Savoy, with a number of petty princes, were admitted as aſſociates [f].

The final reſolution of the ſenate, and concluſion of a treaty with the emperor, &c.

No ſooner was the treaty concluded than the republic ſent an ambaſſy to the emperor, to compliment him on the occaſion. Their next meaſure was to provide a general to conduct the intended armaments. Trivulcio was ſuppoſed too much attached to the French intereſt; yet, as he had always behaved with a ſcrupulous regard to honour, it required ſome delicacy to diſmiſs him without giving offence. It was therefore propoſed, that a penſion of three thouſand ducats ſhould be ſettled on him for his ſupport as a private citizen, on preſumption he would not chuſe to draw his ſword againſt his king and country. The terms were offered, but rejected by Trivulcio, who preferred returning into France. In his room, the ſenate appointed Franciſco Maria, duke of Urbini, commander in chief of all their forces [g]. Such a change in the policy of the ſenate made moſt people imagine, that Francis, deprived of ſo powerful an ally, would forbear his intended expedition. Inſtead of which, he, undaunted by the league, remained firm in his reſolution, and made greater preparations than before for the execution. The conſtable of Bourbon's defection ſomewhat retarded his operations; but upon his flight every thing went on for the march of the army. However, the king contented himſelf with ſending Bonivet with the troops, amounting to twenty thouſand horſe and foot.

a BONIVET paſſed the Alps in the end of Auguſt, or beginning of September this year; and coming to the frontiers of the Milaneſe, ſoon reduced Novarra and all the country on the farther ſide of the river Meſin. Proſpero Colonna had neglected to fortify and garriſon the places of moſt importance, not imagining that Francis, who had ſo many enemies to combat in his own dominions, could ſpare an army to Italy. But finding his conjecture falſe, he was compelled to retire in great diſorder to Milan. He had but five thouſand men; a body inſufficient to defend ſo large and ill-fortified a city. Experience, however, had taught him, that he was not to conclude what an enemy would do from what he himſelf, in their circumſtances, might think convenient: inſtead therefore of abandoning the dutchy, he began with all diligence to repair his former error, thinking it time enough to retire
b when the enemy made him unable longer to reſiſt [h].

Had Bonivet marched directly to Milan, without waiting to reduce the country as he proceeded, the gates would have been opened; but he injudiciouſly eſteemed a day more or leſs of little conſequence. Thus he loſt four or five days, which afforded Colonna time to put the capital in a ſtate of defence. The republic, having notice of their approach, ordered their army to aſſemble on the banks of the Oglio: they alſo reinforced the garriſons of Crema and Bergamo, ſending a body of troops likewiſe to join Colonna. When Bonivet came before Milan, he found the city ſo well prepared for a defence, that without attempting to form the ſiege, he took the reſolution of encamping at Chirabella, to cut off the convoys from the allied army; but his meaſures were ſo ill concerted, that, after perſiſting in the c deſign till the end of November, he was forced to remove at a greater diſtance, his army being in want of proviſion and forage [i].

Bonivet's error, and Colonna's diligence the cauſe of the ill ſucceſs of the French.

BONIVET, unſucceſsful here, found means, however, to take Monza, Lodi, and to relieve the city of Cremona, which was in great diſtreſs, the city being in the hands of the Imperialiſts. The Milanois and Germans, apprehending that Bonivet might lay ſiege to Cremona, preſſed the ſenate to order their army into the Cremoneſe; but they choſe to refer the whole to the diſcretion of the general. Franciſco Maria, unwilling to endanger the army committed to his care, encamped between Romano and Martinenga, with which the Imperialiſts were diſſatisfied. Some reports of a ſecret treaty between the imperial and French monarchs, d gave birth to the cautious meaſures of the Venetians, who were apprehenſive of entering upon hoſtilities and waſting their troops, while it was doubtful whether an alliance, planned for their deſtruction, might not be in agitation: their general, therefore, kept aloof, until the ſtorms which threatened the republic were diſpelled; and the ſenate uſed the utmoſt diligence in forming new levies, and preparing againſt the doubtful events of fortune, and policy of the imperial and French councils [k].

During this ſtate of affairs and ſuſpence of action, from the mutual jealouſy and diſtruſt of the parties, as well as the approach of winter, pope Adrian the ſixth died on the fourteenth of September, A. 1523. His death was a fatal ſtroke to the confederacy, depriving it not only of the pontifical authority, but of large pecuniary ſupplies. Julius de Medicis, who was choſen in his ſtead, by the name of Clement the ſeventh, aſſumed a conduct totally
e different from that of his predeceſſor. This prelate, perfectly acquainted with public affairs, obſerved that Adrian had too eaſily acknowledged the weakneſs and fallibility of the church; a practice contrary to the politics of former popes, who never aſſented to the reformation of abuſes, but to obtain ſome very important object. Charles had incurred the diſpleaſure of many of the princes of the empire, by making too great conceſſions to the court of Rome; yet would not Clement renew the truce his predeceſſor had made with the head of the empire. He gave the emperor to underſtand, that his intention was to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality; nor muſt his imperial majeſty reſent this conduct, which reſulted from his ſenſe of the duty of the common father of Chriſtendom; his deſire of uniting Chriſtian princes, and of oppoſing the quick growth of the Othoman power [l].

f The conduct of Clement extremely embarraſſed the duke of Bourbon. The emperor had given him, after his eſcape from France, the command of his forces in Italy; but he ſent him no money for the payment of the troops, nor was it poſſible for the duke to ſatisfy their demands, as neither the pope or the republic of Florence furniſhed their ſtipulated ſubſidies: he found means, however, to draw ſome money from the inhabitants of Milan; and at laſt he engaged the pope to give him twenty thouſand ducats, and to uſe his influence with the Florentines to remit fifty thouſand crowns, on condition that the duke kept the tranſaction a profound ſecret [m].

Mean time the Venetians had appointed eight of their chief citizens to compliment Clement on his acceſſion to the papal dignity. The ſenate was ſenſible of the importance of being on good terms with his holineſs: his abilities were unqueſtionable, and it was reaſon-ably preſumed that his policy would vary in many particulars from that of Adrian. The ambaſſadors aſſured the pope of the republic's eſteem of his private as well as public character; of their deſire of being united in intereſt with him; and of implicitly following the meaſures his holineſs would preſcribe. They were well received at Rome; but during their reſidence, Grimani, the doge died, after having governed for near two years (B), and was ſucceeded by Andrea Gritti, unanimouſly elected on account of his experience in public affairs, and the ability and integrity with which he had always conducted ſeveral of the higheſt offices. [n] a

ANDREA GRITTI, Doge LXXVII.

Andrea Gritti, doge LXXVII. A. D. 1524.

In this manner concluded the year 1523. In the beginning of the following, the duke of Bourbon, having been reinforced with ſix thouſand Germans, and joined at length by ſome Venetians, put himſelf in motion, at the head of thirty thouſand men. Bonivet, the French general, was now in his turn greatly perplexed how to act: he had but twenty thouſand men, and no money, which was a circumſtance common to both ſides. He had, indeed, engaged ten thouſand Swiſs and five thouſand Griſons; but could derive no great advantage from auxiliaries, whoſe courage was proportioned to the ſubſidy received. In this conjuncture he reſolved to give battle to the Imperialiſts, before they became acquainted with his ſituation; but the duke of Bourbon wiſely declined an action, though he was ſuperior in number, determining either to famiſh or diſperſe Bonivet's army by procraſtination [o]. b

In the mean time the Imperialiſts recovered Vercelli, by means of a ſecret correſpondence with Tetti, the chief of the Gibelline faction. Bonivet finding himſelf almoſt ſurrounded, had thoughts of retiring; but was prevented by Renca de Ceri, who promiſed to bring him five thouſand Griſons. The imperial general, receiving intelligence of their march, ſent Jean de Medicis with three hundred lances, ſix hundred choſen horſe, and ſeven thouſand foot, to intercept the detachment [p]; and he ſo harraſſed the Griſons with perpetual ſkirmiſhes before they reached Gravina, that, finding no French eſcort or money on their arrival, they returned home, giving Jean de Medicis a promiſe not to attempt any thing, unleſs they were purſued. Bourbon, being informed of this ſucceſs, wrote to Medicis to inveſt Biagraſſo, the only town the French now held upon the Theſin. Medicis after deſtroying the bridge which Bonivet had thrown over that river, attacked the town defended by one thouſand Italians, and took it in four hours: here he found ſome rich booty, of which the French had pillaged the Milanois. Bonivet's meaſures being entirely diſconcerted by the ſucceſs of the enemy, he returned to Novara, to facilitate his junction with ten thouſand Swiſs then on their march. Bourbon, to prevent his junction, encamped between Vercelli and the French, which motion obliged Bonivet to advance to Romagnano, where he threw a bridge of boats over the Secchia, and croſſed without oppoſition. The next night he joined the Swiſs, who charged him with a breach of promiſe, not only refuſing to act in conjunction with him before their ſubſidy was paid, but drawing off others of their countrymen, by their diſaffection [q]. Alarmed with this accident, Bonivet thought of nothing but repaſſing the Alps, and getting clear of Italy. The Imperialiſts ſtuck cloſe to his rear, and charged him with great vigour. Bonivet being wounded, was carried off the field, the chavalier Bayard commanding in his room, and reſiſting the enemy with great intrepidity, until he loſt his life. After this action the Imperialiſts laid ſiege to Lodi, where Buſſi d' Amboiſe commanded, and had it ſoon delivered to them by capitulation. The Venetians bore no ſhare either in the purſuit or ſiege, the proveditor refuſing to exceed the articles of the treaty, ſaying, that the ſenate had engaged only for the defence of the Milaneſe. Soliman's great preparations, his ambitious ſpirit, together with the pope's equivocal conduct, made the ſenate reſolve upon keeping as much aloof as was conſiſtent with the terms of their engagement with the emperor. It was apparent that, either for fear of the power of Francis, or diſtruſt of the emperor, Clement, ever ſince his acceſſion, inclined to the French intereſt. Though the republic had no doubt of the pontiff's intentions, yet not caring to quit the emperor's alliance before they were aſſured of the friendſhip of the French monarch, they kept their army in a ſtate of inaction, waiting the iſſue of the duke de Bourbon's ex- c d e f

(B) The government of this prince was too ſhort to afford inſtances by which to judge properly of his character. He is repreſented by Sanſovino and other hiſtorians, as a perſon of great prudence, gravity, and experience in public affairs. pedition

a pedition into Provence. The fruitleſſneſs of this ſcheme, and the ſudden march of Francis into Italy, his laying ſiege to Pavia, and at the ſame time, by another army, invading the kingdom of Naples, threw the republic into great perplexity. Both ſides ſolicited her friendſhip: ſhe was already in treaty with the emperor; but the Venetian forces in Italy were too weak to protect the Milaneſe, much leſs their own dominions, if, by her adherence to her engagements, the republic ſhould incur the reſentment of Francis. In ſhort, the ſenate entruſted the direction of their affairs to Clement, who ſecretly concluded a treaty between Francis and the Venetians [r].

By theſe temporizing meaſures, and political balancing, the ſenate procured ſome advantages, but little honour to the republic. The Venetian army ſtill continued inactive:
b their intentions were not known to the duke de Bourbon; ſo little, indeed, that he was ſoliciting the ſenate to ſend the army to his relief, as he was retiring before Francis: nor was the ſenate well determined whether they ſhould not comply with his requeſt at the very time when they had concluded a treaty with the enemy. In the battle which ſoon after enſued at Pavia, we do not find that the Venetians had any ſhare (C) on either ſide, or that their forces were at all preſent.

The victory at Pavia filled with conſternation and fear all the ſtates not in alliance with the emperor: upon this the Venetians propoſed to Clement the forming a league againſt the power of this monarch, who, by his victorious army, might ſoon render himſelf maſter of all Italy; but, during their negociations with his holineſs, the ſenate thought it adc viſeable to tamper with the emperor, and prevent an open rupture with that monarch before they were in a condition to reſiſt his power: for this purpoſe, Lorenzo Priuli and Andrea Novagiaro, were ſent to congratulate him upon his victory, and to excuſe their delay in not ſending forces to join his army. Mean time a treaty offenſive and defenſive was concluded between the pope, the Venetians, Francis Sforza, and Peſcara, who ſoon after treacherouſly revealed the whole to the emperor. Moron appeared in behalf of Sforza, Montiban repreſented his holineſs, and Santi had full powers to tranſact the affairs of the Venetians. The contents of the treaty were an alliance to expel the Imperialiſts out of Italy, to which the French were invited to accede: it was ſtipulated that the marquis of Peſcara ſhould be placed at the head of this alliance, and ſhould ſeparate himſelf with d all convenient expedition from the imperial forces, in order to oppreſs them the more eaſily, if they refuſed to aſſiſt him in the conqueſt of Naples [s].

A. D. 1525. Venetians in treaty with both the emperor and Francis.

League betwixt the pope, Venetians, Peſcara, and Sforza, againſt the emperor.

It was ſoon after that Peſcara, imagining he might draw conſiderable advantages from ſo important a diſcovery, ſent his chief confident Caſtallo to the emperor, to acquaint him with the whole tranſaction, and to aſſure Charles, that he had no other deſign in becoming a confederate in the alliance, than to procure the more certain intelligence. Charles wrote him back, to continue the correſpondence with the Venetians, the pope, and Moron; but a few days after returned Caſtallo, with orders to ſeize on the chancellor, and employ all means for the immediate reduction of Milan. The orders were punctually executed, and Moron impriſoned in the citadel of Pavia on the fourteenth of October; a circumſtance
e which entirely diſconcerted the Venetians, who now found themſelves expoſed to the emperor's reſentment, without being able to rely on the conſtancy of the pontiff. Peſcara demanded, that Milan, Cremona, and all the places ſituated on the Adda, ſhould be delivered to the emperor: to which Sforza, who was then ill of a fever, agreed, excepting Milan and Cremona; which, he ſaid, he could not ſurrender but to his imperial majeſty in perſon. He added, that Moron had taken upon him to negociate this alliance upon his own authority. Peſcara, upon this anſwer, threw off the maſk; convoked the eſtates of the Milaneſe; accuſed Sforza of high treaſon; and obliged the inhabitants of the duchy to take an oath of allegiance to the emperor. He even laid ſiege to the citadel of Cremona, and inveſted the city of Milan.

Emperor ſeizes on the duchy of Milan.

f The Venetians were no leſs embarraſſed than the pope and Francis Sforza. Martin Caraccioli, ambaſſador of Charles the fifth at Venice, was then negociating a peace, or rather an alliance between his maſter and the republic. By accepting the terms offered, the ſenate foreſaw their liberty would be in imminent danger; and by rejecting them, their ter-

(C) It would occaſion repeitions were we here to give the progreſs of this campaign, which will more properly be treated elſewhere. Sufficient it is, that, previous to the ſiege of Pavia, Francis deſired that the treaty with the pope and Venetians might be made public, which the former refuſed. The hiſtorians of the republic affirm that the ſenate aſſented to this requeſt; but no where do we find conſequences of their aſſent any way advantageous to Francis. The ſiege of Pavia was conducted ſolely by French troops, and the battle which followed, wherein that monarch was made priſoner by the Imperialiſts, was unfortunate chiefly on account of his inferiority. In ſhort, to the irreſolute conduct of the republic may he aſcribed the miſfortunes of that hero, and the ſucceſs of the emperor.

titories on the continent would be expoſed to all the horrors of war, as ſoon as Milan and Cremona were reduced. Leſs timid, and more penetrating than Clement, they told Caraccioli, that the late league was formed with no other purpoſe than to reinſtate Sforza in his dominions: that it was evident the emperor had no intention to accede to it, becauſe he deprived that prince of his dominions: that they could think of no alliance with his majeſty before Sforza was reſtored; and however great their reſpect was for the emperor, it was ſtill greater for truth, fidelity, and their promiſe. Had Clement the ſeventh given an equal proof of his conſtancy, the emperor would have been greatly perplexed how to act; but his holineſs, deſirous of ſhewing his refined policy, fell into the ſame ſnare in which he had been lately taken. Salveari, his legate in Spain, was negociating with Charles, at the ſame time that another of his miniſters was treating with France and the republic, to engage them in an alliance againſt that monarch. Clement attended with impatience for the iſſue of the legate's intrigues; and he had fixed the day for ſigning the treaty with the French and Venetians, when he received intelligence that his other legate had concluded affairs at Madrid [t], the emperor having agreed to oblige the duke of Ferrara to reſtore Reggio and Rubiera to the holy ſee. Nothwithſtanding this, upon Francis's refuſal to ratify the oppreſſive treaty of Madrid, by which he was ſet at liberty, the pope was no leſs eager than the Venetians to congratulate him on his return to his kingdom. He even commiſſioned his legate to conclude an alliance with Francis, the Venetians, and Sforza, againſt the emperor [u].

ONE does not know what to make of the politics of Rome and Venice during this period. Clement and the republic were every month changing ſides, forming new ſchemes, and entering into new engagements, which they never executed: they perceived that whether Francis or Charles became ſuperior, their power muſt ſink in proportion to the encreaſed influence of either of thoſe monarchs in Italy. As their conduct, therefore, depended upon conjunctures, the event of a battle or treaty between thoſe great rivals, it was neceſſarily unſteady, fickle, and changeable. Two things contributed to haſten the concluſion of this league with Francis: the firſt was, that the citadel of Milan which the Imperialiſts were then beſieging, muſt ſoon ſurrender without reinforcements, which neither his holineſs or the ſenate would venture to ſend, until they were aſſured of the aſſiſtance of the French monarch: the other was, that Francis imagined the equivalent of two millions for the duchy of Burgundy, which he offered the emperor, would have more weight after the publication of this alliance. Certain it is, that he ſigned the treaty of Cognac with this view chiefly.

MONCADA, the emperor's ambaſſador at Rome, laboured with great diligence to detach his holineſs and the republic from Francis; but the ſenate kept Clement firm to his engagements: and as for themſelves, they told the ambaſſador, that when his imperial majeſty was inclined to treat of peace upon reaſonable terms, he would always find the republic well diſpoſed to an union; but that it became his imperial majeſty to declare his ſerious intentions by actions rather than mere profeſſions; that if he would raiſe the ſiege of Milan, reinſtate Sforza in his dominions, and perform the articles of their laſt contract with him, it would then be proper time to talk of laying down arms, and the tranquility of Italy. Moncada's anſwer being couched in general terms, it was evident that Charles had nothing leſs in view than to accede to thoſe propoſals. The confederates in the mean time ſent an ambaſſy to England, to invite that monarch into the league, or at leaſt to uſe his influence with the emperor to releaſe the hoſtages given by Francis, and renounce the article of the treaty of Madrid which regarded Burgundy, for a valuable conſideration [w].

BEFORE the event of his ambaſſy was known, the league was publiſhed; and the Venetians ſent into the field an army of ten thouſand foot, nine hundred lances, and eight hundred light horſe, taking at the ſame time a ſtrong body of Swiſs into the pay of the republic. Upon the junction of this army with the Swiſs, it was determined to undertake the relief of Milan, while the marquis of Saluſſes, with one thouſand French infantry, and a proportionable number of cavalry, was to lay ſiege to Navarro and Alexandria. A general rendezvous was appointed at Chiari, from whence the army was to march as conjunctures might require.

WHILE the army was getting ready, Malateſte Baillon, with a detachment of Venetians, entered upon action, having found means to ſeize upon Lodi, although defended by a numerous garriſon, and provided with all the neceſſaries to ſuſtain a ſiege. Immediately upon this ſucceſs, the whole army, croſſing the Po, joined the pope's forces, and marched towards Milan. The city was in the hands of the Imperialiſts; but the exorbitant contributions a they had raiſed for the ſupport of the army, had ſo alienated the minds of the citizens; that the duke d'Urbini, who commanded the Venetians, had no doubt of an inſurrection in his favour. Milan was accordingly inveſted, and the ſiege carried on with great vigour, when Urbini received intelligence that the duke de Bourbon had thrown himſelf, with a conſiderable reinforcement, into the city; that he had brought money for the payment of the troops; and that the Imperialiſts were aſſembling a powerful army x (D). After weighing circumſtances, the duke determined to raiſe the ſiege; which he did accordingly, retiring unmoleſted to Marignan. The ſenate had conceived great expectations from this enterprize; now they were chagrined upon the retreat of the army. The duke d' Urbini ſent Lodovico Gonzaga to juſtify himſelf at Venice; and his reaſons appeared ſo convincing, that the ſenate was

b perfectly ſatisfied with his conduct. But the caſe was otherwiſe with the pope, who greatly reſented not only this particular action, but the general behaviour of the duke. His holineſs was outrageous that his officers ſhould be ſo entirely neglected by Urbini, and never conſulted upon affairs of the greateſt moment. To appeaſe Clement, and prevent diviſions in the army, the ſenate ordered Urbini, for the future, to hold a council with the pope's chief officers, particularly his general Franciſco Guicciardini, and to undertake nothing without his concurrence y.

The confederates equip a fleet.

At this time a fleet was equipped to annoy, in conjunction with the pope's gallies, the coaſts of the enemy. Divers propoſals were made concerning the courſe they ſhould ſteer, and their firſt effort. The pope urged the fleet's ſailing to Apulia, to fruſtrate the c deſigns of the Coloneſſi, who had there aſſembled an army. Francis and the Venetians joined in a contrary opinion, imagining an attack upon Genoa of more conſequence to the common cauſe. As Francis agreed to ſtrengthen this armament by a powerful ſquadron, the admiral was appointed by his recommendation, and Pedro Navaro made commander of the combined fleet. After various delays on the ſide of Francis, and ſuſpicions on that of the pope and republic, at length Armiero the proveditor ſailed from Corfu with thirteen gallies to Teracino, where he met with Doria, and eleven of the pope's gallies. Hence they proceeded to Leghorn, where they joined Pedro with four French galleons and ſixteen light gallies: here it was determined to reduce Genoa under the ſubjection of France, for the benefit of the confederacy: firſt they ſailed to Porto Venieri, which, with all the other towns to Monaco, they ſoon red duced. The fleet divided, the Venetian and pope's gallies ſteering to Porto Fino, and Pedro Navaro, with the French ſquadron, to Savona, which immediately ſurrendered. Their firſt deſign was to prevent ſuccours by ſea from being ſent to Genoa, knowing the city was ill ſupplied: by this means they expected ſoon to compel the inhabitants to accept an eaſy capitulation. In all probability the admirals muſt have ſucceeded, ſo well had they taken

(D) It muſt be obſerved that Baillon's ſucceſs at Lodi, was ſufficient to reduce all the other towns of the Milaneſe, had the Italians either conduct or courage to purſue the advantage. This city opened a paſſage more commodious than the river Adda; it prevented the emperor's troops from all communication with the garriſon of Cremona, and from ravaging the Parmeſan and Placentin, and furniſhed the confederates with ſupplies from the fertile country of Milan, as far as the gates of the capital. Had Urbini marched directly thither, he would have foiled all the vigilance of Levé, the governor. That general had under him but three hundred lances, three thouſand Germans, and five thouſand Spaniards; an army inſufficient to carry on the ſiege of the citadel, to reſtrain the citizens, extremely incenſed againſt the Imperialiſts, and defend themſelves againſt a ſuperior army. But the duke d'Urbini, overlooking thoſe advantages, declared he would not inveſt Milan, until he was joined by a body of Swiſs, to ſupport the ſhock of the enemy's infantry. The pope's officers remonſtrated in vain, that the opportunity would be loſt; that Levé would receive ſuccours; that they could not ſally out, for fear of being attacked in the rear by the garriſon of the citadel, with every other argument that could poſſibly engage him in the undertaking; but he perſiſted in his reſolution to run no hazards; and the officers of the holy ſee were compelled to deſiſt, the pope having ſubjected them to the authority of the duke. Thus the fair occaſion elapſed without an atrempt made, when two hundred of the citadel garriſon made their way ſword in hand through the lines of the Imperialiſts, and acquainted the army, that the citadel was at the laſt extremity, they having made their eſcape for want of proviſions. This at length determined the duke to advance within a league of the city, where he was joined by a body of Swiſs. He then called a council of war, to deliberate on which ſide he ſhould make the attack; but during the ſitting of the council, the duke of Bourbon reinforced Levé with eight hundred Spaniards, and a ſum of money. The next day Urbini planted a battery againſt the Roman gate of the city; and the ſiege was going on briſkly, when the ſucceeding night the Imperialiſts made a furious ſally upon his artillery; but after a warm diſpute were repulſed. Upon this it was that the duke d'Urbini reſolved ro raiſe the ſiege, as if he had actuallybeen defeated, and had loſt his artillery. When the retreat was ſounded, Guicciardin, an officer in the pope's ſervice, ran to his tent, and told him, the confederates would for ever loſe their reputation, if they retired for ſo ſlight a cauſe, eſpecially as the enemy was repulſed: he ſaid, the conſequence of a retreat would be the immediate ſurrender of the citadel. But he was anſwered coldly by the duke, that it was a general's duty to be careful of the army committed to his charge, and to place it beyond the reach of danger. Jean de Medicis, however, did not decamp before ſun-ſet. He commanded the pope's infantry, and had once thoughts of continuing the ſiege; but finding his force too ſmall, he retreated with drums beating, without being purſued by the Imperialiſts (1).

their meaſures, had not jealouſies among themſelves ariſen: Navaro accuſed Doria of treachery, and permitting ſhips laden with proviſions to enter the city; and Doria envied the ſuperiority given Navaro. Genoa likewiſe received ſmall ſuccours from the continent, but nothing equal to the exigences of the city. For their ſecurity towards the ſea, the inhabitants had ſtationed ſome large ſhips with heavy artillery at the mouth of the harbour: beſides theſe, they gave Guiſtiniani the command of ſix light gallies, to ſkirmiſh with the confederate fleet, within reach of the cannon of the larger ſhips, in order to divert their attention from the expected convoys. The confederate troops being landed, the city was inveſted on all ſides, and the batteries played with great fury on the walls. To ſecure themſelves from the attacks of the peaſants from without, Navaro ordered a trench to be formed round the camp. The garriſon, finding itſelf thus cooped up, determined upon making a ſally; but the confederates, having intelligence or ſuſpicion of their deſign, landed Doria and Grimani, with eight hundred more troops and ſome pieces of artillery: beſides, their light gallies were drawn up along ſhore in ſuch a manner, as to bring their cannon to bear on the garriſon, if they ſtirred. However, without being diſcouraged, the Genoeſe made a vigorous ſally, and were bravely received: the combat continued obſtinate for ſome time, when at length the beſieged were driven back within their walls with great loſs [z]. Notwithſtanding this defeat, the count Gabriel Martinenga bravely defended the city until the following year, when Lautrec ſent Cæſar Fregoſa with a ſtrong reinforcement to the beſiegers, which obliged the count to ſurrender. Martinenga, captain-general of the Genoeſe, was made priſoner, Theodore Trivulcio appointed governor in the name of the French king, and the citadel, into which Adorni the doge had retired, was ſurrendered a few days after [a].

The forces landed, and the city inveſted.

MEAN time the retreat of the duke d'Urbini with the confederate army was attended by the ſurrender of the citadel of Milan, three days after Sforza had obtained terms more reaſonable and eaſy than he could expect, conſidering the condition of the garriſon at the time he ſigned the capitulation: he was in want of ammunition, proviſion, and men, while thoſe that remained were quite exhauſted and ſpent with the tedioufneſs of the ſiege. The pope had alſo been unfortunate in his deſign upon Sienna: but beſides the retreat of Urbini, and the ill ſucceſs of the enterprize againſt Sienna, two other circumſtances contributed to diſappoint the hopes, and reverſe the former ſucceſs of the confederates: the one was the diſturbances excited by the Colonni at Rome. Clement the ſeventh, by the mediation of Moncada, the Imperial miniſter, had been reconciled to his family, having conſented to an interview with Veſpaſian Colonna, for this purpoſe. An agreement was ſigned, in which the pope engaged, for certain conſiderations ſpecified, to protect them againſt their rivals the Urſini: but about a month after, Veſpaſian permitted his couſin, the cardinal Colonna, to advance with eight hundred horſe and three thouſand foot, and take poſſeſſion of three of the gates of the city. Clement had only time to retire to the caſtle of St. Angelo; upon which Moncada, who was privy to the deſign of the Colonni, went to him, and after repreſenting his danger, adviſed him to a truce for four months with the emperor, to which the other confederates might accede if they pleaſed. No ſooner was this truce ſigned, than Clement recalled his troops under the duke d'Urbini; which greatly diminiſhed his ſtrength, and gave the firſt fatal blow to the confederacy [b]. Another cauſe of its decline was the arrival of George Fronſperg, with a body of four thouſand Lanſquenets, levied at his own expence in Germany. This corps the archduke Ferdinand joined with a conſiderable corps of cavalry: Fronſperg, at their head, paſſed the mountains of Trent, and arrived in the Mantuan, in ſpite of all the oppoſition made by the Venetians. But before we mention this expedition, it may be proper to ſpeak of the motions of the Venetian army after the retreat from Milan, and taking of Monza.

DUKE d'Urbini had taken the reſolution to return once more for the relief of the citadel, when intelligence was received of its ſurrender. Upon this he turned his thoughts to the ſiege of Cremona; to inveſt which city he ſent a ſtrong detachment under Baillon, who acquitted himſelf ſo well at Lodi. Baillon found the city fortified with a double trench, and well provided; nevertheleſs, he inveſted it with great diligence and vigour: but, finding his troops unequal to the undertaking, he ſent to Urbini for a reinforcement of infantry, which was complied with. After the ſiege had continued for ſome days, the duke grew impatient about the conſequences: he knew how much a ſecond diſappointment of this nature would prejudice his reputation and hurt the cauſe, and therefore reſolved to direct the ſiege in perſon. Leaving the Venetian cavalry, and the Swiſs, to the number of thirteen thouſand, to proceed to Milan, he marched with all the Venetian infantry to Cremona: his batteries played with great fury for ſeveral days, but without effecting a breach, upon which he determined to undermine the walls: by this means ſeveral large breaches were made,

a made, which he ſtormed with ſo much ſucceſs, that the garriſon hung out a flag of truce, and the city was ſurrendered upon moderate conditions [c].

NOTWITHSTANDING this ſucceſs, the above circumſtances weighed down the balance againſt the republic: Urbini's army was much diminiſhed by the retreat of the eccleſiaſtical forces, while the duke of Bourbon was in a fair way of being greatly ſtrengthened by the junction of Fronſperg. Before the truce between Clement and the emperor was concluded, Fronſperg had arrived in the Mantuan: here Jean de Medicis was detached againſt him, who, imagining the Lanſquenets had no artillery, approached in reconnoitring them ſo near, that he was ſhot in the knee by a cannon-ball, of which he died. After the death of the brave Medicis, no one preſumed to oppoſe the march of the Germans, who arrived without farther b obſtruction in the Placentin, where they joined the duke of Bourbon.

The pope's forces recalled, in conſequence of a truce with the emperor.

ON this junction the duke propoſed going directly to Milan, to prevent the deſigns of Urbini; but Fronſperg anſwered fiercely, that the Germans would not move an inch farther till their ſubſidy was paid: to appeaſe him Bourbon was under the neceſſity of coining the church-plate, and putting the rich inhabitants to the torture to extort their money. After this he proceeded on his march; but as he made ſeveral turnings from the direct road, the pope began to entertain apprehenſions leſt he might enter the territories of the holy ſee, or ſtrike off towards Bologna, and from thence to Tuſcany. With theſe ſuſpicions he requeſted the ſenate that they would order Urbini to croſs the Po with all expedition, to ſecure Tuſcany and the eccleſiaſtical territory; but as the ſenate was under ſome fears for their c own dominions, they did not chuſe to comply wholly with his deſire: yet, willing to give his holineſs all the ſatisfaction they could, conſiſtently with their own ſafety, Lodovico Piſani was ſent with a ſtrong detachment for the defence of the pope's dominions; the marquis of Saluſſes with the French and Swiſs followed, after which Vitturi the proveditor croſſed the Po, with the reſt of the army. To prevent the Florentines from entering into precipitate meaſures out of dread of an enemy who ſeemed ready to fall upon Tuſcany, the ſenate ſent Marco Foſcari to acquaint that republic with the ſteps taken for their ſecurity, and to keep them firm in their intereſt [d].

BEFORE we conclude the tranſactions of this year, we muſt take ſome notice of the naval affairs. A great fleet of forty men of war was fitted out at Carthagena for the relief of d Genoa, which was reduced to the greateſt extremity, and at laſt taken by Navaro before this fleet put to ſea. As intelligence of the ſurrender of the city was not yet received in Spain, the viceroy of Naples, who commanded the armament, ſteered directly for the gulph of Genoa, where he fell in with Navaro, who bravely attacked him with ſeventeen gallies, and obliged him to ſheer off. Towards the end of the engagement a ſtorm aroſe, and ſoon effected what Navaro had left undone; for the Spaniſh navy was totally diſperſed, and many of the ſhips periſhed. As only the French ſquadron was engaged in this rencounter, the council of ten recalled Armiero the Venetian admiral, for not aſſiſting Navaro; but he cleared himſelf to the ſatisfaction of every one, it being impoſſible for him to beat up againſt the wind. The viceroy arrived with a part of his fleet in the port of Sienna; ſome veſſels got ſafe e to Cayetta, and a few made the ports of Sicily. As they had a ſtrong body of infantry on board, their arrival in Italy greatly diſturbed the Venetians; but their courage revived on the arrival of Marco de Cere and Vitelli with the pope's forces. Previous to this, the viceroy, having joined the Coloneſſi, who were again in arms, laid ſiege to Froſſolona: he was battering the town, and ready to give the aſſault, when the confederates arrived opportunely, and obliged him to decamp with ſuch precipitation, as to ſet fire to his magazines.

SO deſirous were the confederates of puſhing the good fortune with which the preceding year concluded, that they determined upon the invaſion of Naples in the depth of winter, amidſt extreme cold, and every inconvenience of a rigorous ſeaſon. About the end of January, the ſenate ſent orders to Auguſtino de Nulla, appointed proveditor in the room of f Armiero, to ſail to Civita Vecchia: here he was to join the pope's fleet, and from thence proceed in concert to Naples. While the Venetians were embarking the land-forces, the earl of Vaudemont arrived from France, and engaged as a volunteer in the expedition. Renca de Cere, mean while, entered the Abruzzo with ſix thouſand men, where he ſoon made himſelf maſter of Aquila. Doria ſailed with part of the fleet to Pozzuolo, which he attacked with great vigour; but finding a ſtouter reſiſtance than he expected, he abandoned the enterprize, although his ſucceſs would have been attended with very ſignal advantages to the allies, on account of the harbour of Baia. When Doria was reinforced he attacked and took Stabia, in leſs than two days, with Coraſſa, and five hundred men priſoners. On the tenth day after the arrival of the fleet in the gulph of Naples, Sorrento was ſtormed and g taken; in conſequence of which ſeveral other ſea-port towns and forts ſurrendered without exchanging a blow.

The ſucceſs of the confederates on the coaſt of Naples.

Now the confederate fleet, meeting with no obſtruction, approached ſo near the pier of Naples, that their cannon played with ſome ſucceſs upon the walls. Various opinions were delivered among the officers concerning the expediency of beſieging the capital, ſome affirming, that the ſurrender of Naples would be followed by the reduction of the whole kingdom. No time, they ſaid, ſhould be loſt while the city was under the conſternation their ſudden appearance muſt have occaſioned, and ſo ill provided. Others, on the contrary, were of opinion, that they ought to wait for the arrival of Renca de Cerè, their forces not being ſufficient to inveſt ſo large a city. As to the delay, they ſaid, it would be an advantage, ſince the garriſon was in great want of bread, which alone might produce a revolution in their favour, the inhabitants being in general diſaffected to the Spaniſh government: however, the former ſentiments prevailing, an herald was ſent to ſummon the city. Moncada, who commanded for the emperor, inſtead of yielding to this ſummons, marched out with two thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, to obſtruct the enemy's approaches. This brought on a ſkirmiſh to the advantage of Baillon, who commanded the Venetians, and took ſome field pieces belonging to the beſieged, driven back to the city. Notwithſtanding this fortunate beginning, the enterprize failed, either from want of money, or, what is more probable, in conſequence of the late truce between the pope and the emperor. Certain it is, that the eccleſiaſtical forces not only refuſed to act in concert with the Venetians, but many went over to the enemy. It is likewiſe affirmed, that the former truce was extended by a new agreement between his holineſs and the viceroy, which obliged the Venetians totally to give up thoughts of the ſiege. The pontiff was greatly over-reached in this new convention; for having diſbanded his army, he was left expoſed to the mercy of the enemy: the conſequence of which was the taking of Rome, the impriſonment of his perſon, and the intire ruin of his affairs [e].

THE ſenate of Venice remonſtrated to Clement upon the imprudence of his conduct, which he diſregarded, as proceeding from private views: but that they might not be wanting to themſelves, orders were diſpatched to the duke of Urbini to join the marquis of Saluſſes, and oppoſe the duke of Bourbon, who with the Imperial army, was in full march to Rome. The Imperial army had, for ſome time, taken up free quarters in Tuſcany, and this oppreſſion, together with the apprehenſions he was under for the lands of the church, it was that induced Clement to haſten the agreement with the viceroy, which he thought would perfectly ſecure his territories. He perceived, when too late, his error. The duke of Bourbon marched with prodigious expedition to Rome, deſtroying all the country, to prevent his being purſued by the Venetian army. This had its effect; the duke d'Urbini could proceed no farther than Viterbo, for want of proviſion and forage. Bourbon advanced to Rome, attacked it, and was killed: but the prince of Orange taking the command, the city was reduced, pillaged, and given up a prey to the cruelty and rapaciouſneſs of the Imperialiſts [f].

THE duke of Urbini's conduct is deſervedly blamed on this occaſion; had he advanced, he might, with the greateſt facility, have ruined the Imperial army, unmindful of every thing but plunder. 'Tis true, he pretended the want of ſubſiſtence for his army, and the truce the pope had made with the emperor, by which he forfeited the protection of the republic. But his firſt objection might be obviated by making a ſmall circuit into a more fertile and better provided country; and the other had no weight, ſince his buſineſs was to deſtroy, if poſſible, the Imperial army, without regarding the advantage the pope might deduce from it, as long as the republic was benefited. It muſt be owned the duke d'Urbini loſt ſeveral advantages during the courſe of this war, either through want of courage, or at leaſt from too cautious and ſecure a conduct. His meaſures wanted vigour, and the opportunity was often loſt in the time he took to deliberate. The ſenate, grieved at the ſucceſs of the Imperialiſts, the captivity of Clement, and the pillage of Rome, diſpatched immediate orders to advance towards the city, and, by his army, give weight to their negociations to procure the liberty of the pontiff. But it was now too late; the pope and Rome were in the power of the emperor, and his victorious army elated with plunder and ſucceſs. A new levy of troops was likewiſe made to oppoſe Antonio de Leva, upon the confines of Crema and Lodi; while their ambaſſadors in France and England took every meaſure to make the firſt proceed with vigour in the war, and the latter to break with the emperor. It muſt be owned, that the ſpirit of the republic ſeemed to be exerted, upon this occaſion, in a manner worthy of their antient fame, their free conſtitution, and their conſtant regard to the liberties of Italy. The fleet being greatly weakened by ſickneſs, which prevailed among the ſeamen and land-forces, an augmentation of the marine was decreed. Beſides the ten thouſand Swiſs which they had perſuaded Francis the firſt to engage, the ſenate took an equal number into their own ſervice. The beſt officers were received into their pay;

The ſenate ſends orders to Urbini to march to the relief of Rome.

The vigorous meaſures of the Venetians.

among the reſt the count Gaiazzo and the marquis de Palavicini. To Francis Sforza they
a lent ten thouſand ducats, to reinforce the body under him by new levies; and garriſons were put into the towns of Romagnia and Ravenna [e].

In this manner did the republic take her meaſures for oppoſing the power of Charles the fifth, and procuring the liberty of Clement. In the mean while, the duke d'Urbini was preparing for executing the orders of the ſenate: he ſent Baillon with a detachment to reduce Peruſia, which he ſoon performed, placing in it a Venetian garriſon. Thence he marched to Orvietto, where he was ſtrengthened by an addition of ſome French and eccleſiaſtical troops: upon this he aſſembled a council, read the ſenate's inſtructions for the relief of the pontiff, and deſired the advice of the principal officers concerning the poſſibility
b of the enterprize. It was the opinion of the proveditor Piſani, and all the other officers, that the ſenate ſhould be obeyed, and even a battle hazarded, if neceſſary. Vitturi alone oppoſed this advice, affirming that their army was neither numerous enough, nor ſufficiently diſciplined to engage the Imperial forces, who were old experienced ſoldiers, now elated and fluſhed with victory. Urbini, who was not of an enterpriſing genius, was eaſily perſuaded into an opinion which had leſs danger, though leſs honour, than that of Piſani and the council. Without farther deliberation the ſenate's inſtructions were laid aſide as impracticable and hazardous in the preſent conjuncture: he contented himſelf with ſending Bazolo with a body of horſe towards Rome, to aſſiſt any opportunity which might offer to the pope of making his eſcape, and conducting him to the army: but Bazolo ſoon returned c without effecting any thing, having found that the Imperialiſts had ſurrounded the caſtle of St. Angelo with ſtrong trenches [h].

Incensed at theſe delays the ſenate recalled, ſuperſeded, and impriſoned Vitturi for the advice he had given Urbini, while that noble officer found means to juſtify his own conduct. More peremptory orders were then ſent to the duke, to attempt, at all events, the ſetting Clement at liberty; but this he abſolutely refuſed, inſiſting that his army was unequal to ſuch an undertaking, and offering rather to reſign than occaſion ſuch a calamity to the republic, as muſt neceſſarily attend his defeat. So ſpeciouſly did he cover his timidity with the cloak of prudence, that the ſenate was appeaſed, and he confirmed two years longer in the command [i].

Vitturi is recalled, and impriſoned.

d FRANCIS the firſt was making great preparations by ſea and land for the relief of Italy, and the Venetians taking every poſſible meaſure to oppoſe the emperor; but the prince of Orange was, in the mean while, increaſing his forces, and living luxuriouſly upon the ſpoils of Rome, and, indeed, the riches of all Europe, which the popes had amaſſed in that capital. The retreat of the duke d'Urbini to the frontiers of Sienna, left the Imperialiſts in full ſecurity; a circumſtance which Urbini might have improved to his advantage, had he been of a leſs timid diſpoſition [k]. His army conſiſted of two thouſand men at arms, one thouſand three hundred light horſe, two thouſand Lanſquenets, an equal number of Swiſs, and ten thouſand Italian foot: beſides theſe the marquis of Saluſſes had with him ſeven thouſand French and Swiſs infantry, with a proportionable number of horſe; yet was nothing ate tempted either for the honour of the republic, the pope's enlargement, or the freedom of Italy. True it is, that peſtilence and famine greatly afflicted the troops; but if the enemy ſuffered leſs by the latter, they were, at leaſt equally miſerable in the former reſpect. The whole ſeemed now to depend on the French and Engliſh, between whom and the emperor negociations had been carrying on for ſeveral months. As neither ſide would recede from the terms propoſed, Francis and cardinal Wolſey held a conference at Amiens, upon the means of proſecuting the war with Charles the fifth, which was now deemed unavoidable: here they ſigned three different treaties, which were little more than explications, modifications, and enlargements of a former treaty, concluded the thirteenth of April immediately preceding [l].

Peſtilence and famine prevail among the troops.

f At this time Francis ſent Lautrec at the head of an army into Italy, with which he croſſed the Alps in the month of Auguſt: it was compoſed of twenty-ſix thouſand men; that is, ſix thouſand Lanſquenets, under count de Vaudemont; ſix thouſand Gaſcons, under Pedro Navaro; four thouſand French commanded by the ſieur Baries; together with ten thouſand Swiſs: Mondragon conducted a numerous artillery; and the whole, when joined by the marquis of Saluſſes, formed a very conſiderable army. Lautrec firſt laid ſiege to the citadel of Boſco, in the territory of Alexandria, which he took after a ſiege of ten days, making the garriſon, conſiſting of one thouſand German and Italian infantry, priſoners of war: he then inveſted Alexandria, where he was attended with equal ſucceſs: the city he put into the hands of Sforza's officers. After theſe conqueſts the Venetians and Sforza preſſed Lautrec to g undertake the ſiege of Milan: others were of opinion, that he had better march to Rome,

and ſet the pope at liberty; and they enforced this piece of advice by inſiſting upon its being the chief object of the treaty with England, Venice, and Sforza. On the contrary, the ſenate repreſented that Milan was but weakly garriſoned, and that in conſequence of its reduction the Imperialiſts would evacuate Rome and the kingdom of Naples: however, Lautrec oppoſed to both opinions the poſitive orders of the kings of England and France, ſaying, that while thoſe monarchs ſupported the burden of the war, it was no more than reaſonable their inſtructions ſhould be obeyed; that as to procuring the pope's enlargement, it could no way be done ſo effectually as by reducing the kingdom of Naples, which was in want of men, money, and proviſions. The truth was, that Francis was unwilling to beſtow any trouble in beſieging Milan, which was by treaty to revert to Sforza, and this made the Venetians equally indifferent about the ſucceſs of Lautrec's expedition to Naples [m]. a b

On the twenty-eighth of October Lautrec paſſed the Po, in the face of the garriſon and cannon of St. John's fort, where he waited for reinforcements of Lanſquenets and Swiſs. The ſlowneſs of his march occaſioned a report that he had ſecret orders to precipitate nothing: he ſtayed for ſome time about Parma and Placentia, under pretence of drawing the duke of Ferrara into the confederacy. Both that prince and the marquis of Mantua did, in effect, quit the emperor's party to join with the allies: all which advantages afforded a plauſible pretext for Lautrec's meaſures; yet it is certain the true motives of his delay proceeded from ſecret orders to wait the emperor's final anſwer to the propoſals made to him by the miniſters of England and France [n].

Nor did the duke d'Urbini make more haſte with the Venetian army to the theatre of action: he remained near Montifiaſcone quite inactive, notwithſtanding the weakneſs of the enemy, and the approach of Lautrec, furniſhed him with a fair opportunity of ſtriking ſome deciſive ſtroke. His conduct raiſed ſuſpicion of his fidelity at Venice, in conſequence of which a guard was put over his wife and family at Murana: intelligence of which coming to the duke, he requeſted leave to appear before the ſenate to juſtify himſelf. So ſpecious was his manner, that the ſenate, ſtill convinced of his innocence, continued him at the head of the army, and removed the guards placed over his family [o] (E). c

Winter now approaching, negotiations for a general peace were renewed. The ſenate willingly liſtened to pacific meaſures, the finances of the republic being wholly exhauſted by ſupporting the burthen of a war, in which, however, ſhe was only an auxiliary. Propoſals were made by his moſt Chriſtian majeſty and the republic, that the emperor ſhould deliver up the royal hoſtages of France, ſet the pope at liberty, reinſtate Sforza, and reſtore all he had taken from the church. Although the emperor did not entirely reject the terms, yet, by demanding a prodigious ſum of money from the Venetians, he kept the treaty in ſuſpence, determining to act according as circumſtances might appear more or leſs favourable towards the end of the campaign. It was evident from his conduct, that Charles was deſirous of appropriating the dutchy of Milan to himſelf, ſince he conſtantly referred the diſputes with Sforza to be decided by arbitration afterwards, while his troops ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the dutchy. As the emperor would not renounce this point, the negociations were broke off, and new preparations for continuing the war ſet on foot [p]. d e

Propoſals to the emperor for a peace.

A. D. 1528. No ſooner was the pope ſet at liberty, than the deſign he had formed of re-eſtabliſhing his family at Florence, made him intirely alter the maxims of his former policy: his long impriſonment had afforded him leiſure to reflect upon the ill-judged meaſures by which he had been hitherto governed. Thus, when the ambaſſadors of France, England, and the republic waited on him at Orvietto, to ſolicit his concurrence to the league, he pretended it was neceſſary to the well-being of Chriſtendom that there ſhould be a mediator of differences, who would labour for the public tranquility; and that nothing could be more ſuitable to his circumſtances, or agreeable to his diſpoſition, than ſuch an office: nevertheleſs, he gave them to underſtand, that if Lautrec obliged the Imperialiſts to abandon Rome, he would take other meaſures. In ſhort, he ſaid enough to convince the allies, that his ſole aim was to deliver the church out of the hands of the emperor, and then to embrace that ſide which promiſed faireſt for his intereſt and ſecurity [q]. f

LAUTREC, who penetrated the views of his holineſs, did not think proper to pay implicit obedience. Departing from Bologna in January, he took the route of Naples, after a ſending Vaudemont and Tremouille to force the pontiff to a final declaration. Clement ſtill found means to excuſe himſelf; he ſaw all Europe in motion, and deſired to wait the iſſue of this war, in order to take his meaſures more ſecurely. In fact, he made uſe of a variety of expedients, arts, and wiles, to avoid diſobliging either party. In the mean time, he had the modeſty to demand of the Venetians that they would ſurrender to him Cervia and Ravenna; a requeſt no way agreeable to the ſenate, or to that humility his holineſs expreſſed. The matter was debated, and it was concluded to ſend an ambaſſy to the pope, to deſire he would firſt terminate other affairs, or at leaſt grant ſome equivalent.

In his courſe he fell in with a Turkiſh man of war, which he engaged, miſtaking her for a pirate. The battle was bloody; but terminated in the defeat of Marcello, three of whoſe ſhips were taken. The ſenate ſummoned him before the avogari; but the Grand Seignior, pleaſed with their reſpect to his flag, returned the ſhips, with aſſurances of his friendſhip. Upon this the ſenate decreed an ambaſſy of thanks (1).

LAUTREC departing from Bologna, as we have mentioned, arrived in February in the b Abruzzo. Apoli, Aquila, and all the neighbouring towns, opened their gates, and received him as their deliverer. It was not without great difficulty, that the prince of Orange could prevail on the imperial army to depart from Rome and take the field, where, for nine or ten months, they had lived luxuriouſly in free quarters, and the full exerciſe of every violence they choſe to commit: however, as he was not imcumbered with artillery, the prince ſoon got the ſtart of Lautrec, who, notwithſtanding, advanced to Pouille, which ſurrendered without terms. He would infallibly have reduced the whole country by the terror of his arms, had not the prince of Orange, with intention to ſecure the road through Barri, encamped upon an eminence defended by the cannon of Trani. But he was ſoon obliged to decamp with precipitation, and expoſe himſelf to the hazard of a defeat, had he been purſued; in- c ſtead of which Lautrec amuſed his army with battering the walls of Melfi, where Caraccioli commanded a garriſon of three thouſand men. The governor withſtood the firſt aſſault: but at the ſecond he was forced, and the garriſon, with near four thouſand of the inhabitants, were put to the ſword. The prince of Melfi was made priſoner of war, and his wife and children, who had retired into the citadel, ſurrendered at diſcretion [r].

No ſooner had Melfi been reduced, than Borletta, Trani, Venoſa, Capua, Nola, Accora, Averſa, and all the other cities beſides Manfredonia, Gaieta, and Naples, yielded to Lautrec. On the other hand, the Venetians, having reduced Monopoli, ſent a reinforcement of two thouſand men to the French army. Lautrec leaving them for the protection of his conqueſts, marched with the reſt of his forces to Naples. While he was encamped before this d city, a ſquadron of ſixteen Venetian gallies came along the coaſt of Apuglia, to aſſiſt in the conqueſt of the kingdom by the reduction of other places ceded to them by the treaty. Theſe were Otranto, Brundaſiacar, Monopoli, Trani, Nola, and Pulignan, two of which were already ſurrendered. They were proceeding with great rapidity, when a requeſt from Lautrec arrived, that they would ſpeedily join the ſquadron under Doria, and jointly block up Naples by ſea. Pietro Landi then haſtened his meaſures, and, in a few days, made himſelf maſter of all the cities ſtipulated by treaty to be ceded to the republic [s].

Almoſt all the kingdom of Naples ſubmits to Lautrec.

BEFORE Landi quitted the coaſt of Apuglia, the viceroy formed a ſcheme for ſurpriſing the French ſquadron under Doria. It conſiſted but of eight ſmall gallies, to attack which he equipped, with great ſecrecy and expedition, ſix gallies, four pinks, and ſix brigantines, e well manned, and carrying a thouſand harquebuſiers over and above their complement of ſeamen. The command of this armament was given to an officer named Gobbo, remarkable for his ſkill and experience in naval affairs, attended by the marquis de Guaſt, with a number of volunteers Spaniſh and German. Gobbo ſteered out of the harbour; but Doria, having had intelligence from Lautrec of his deſign, took on board four hundred land forces, and, weighing anchor, ſtood out to ſea in line of battle. Both admirals diſplayed abundance of military ſkill to keep the windward, and gain other advantages, when at laſt they engaged with great reſolution. Doria began the attack, and poured in vollies of great and ſmall ſhot with ſuch fury and judgment, that the enemy were forced to change their diſpoſition, and bring up freſh ſhips. Upon this the battle was renewed, and ſupported, for ſef veral hours, with great vigour and equality, when the Venetian fleet coming up, attacked Gobbo's rear, and ſoon turned the ſcale [t]. Gobbo was defeated with great loſs, and the combined fleet ſailed triumphant into the harbour of Naples. 'Tis true, Doria's fleet and his own ſhip ſuffered greatly both in hull and rigging: his captain was killed, with a number of ſoldiers and ſeamen; the reſt of the ſquadron loſt in proportion; but the joy of victory compenſated this misfortune. On the enemy's ſide were killed Hugo de Moncada, Cæſar Fermancoſca, with about one thouſand ſoldiers and mariners. The marquis de Guaſt, Santa Cruz, Colonna, Serenon, and the beſt officers of Naples, were made priſoners. By this victory the city was totally blocked up on the ſea-ſide, at the ſame time that it was in great want of proviſion, and ſtraitly inveſted by the land forces. Lautrec was oppoſed by a numerous g garriſon of choſen troops. His own army, from the exceſſive heat of the climate, was ſickly, and numberleſs other difficulties he encountered in this enterprize; however, as the total reduction of the kingdom depended on the fate of the capital, he puſhed the ſiege with all imaginable vigour. The prince of Orange, who had the ſole command in the city after the death of Moncada, employed all his addreſs to ſupport the ſpirits of the beſieged; yet he could not have reſiſted ſix days longer, for want of ſuſtenance, if the face of affairs in the allied army had not undergone a great alteration. The diſeaſes, which before had greatly diminiſhed the number of the beſiegers, were now turned to a peſtilence that ſwept them off by hundreds in a day. So great havock had it made, that, before the middle of July, there remained not above four thouſand infantry and gens d'arms fit to engage. Lautrec, attacked by the epidemical diſtemper, was no longer able to command, nor even to keep his camp in ſecurity; a circumſtance of which the prince of Orange did not fail to make his advantage. The beſiegers were harraſſed and alarmed with perpetual ſallies, which they were in no condition to ſuſtain; and, to crown their misfortune, Andrea Doria openly embraced the ſide of the emperor, while his nephew Philippo Doria connived at his treachery, and ſuffered all ſorts of proviſions to paſs his fleet into the city. Lautrec, finding his army dwindled to a handful, himſelf emaciated and confined to his bed, ſurrounded by enemies in the middle of an enemy's country, without all ſupport except from his own courage, took his diſappointment ſo much to heart, that he expired. It was the opinion of the marquis of Saluſſes, who ſucceeded to the command, that neither his authority or ſtrength was equal to the hazard of continuing the ſiege: he therefore turned his whole thoughts to the meaſures proper to abandon it, after it had coſt the lives of near fifteen thouſand men. Upon his decamping, the Imperialiſts attacked his rear, but were repulſed; after which he threw himſelf into Averſa with the few troops that remained. Pedro Navaro fell into the hands of the enemy in this retreat: he was carried priſoner to Naples, where he died a few days after. Now the Imperialiſts beſieged the French army in their turn, who, upon a wound which diſabled the marquis of Saluſſes, ſigned a capitulation, which their diſtreſs rendered leſs diſgraceful. Among other conditions, the marquis ſtipulated to have all thoſe places, in poſſeſſion of the French and Venetians, yielded up to the emperor without loſs of time [u].

NOR was the loſs of the army and kingdom of Naples the whole misfortune ſuſtained by the confederates. The arrival of the duke of Brunſwic with twelve thouſand Germans in Italy, had entirely brought fortune on the ſide of the emperor: this general entered Lombardy by the Veroneſe, where joining Antonio de Leva with his Spaniards, he undertook the ſiege of Lodi. Happily for the Venetians the place was ſtrongly garriſoned, and the reſiſtance it made gave the republic time to make freſh levies to oppoſe the duke. Four thouſand Swiſs were taken into pay; numbers of light horſe were brought from Greece and Dalmatia; and garriſons put into all their principal towns, with governors of approved fidelity and valour. During the ſiege of Lodi, the duke d'Urbini firſt viſited Verona, the walls and garriſons of which he ſtrengthened: the ſame he did at Breſcia, Bergamo, and other cities. After this he greatly harraſſed the duke of Brunſwic, by attacks on his convoys, forages, &c. and by giving perpetual alarms to his camp. In conſequence the duke of Brunſwic raiſed the ſiege; and finding his army diminiſhed, all the cities by which he was to march ſtrongly garriſoned, with a variety of other obſtructions thrown in his way, he retired into Germany [w] (F). In his retreat his rear was briskly charged by a ſally from the garriſon of Bergamo, and a conſiderable number of priſoners taken.

He retires into Germany.

AFTER the capitulation at Averſa, and retreat of the duke of Brunſwic, the count de St. Pol arrived with a French army in Italy, and joined the duke d'Urbini: they propoſed carrying on the war chiefly in Lombardy, to oppreſs Antonio de Leva, who had but eight thouſand men; but without entirely abandoning the towns in Naples; for both Francis and the republic had refuſed to ratify the convention at Averſa. They might certainly have ſucceeded in their deſign, had not ſo much time been conſumed in deliberating upon the meaſures neceſſary to oblige Leva to evacuate Lombardy; but this wiſe general ſeizing the conjuncture, fortified himſelf and encreaſed his army. The confederates begun their operations by inveſting Vigevano and Pavia, which afforded Andrea Doria, now in the ſervice of the emperor, an opportunity of retiring to the coaſt of Genoa. Doria practiſed every means to induce the citizens to ſecond his deſigns: he repreſented to the people that a French government would leave them nothing beſides the name of a republic: the nobility he dazzled with the

(F) Paruta and the Italian writers aſcribe his retreat to the wiſe conduct of the republic, and activity of the duke d'Urbini. But Bellai in his memoirs, and all the German hiſtorians, are of a different opinion. Private diſcontent, ſay they, induced him to this: Charles did not much countenance his expedition, knowing that the duke, by marriage, formed pretenſions to the crown of Naples (1).

a advantages of the ancient inſtitutions, by which they always held the reins of government. Knowing that peſtilence had reduced the garriſon to a fourth of their number, that they were retired into the citadel to avoid infection, and that the city was left in a manner deſolate, he approached with his gallies, and landed ſix or ſeven hundred ſoldiers. Doria found the gates open to him; and once poſſeſſed of the city, he ſoon obliged Trivulcio and the garriſon in the citadel to ſurrender: then aſſembling the nobility, he remitted into their hands the government of the city; in remembrance of which the republic erected a ſtatue to his memory, and honoured him with the title of father and reſtorer of his country.

DURING theſe tranſactions at Genoa, the confederate army reduced Pavia; in conſequence of which ſeveral other cities ſurrendered. Antonio de Leva, finding himſelf harder preſſed b than ever, formed a project hardly to be parallelled in hiſtory: having collected all the wheat and corn in the Milaneſe under ſpecious pretexts, he diſtributed it among certain bakers in whom he could confide, with orders to ſell each loaf at the price of a crown. By this means he drew money to the army from thoſe who were able to pay for bread, while the poor periſhed with hunger. The Milanois complained to the emperor, but his low finances could admit of no remedy: without money Leva's army would deſert, and this was to be procured by no other means than the moſt cruel oppreſſion. At laſt the inhabitants, rendered deſperate by misfortune, maſſacred a number of his officers, and made attempts upon Leva's own life. The reins of government were broke, and the ſpirit of revolt every where excited, had Urbini and St. Pol known how to uſe the opportunity: but theſe two officers, inſtead of c ſnatching this happy occaſion for the recovery of the Milaneſe, were planning fruitleſs ſchemes to beſiege Genoa.

The confederates take Pavia.

DURING the winter of this year, negociations for a peace as uſual were carried on, but A. D. 1529. without effect. Several ambaſſies between the pope and Venetians had paſſed concerning Cervia and Ravenna, which his holineſs ſtill inſiſted on being ceded to him; but nothing was concluded before the treaty of Cambray took place towards the end of the campaign. The war was ſtill carried on in Naples and the Milaneſe: in Calabria and the Capitanata the united French and Venetians bravely withſtood the ſuperior force of the Imperialiſts, obſtinately diſputing every village they loſt: both ſides ſeemed equally to divide the ſucceſs, and nothing happened deciſive. It was not ſo in the Milaneſe, where Antonio de Leva, re- d ceiving a reinforcement of three thouſand Spaniards, preſſed the allies with great vigour: they loſt the opportunity of laying ſiege to Milan before Leva was ſtrong enough to take the field, waſting their time in marches and the ſiege of places, but little contributing to bring the war to an iſſue. St. Pol, was full of the notion of recovering Genoa, which Urbini oppoſed, inſiſting on the war's being continued in the Milaneſe: theſe diſputes between the two generals prevented the execution of any deſign. At laſt the armies ſeparated, and St. Pol ſoon after was defeated by de Leva, and himſelf made priſoner.

ABOUT this time the emperor ſent the cardinal Santa Cruz to Rome, to negociate a peace among the contending parties: he began by ordering Oſtia and Civita Vecchia to be ceded to his holineſs. Ambaſſadors were likewiſe ſent by France and England, with inſtructions e to the ſame purpoſe: following their example, the republic gave ample powers to Gaſpar Contareni, her reſident, to enter upon ſuch terms and articles as were conſiſtent with the honour of the ſtate, and her engagements to his Chriſtian majeſty: they ſolicited the pope to become mediator in their differences, and the ſenate promiſed, on theſe conditions, to deliver up Cervia and Ravenna. While the emperor and Venetians were thus bribing the pope with promiſes, they were likewiſe preparing for the event of a fruitleſs iſſue to the negociations: the duke d'Urbini was continued three years longer in his employment; Fregoſa was appointed ſuperintendant of the army; count Gorazzo, general of the horſe; Antonio Caſtello, captain of artillery; and Nani, proveditor to the forces, which were greatly augmented. Several promotions were likewiſe made in their marine; and a fleet of fifty gallies f equipped, with every thing ready to put to ſea. The ſum of twelve thouſand ducats was lent to the French king, and three thouſand to Francis Sforza, to enable them to ſend their quotas into the field, if the negociations took no effect. Thus, after the war had already coſt the republic above five millions of gold, did ſhe not only furniſh her own proportion, but ſupply her allies with money to carry their engagements into execution x.

STILL the campaign went on in Naples. Count Guaſt, with ſix thouſand Germans and Spaniards, laid ſiege to Monopoli, a town garriſoned by Venetians, and commanded by Andrea Gritti and Vitturi the proveditors. After having battered it for ſome time, and effecting a breach, the count gave the aſſault, maintained it with vigour, but in the end was repulſed with the loſs of four hundred men: this defeat, with ſome reinforcements which g Renca de Cerè threw into the garriſon, obliged him to raiſe the ſiege. After the repulſe of the enemy at Monopoli, the Venetian fleet coming before Brunduſium, ſoon obliged it to capitulate. a

ANTONIO DE LEVA, having defeated St. Pol in the Milaneſe, propoſed puſhing his conqueſts to the Bergamaſco, Cremaſco, and Breſcian; but in this he was oppoſed by the Venetian army, which marched with great expedition to Caſſan. The duke d'Urbini's light horſe greatly annoyed the enemy, cut off their forage and proviſion, and reduced de Leva to great difficulties. A detachment of Imperialiſts croſſing the Adda, to ſcour the Breſcian, and levy contributions, fell into an ambuſcade laid by the Venetian general, and was cut off. The two camps being pitched within a ſmall diſtance, daily ſkirmiſhes paſt, both ſides uſing all means to procure ſome advantage of ſituation, by which to draw the enemy to a battle upon unequal terms. Gorazzo, at length, without intending it, brought on a general engagement, which terminated to the advantage of the Venetians, the enemy having been repulſed with the loſs of fifteen hundred men; a victory this upon which Urbini greatly piqued himſelf, it being almoſt the only one he could boaſt during the war [y]. b

ALL this while the pope, under the maſk of common mediator, was attentive to his own intereſt only: his aim was not only to re-eſtabliſh his family in Florence, but to render himſelf maſter of Peruſia and Ferrara, and to recover Cervia and Ravenna, of which he was deprived by the Venetians. At laſt a treaty with his holineſs was ſigned, in which, among other articles, it was ſtipulated, that Charles ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubienza. Not long after, in the month of Auguſt, another treaty was concluded at Cambray, by Margaret of Auſtria and Louiſa of Savoy, in the names of the emperor and of Francis the firſt. This pacification was matter of great diſcontent to the ſenate of Venice: they not only reſented Francis's having ſigned it without their conſent, but his renouncing the dutchy of Milan without any ceſſion in favour of Francis Sforza, and his engaging to reſtore the towns belonging to the republic in Naples, to the emperor. To ſatisfy the ſenate, excuſe the treaty, and procure reſtitution of the Neapolitan cities, he ſent an ambaſſador to Venice. Thus remained Venice without an ally to oppoſe the power of the emperor in Italy: Francis was, indeed, uſing all his influence with the emperor and the ſenate to bring them to a reconciliation; but the Venetians were ſo unwilling to ſee the imperial authority eſtabliſhed in Italy, and Charles ſo determined upon that point, that little progreſs was made in the mediation. The affair was canvaſſed for ſeveral days in the ſenate, ſome alledging the neceſſity of coming to terms, others adviſing the continuance of war, unleſs the emperor gave more evident ſigns of his ſerious intentions: they enumerated the diſadvantages under which Charles muſt engage to carry on another campaign: the Turks had taken Buda; ſchiſms were riſen in the church, which every where were ready to kindle up a civil war in Germany; his troops were mutinous for want of pay; their towns were all ſtrongly fortified, well garriſoned, and able to ſpin the war to great length, before they could be reduced. Theſe and other reaſons induced the ſenate to reſolve keeping their army on foot, until ſuch terms were offered as they could accept conſiſtently with the ſafety and honour of the ſtate [z]. c d

A. D. 1530. AT length, upon the emperor's arrival in Italy, matters were finally concluded, to the great ſatisfaction and joy of the republic and of Francis Sforza, who was reinſtated in his dutchy, on promiſe of paying a certain ſum of money to the emperor. Ambaſſadors were afterwards ſent to Bologna, to compliment his imperial majeſty upon this general tranquility he had ſo graciouſly reſtored. Charles made the ambaſſadors ſome valuable preſents, which, on their return, were laid up in the treaſury; all ſuch gifts being eſteemed the property of the public, and not of the individual on whom they were beſtowed. Theſe marks of eſteem the ſenate ſoon returned, by ordering the imperial army to have free quarters while it paſſed through the Venetian dominions. The governors of the cities kept open table for the officers, and the emperor's own table was ſupplied with the richeſt wines and moſt expenſive delicacies at the charge of the republic. e

CHARLES being at this time earneſtly ſolicited by the Proteſtants to call a general council, he referred the matter to Clement. His holineſs, apprehending dangerous conſequences from a free aſſembly, adviſed the emperor to excuſe them by the ſecular power: he likewiſe endeavoured to draw the Venetians into this opinion, and to aſſiſt the emperor in that attempt; but the anſwer of the ſenate was agreeable to the reputation acquired for moderation, wiſdom, and juſtice. They repreſented to his holineſs the ſcandal it would bring upon the church to oppoſe arguments by arms; that it ill became the profeſſors of reaſon and truth to avoid the trial, and a candid diſcuſſion of points, wherein reaſon and ſcripture only could be judges; that to perſecute ſchiſmatics was the ſureſt method to propagate their errors, ſince where force was uſed, the people generally concluded juſtice was wanting; that as to the princes of Italy, and themſelves in particular, a long war had ſo exhauſted them, g a that nothing leſs than ſelf-defence, and the protection of Chriſtianity, could induce them to undertake another; that the free cities of the empire were reſolute in denying the emperor ſupplies, unleſs he convoked a council; and that his imperial majeſty, by his own ſtrength, was very unable to levy forces adequate to the enterprize [a].

THE pope clearly perceived the force of this reaſoning: his ſecular views rendered moderation in ſpiritual matters neceſſary, and though the head of the church, yet could he, in favour of a temporal point, relax from that ſeverity which his predeceſſors thought the duty of the repreſentatives of Chriſt.

ANOTHER circumſtance contributed to fix the ſenate in the reſolution to engage in no quarrels on the continent. Solyman's power, by his conqueſts in Hungary and other parts of b Europe and Aſia, became extremely formidable to the Venetians and many other Chriſtian ſtates. Some late changes in the Othoman government had proved hurtful to the commerce of the republic, and threatened a ſtorm which might diſturb the preſent tranquility. A. D. 1531. To guard againſt every event, the Venetians reſolved upon fitting out a ſtrong fleet, to ſupport the expences of which they ſolicited the pope for a remiſſion of the tenths levied upon the clergy within their dominions; but he refuſed them, and the ſenate was forced to have recourſe to another expedient.

THE war between the Turks and Hungarians had been carried on for above a year, and now the emperor Charles declared againſt Solyman. His holineſs ſent a nuncio to Venice to engage the republic in an alliance to reſiſt the Turk; but the Venetians, though they purſued c their preparations, did not care to form leagues which they were apprehenſive might leave them to ſupport a hazardous war, at leaſt the greateſt burthen of the expence: their anſwer, therefore, was general to his holineſs.

IN the mean time Charles the fifth raiſed a prodigious army, with which he encamped before Vienna, there to wait Solyman's arrival. Doria likewiſe conducted a numerous fleet to oppoſe Imeral the Turkiſh admiral, while Capello commanded a fleet of near ſixty Venetian gallies, with which he lay off Corfu. Doria formed a project of obliging the Venetians to join in the war, by raiſing the ſuſpicions of the Turkiſh admiral that the fleets were united; but Capello fruſtrated this intention by a viſit he made Imeral during his ſtay at Prevoſa. The years 1531 and 1532 paſſed without the emperor's coming to blows with the Grand d Seignior: Charles, therefore, paſſed in the beginning of the year 1533 into Italy, where he was met by the ambaſſadors of all the Italian princes and ſtates. His deſign was to renew a treaty with them for the defence of Italy; into which all his art could not draw the Venetians, who were apprehenſive of diſobliging Solyman, England, or France [b].

The emperor's preparations for waging war with Solyman.

AN extraordinary piece of art and familiarity was made uſe of to render the republic ſuſpected by thoſe princes; for when the league was publiſhed, the Venetians were included, though without any authority on their ſide: a circumſtance that gave umbrage to Solyman, until the matter was cleared up to his ſatisfaction. Peace was the great object of the ſenate's views, could it be obtained with honour and ſafety. A long and ruinous war had greatly reduced the affluence of this rich commonwealth: the diſcoveries of the Portugueſe e and Spaniards had leſſened the extent of the Venetian traffick; but did not wholly ruin it. They ſtill kept poſſeſſion of the valuable trade of the Levant, Syria, and the coaſts of Africa and Egypt. The three laſt years of peace had greatly recovered the exhauſted finances of the ſtate; but this, inſtead of encouraging the Venetians to enter upon new meaſures for a war, more ſtrongly puſhed them to endeavour preſerving poſſeſſion of the bleſſings they began to enjoy. Some little encounters with the pirates of Angier, however, diſturbed the public repoſe. Dandolo, with ſeven Venetian gallies, fell into the hands of thoſe barbarians; to revenge which the ſenate once intended iſſuing orders to Capello to deſtroy the town, and exterminate that neſt of thieves and robbers; a reſolution that was laid aſide as prejudicial to the commercial intereſt, by giving umbrage to the Grand Seignior and other powers f with whom they were at peace.

HOWEVER, their pacific determinations did not prevent the ſenate's being involved in another affair, which, with an untoward beginning, had a fortunate iſſue. While Jeronimo Canalis, the proveditor, was convoying with twelve gallies a fleet of merchants bound for Syria and Alexandria, a Turkiſh ſquadron was deſcried at ſome diſtance giving chace, with a bloody flag at the top-maſt-head. Canalis was greatly inferior in ſtrength, yet determined to fight it to the laſt: he found means to gain the windward of the enemy, and attack them to great advantage. The battle was extremely obſtinate, the gallies of Canalis and the Turkiſh baſhaw having frequently boarded each other. In the end, the ſuperior ſkill of Canalis prevailed over numbers; the baſhaw was made priſoner, four Turkiſh gallies ſunk, g and three taken [c]. All the Venetian fleet and inhabitants of Candia rejoiced at this victory, and extolled the conduct and valour of Canalis; but the tranſaction excited other ſentiments in the ſenate, who apprehended the conſequences. The admiral's courage deſerved the higheſt encomiums; circumſtances would admit of no other conduct conſiſtently with the ſecurity of the fleet; yet a war with Solyman was what the ſenate, of all things, the leaſt deſired. It was not doubted, as all the Venetian merchantmen were detained in the Turkiſh ports, but Solyman intended to revenge this affront; to divert him from which the ſenate ſent a ſolemn ambaſſy to Conſtantinople, to apologiſe for the late unfortunate tranſaction, and offer the puniſhing Canalis, if required. But here the generoſity of the Infidel ſtood Canalis in more ſtead than the gratitude of his own countrymen. Solyman was angry at the laſt propoſal, and rejected it with diſdain, ſaying, that the conduct of the Venetian admiral deſerved the higheſt rewards; and that it was pity he did not ſerve a ſtate able to pay a juſt regard to his merit. He then ſet the Venetian ſhips at liberty, in honour, he ſaid, to Canalis, rather than regard to the ambaſſy: a greatneſs of mind which equally aſtoniſhed and aſhamed the republic (A).

ALL this while war was carried on by ſea between Solyman and the emperor Charles the fifth: Doria his admiral had taken Moron, Patras, and other places in the Morea the preceding year, which were all retaken this year by the famous Barbaroſſa, appointed admiral of all the Turkiſh navy. After this tranſaction Barbaroſſa ſteered to Italy, waſted and deſtroyed the coaſt of Calabria; thence ſailing to the coaſt of Africa, he took Tunis, and returned triumphant to Conſtantinople.

THE Venetian republic paſſed this year in the ſame tranquility it had done the preceding, unleſs we except a ſkirmiſh which happened in the gulph of Venice with Filippo Mazzo, a knight of Malta, who lived by piracy. Mazzo was taken by the Venetian admiral, beheaded on the poop of his own ſhip, and the Turkiſh ſlaves on board ſet at liberty; an action extremely grateful to Solyman, but diſpleaſing to Charles the fifth, under whoſe protection the knights of Malta had been for ſome years; but when matters were properly repreſented to the emperor he was appeaſed [d].

MEAN time Clement the ſeventh reſigned his laſt breath, after a life of unſucceſsful ambition; and was ſucceeded in the pontificate by Alexander Farneſe, by the name of Paul the third. On his acceſſion the ſenate ſent an ambaſſy of eight ſenators with compliments of congratulation, and wiſhes that the ſame ſpirit of juſtice and moderation, which had governed his actions for the ſpace of fifty years, might ſtill continue to direct his councils; but Paul, with his new dignity, had aſſumed a ſpirit more agreeable to it and the diſpoſition of his predeceſſors. Guido Ubaldo, ſon to Franciſco Maria, duke d'Urbini, having married Julia, the only child of John Varran duke of Camerino, ought in right of his wife to have ſucceeded to that dutchy after the death of his father-in-law; nor was it doubted but he would without oppoſition, when very unexpectedly Paul the third declared the dutchy a fief of the church, to which Ubaldo could have no pretenſions. This declaration he anſwered by the powerful argument of arms, a conduct that greatly incenſed the Venetians, who had taken Urbini under their protection, and ſoon made them alter their ſentiments of the moderate and pacific diſpoſition of his holineſs. Not caring, however, to enter upon a diſpute with him, the ſenate applied to the emperor, who found means to perſuade the pope to depart from the rigour of his profeſſions. What moſt of all wrought upon him was a propoſition made by the Venetians of giving his ſon Pietro Lodovico an handſome equivalent in Romagnia for the ſurrender of Cervia and Ravenna to the republic. His holineſs lent a willing ear to whatever tended to exalt and firmly eſtabliſh his family: he began therefore to recede from his claim on the dutchy of Camerino, being willing to gain the Venetians, the natural protectors of his ſon, ſhould he be eſtabliſhed in Romagnia.

WHILE the pope and Venetians were engaged in negociations of this nature, the emperor was raiſing a powerful army, and equipping a numerous fleet, to the great terror of the Italian ſtates, who were ignorant of his deſigns. At laſt it was known that this armament was deſtined for Africa, and againſt Solyman. The French reſident at Conſtantinople had uſed clandeſtine means and unjuſtifiable intrigues to prejudice Solyman againſt the Venetians, tho' with what view we are at a loſs to conjecture: he whiſpered about the city that Charles was excited to this expedition by the perſuaſions and promiſes of the republic, than which nothing could be leſs true, at the ſame time that he preſerved all the appearances of friend-

a ſhip for the Venetian reſident. However, Solyman was too generous to form his judgment upon ſecret inſinuations; he therefore put the queſtion to the reſident, who fully ſatisfied him of the falſity of the allegation and fidelity of the republic: he even ſent an ambaſſador extraordinary to Venice, with teſtimonies of his regard; and to aſſure the ſenate that no indirect practices whatever ſhould alter his ſentiments of friendſhip for their republic. Thus ſtood affairs during the year 1535, when Charles, having finiſhed his expedition by taking Tunis, Goletta, and other places, returned to Naples, there to paſs the enſuing winter e.

WHILE the emperor was carrying on the war againſt the Infidels in Africa, Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, died without iſſue; an event which it was univerſally believed would break the repoſe of Italy. The republic was unwilling that the Milaneſe ſhould be annexed to the b dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe neighbourhood they apprehended on many accounts, and yet to ſolicit Charles the fifth to confer the dutchy upon ſome private perſon, required delicacy to avoid offence: but the French monarch, renewing his claim to this dutchy, eaſed the ſenate of their embarraſſment, and paved the way for a treaty with the emperor for the ſecurity of Italy. This treaty was ſcarcely concluded, when Beauvoix, one of the gentlemen of the bed chamber to Francis, came to Venice to acquaint the ſenate of his maſter's intentions, and to ſolicit the aid and alliance of the republic. Giving any encouragement to this propoſition would be an infraction of the treaty with Charles; the ſenate, therefore, contented itſelf with anſwering his majeſty in general terms, teſtifying their reſpect for his perſon, and deſire of preſerving the public tranquility. Francis, how- c ever, perſevered in his reſolution of ſending an army into Italy, and for this purpoſe demanded a paſſage of the duke of Savoy, which was denied: this augmented his majeſty's diſpleaſure againſt the duke, and kindled thoſe ſparks of reſentment, which had for ſome time been ſmothered in political reaſons, into an open rupture. A variety of circumſtances now contributed to oblige Francis to declare his ſentiments of the duke: he had furniſhed the duke of Bourbon with money; he had congratulated the emperor on Francis's impriſonment; he had conducted intrigues for the drawing off the Swiſs from their engagements with France; beſides making the purchaſe of Aſt, the duke refuſed to lend Nice for holding an interview between the king and pope Clement; his majeſty's claim to the dowry of Louiſa of Savoy, his mother; with a number of other particulars, all contributed d to bring matters to a criſis. The duke, knowing the reſentment of the French monarch, ſolicited the emperor's help to oppoſe ſo powerful a prince. Intelligence of this negociation coming to the ears of Francis, made him haſten his preparations; accordingly he invaded Piedmont with a numerous army: he ſoon rendered himſelf maſter of Turin, Pignerol, and Foſſan. The city Vercelli was near falling into his hands, had not Antonio de Leva, with the imperial army, marched opportunely to its relief f. Thus a war was again lighted up in Italy, which Paul the third took every meaſure to extinguiſh. The great difficulty was to find a medium of agreement between the pretenſions of Charles and Francis to the dutchy of Milan; for as to the war with Savoy, that was only a neceſſary ſtep towards the entrance of the French army into the Milaneſe: however, negociations for this purpoſe were ſet on e foot, which broke up without coming to any reſolution. The emperor was deſirous of giving the Milaneſe to the duke d'Angouleſme, and Francis was no leſs deſirous that it ſhould be conferred on the duke of Orleans: ſo violent was the emperor, that he offered to reſt the deciſion on the iſſue of a ſingle combat between himſelf and the French king.

A. D. 1536.

Francis enters Piedmont with an army, and overruns the country.

WHILE the emperor was planning meaſures for checking the progreſs of the French conqueſts, Francis, with the aſſiſtance of ſome Italian princes, who had declared in his favour, formed an enterprize againſt Genoa, to reduce it under his power: this obliged the imperial army to withdraw from Provence, for the protection of the emperor's dominions in Italy. Roderigo d'Avalo, the imperial ambaſſador, arrived in Venice to acquaint the ſenate with the emperor's reſolution to invade France, and to requeſt their aſſiſtance. In conſequence ſix f thouſand foot were raiſed, under the conduct of Antonio de Caſtello. The ambaſſador had aſſurances given him of the reſpect the republic ſhould always preſerve for his imperial majeſty; of the ſenate's reſolution to protect the Milaneſe againſt all enemies whatever. A farther augmentation of the troops was likewiſe made, the rendezvous appointed for aſſembling the army at Azola, with orders they ſhould be ready to march on an hour's notice; yet, with all theſe preparations, ſo nicely did the ſenate balance between the rival powers, that neither ſide was diſſatisfied with their conduct; the emperor eſteemed them his allies, and Francis could not look upon them as enemies, as they had taken no meaſures againſt his intereſt g.

IN this ſituation ſtood affairs, when a truce for three months was agreed upon between g the emperor and Francis: notice of which was ſent to the ſenate by the former, together with the conditions preliminary to a general pacification: viz. That Francis ſhould declare, before the expiration of that time, whether he would accept of the Milaneſe for the duke a d'Angouleſme, and marry him to the widow of Sforza? If within this period he came to no reſolution, in that caſe the emperor ſhould have power to beſtow the dutchy on the infant of Portugal, or on Emanuel, ſon to the duke of Savoy. He requeſted to know the ſenate's ſentiments upon this ſubject; inſiſted upon the neceſſity of forming a league among the Italian princes for the ſecurity of Italy, and giving weight to the negotiations. The ſenate made anſwer, that as to the Milaneſe they could determine nothing, until they were acquainted more particularly with his imperial majeſty's intention: then when he ſhould directly nominate a ſucceſſor, they would then take their meaſures. As to the league, they thought it more neceſſary to oppoſe the growing power of the Othoman empire, than that of any chriſtian potentate. The ſenate then acquainted the pope with this anſwer to the b emperor's embaſſy: they gave his holineſs the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of the pacific diſpoſition of the republic, whoſe chief deſire it was to preſerve the tranquility of Italy. They uſed their influence to induce him to mediate a peace, which at length he complied with, by ſending ambaſſadors to the courts of the emperor and of Francis. But his endeavours were fruitleſs, both ſides being rivetted in their implacable reſentments [h].

DURING this interval, Francis left no ſtone unturned to draw the Venetians off from their attachment to the emperor, or rather from their neutrality. After ſeveral indirect attempts, at laſt he ſent a plenipotentiary with full powers to engage them in his alliance upon their own terms. The faireſt promiſes were made to the ſenate, and the moſt engaging proſpects laid before them, but nothing could prevail on them to break their engagements with c the emperor, or diſturb the repoſe of Italy. Francis, failing in this point, had recourſe to the Porte. He thought that by engaging Solyman to ſend an army into Puglia, he would at leaſt draw off the Venetian forces from the Milaneſe, and thus open a way for his own army into the dutchy. Although he had at that time a reſident at Conſtantinople, yet he now diſpatched an ambaſſador extraordinary to Solyman. This miniſter began his operations by repreſenting to the Othoman court the growing greatneſs of the emperor; the danger there was of his acquiring univerſal monarchy; the neceſſity of combining againſt him for their mutual defence; the facility with which the Turkiſh army might paſs into Italy by ſea; and the advantages that would reſult to that empire from ſuch a meaſure. The picture was artfully drawn; whatever tended to increaſe the difficulty of the enterprize was thrown d into ſhade, while the beauties of the proſpect, and every other inducement, were placed in the moſt conſpicuous light. The grand vizier entered heartily into the views of the French king: he laid the ſcheme before Solyman with ſuch other blandiſhments as ſoon induced that ambitious monarch to embrace propoſals ſo agreeable to his natural diſpoſition, and thirſt of empire and glory. His pride was likewiſe flattered with this requeſt from a powerful chriſtian potentate; and it afforded a fair opportunity of ending the Perſian war, in which, without any advantage, he had conſumed ſuch immenſe treaſures, and ruined fine armies. It was therefore determined in the divan to raiſe numerous forces, and early in the ſpring to invade the imperial dominions in Italy.

SOLYMAN, thinking it neceſſary to engage the Venetians in his intereſt, if poſſible, ſent e for that purpoſe an ambaſſador to the ſenate: their anſwer was, that they were equally diſpoſed to cultivate his friendſhip, from a regard to his perſonal merit and their mutual intereſt: they, however, declined declaring themſelves more explicitly; but although Solyman was ſatisfied with this general anſwer, it was otherwiſe with his miniſters, who expected to draw great advantages from a war with the republic. To gain their ends, they began with falſe complaints of the Venetian officers in the Turkiſh dominions; with impriſoning the perſons and confiſcating the effects of the merchants of the republic, under various and frivolous pretences. This they doubted not would produce altercations, which might probably terminate in a war: their trade in Syria was, beſides, taxed with a duty of ten per cent. their conſuls letters to the ſenate were frequently intercepted; and two of the f republic's ſhips ſeized in an open and violent manner in the iſland of Rhodes, and port of Alexandria. Theſe were, indeed, moſt impolitic meaſures; for however a war with the republic might tend to the emolument of individuals, it could not but be prejudicial to the Othoman empire, and to the deſigns of Solyman. It was, in fact, compelling a ſtrong maritime power to unite itſelf cloſely with the emperor of Germany, and putting him upon a footing with the Porte in the only particular wherein he was inferior. This the ſenate foreſaw, and thence doubted not but Solyman would diſclaim, and redreſs the injuries done to their ſubjects without his conſent or knowledge. Tomazo Mocenigo was accordingly diſpatched to Conſtantinople, to repreſent the grievances of the republic to the Othoman miniſtry, and to the Grand Seignor in perſon, if ſatisfaction could not be obtained otherwiſe. g Mocenigo applied directly to the emperor, and obtained the moſt favourable anſwer he could deſire. Solyman expreſſed his reſentment and ſorrow for the injuries the Venetian ſubjects

a had ſuſtained; he apologized for them by profeſſing his ignorance, and promiſed they ſhould be immediately redreſſed to the utmoſt of his power. At the ſame time that this declaration was perfectly conſiſtent with the juſtice and generoſity of Solyman, it was alſo adapted to his circumſtances; for a rumour prevailed that the ſophi of Perſia was again preparing to enter the field with a numerous army, which obliged the Othoman to be cautious how he drew upon him the reſentment of ſo powerful a ſtate as Venice [i].

His anſwer to the ſenate's remonſtrance.

However, as the preparations by ſea and land continued with vigour through the Turkiſh empire, it put the ſenate under the neceſſity of guarding againſt a ſtorm, the deſtination of which was uncertain. The garriſons were reinforced by a new levy of eight thouſand foot; all the old gallies put in commiſſion, and orders iſſued for building fifty b more with all poſſible diſpatch. An embargo was laid upon all the ſhipping in the ports, in order to man the fleet, and ſecure tranſports, if occaſion ſhould require. Girolamo Peſſari was made captain-general of the fleet, agreeable to the uſual method of chuſing by lot in the council of the pregadi. In this office he was confirmed by the great council, as there was not in the republic a perſon more skilled in maritime affairs, or of greater experience [k].

But however vigorous the meaſures of the ſenate might appear, there ſtill was a deficiency which could not be remedied but by the oppreſſion of the people. The treaſury was low, and now an entire ſtop would be put to commerce, that perpetual ſource of wealth to the Venetian ſtate: to obviate in ſome meaſure this evil, three procurators of St. Mark's church were made, each of whom furniſhed the government with twelve thouſand ducats:
c then the ſenate applied to the pope for leave to levy two hundred thouſand ducats upon the clergy. His holineſs ſhuffled about this requeſt, ſometimes alledging their poverty, at other times pretending to give no credit to Solyman's intention to attack Italy. In this ſituation the ſenate was forced to commit to Providence the care of thoſe numerous forces they were raiſing, determining, in caſe of neceſſity, to lay another tax upon the people in a manner in which it would be moſt tolerable.

Nor was the emperor Charles without apprehenſions of the Turkiſh preparations: he ordered his gallies to be in readineſs in all the ports of Sicily and Naples, the care of which he committed to Andrew Doria, a Genoeſe; but that republic detained Doria and the ſquadron under his command, for the defence of the city in caſe of a viſit from the French
d king.

During theſe preparations, Solyman began his march towards Albania, at the head of a powerful army, while his fleet, amounting to three hundred ſail, under Luſi, baſhaw, ſailed from the ſtreights of Gallipolis. The baſhaw arrived at Modon before the ſenate came to a reſolution: various were the opinions in the ſenate; ſome were for embracing a neutrality, others for joining the emperor, and the reſt were for waiting until the Turkiſh fleet ſhould, by ſome motion, declare its deſtination. At laſt it was reſolved to leave the whole to the conduct of Peſſari, and appoint Giovanni Vitturi his lieutenant. Francis, having notice of the embarraſſment of the ſenate, thought this a fit opportunity to turn the ſcale in his own favour. With this view he ſent an ambaſſador to Venice, with propoſals extremely advan-
e tageous to the republic: theſe were, to reſtore her former poſſeſſions in the Cremoneſe and Ghiaradadda; to reduce to her obedience the cities of Ravenna and Cervia, which ſhe had been forced to relinquiſh by the late treaty; together with the territories of Puglia, Otranto, Brunduſium, Monopoli, Polignan, and Trani. After various debates, a general reply was made to the ambaſſador's propoſals: upon which Antonio Cornaro, a perſon of great influence and authority, reproached the ſenate, 'for balancing a minute between intereſt, and 'the duties of ſolemn treaties. He told the French ambaſſador, that it had always 'been the practice of the republic never to deſert their allies; that they were now under 'engagements to the emperor; that it would be baſe to renounce them; that the noble 'ſpirit of Francis himſelf would deſpiſe the meanneſs of allies he could neither truſt nor f 'eſteem [l].' The vehemence with which Cornaro uttered this ſpeech drew many to his opinion. It ſoon became more general, and at laſt was paſſed as the unanimous anſwer of the ſenate.

The French king's propoſal to the Venetians.

All this while the deſtination of the Turkiſh fleet was perfectly myſterious, as well as the conduct of the baſhaw. In paſſing the channel of Corfu, he ſaluted the caſtle in a friendly and reſpectful manner: he ordered the authors of ſome depredations committed on the Venetian traders to be hanged up at the yard arm; and preſerved a conduct ſo ambiguous as greatly perplexed the ſenate. Several unlucky accidents ſoon, however, changed the face of affairs, and produced an open rupture. A Venetian galley had ſunk a Turkiſh ſhip going with proviſions to the baſhaw's fleet, becauſe ſhe refuſed to pay the uſual honours to the g flag: four ſhips ſtationed in the channel of Corfu, attacked and put to flight three Turkiſh A. D. 1536.

gallies ſent to convoy an ambaſſador ſent by the baſhaw to Peſſari to demand ſatisfaction a for the foregoing violation of the treaty. Another cauſe of the war aroſe from a diſpute between a Turkiſh galley and one of Contareni's, in which the former was taken with the loſs of two hundred men. Theſe injuries the baſhaw retaliated by others; and at laſt, ſeized upon four gallies which had been ſeparated from Peſſari's ſquadron. Other hoſti-lities of the ſame nature were interchanged, and every thing contributed to bring about an open declaration of war: however, the ſenate ſtill reſolved to wait, until they could be better informed by the Venetian envoy who attended Solyman's perſon, and followed the army. Mean time, all the ſubjects of the republic in the Turkiſh dominions were impriſoned; their ſhips and effects ſeized; and particularly three large gallies at Alexandria[m].
Soon after which the Turkiſh fleet ſailed to Corfu, and attacked the citadel, at that time b commanded by Babon di Nalda, with a garriſon of two thouſand men.

Solyman's officers impriſon the Venetian ſubjects.

Now all hopes of peace being vaniſhed, orders were diſpatched to Peſſari to hazard a battle rather than the loſs of Corfu; but he, relying upon the ſtrength of the place, and number of the garriſon, did not chuſe to expoſe the ſtate to ſo great a danger as muſt attend the defeat of the fleet. Barbaroſſa, the Turkiſh admiral, having landed twenty-five thouſand men on the iſland, after waſting every thing with a barbarous fury, laid ſiege to the citadel. He erected a number of batteries, which the briſk fire of the garriſon deſtroyed as ſoon as they were opened. The ſiege being ſpun out to ſome length, induced Solyman to undertake it in perſon. This he did, attended by the grand vizier; but they found the ſituation ſo ſtrong, the beſieged ſo reſolute, and ſuperior in the uſe of cannon, c that they reſolved to drop the enterprize. Willing, however, to make a merit of neceſſity with the republic, he told the Venetian envoy, that if the ſenate would indemnify the ex-pences of the war, he would withdraw his fleet and army from Corfu and the dominions of the republic. The envoy told him, that he had no inſtructions to enter into ſuch engagements; but that he would acquaint the ſenate with the propoſals. But before an anſwer could be returned, Solyman was forced, by the briſk ſallies of the garriſon, to abandon the iſland.
From hence he turned his arms to the Morea; and part of the fleet was ſent to inveſt Napoli de Romagnia and Malveſia, while Barbaroſſa, with the remainder, ſcoured the iſlands of the Archipelago, of which he took ſeveral. But the deſigns of Solyman againſt the cities of the Morea were fruſtrated by the prudence and ability of Vittor de Gazzoni, the Venetian general d in that quarter. He had taken ſuch precautions to fortify and augment the garriſons, that the Turkiſh general, after opening his trenches before Napoli, was forced to retire, and give up all expectation of ſucceſs.

He is repulſed.

In the mean time Peſſari and Vitturi were not idle: they divided the fleet, the former laying ſiege to Scordona, and the latter to Obruazzo. After having levied, with this deſign, a ſufficient body of forces, Peſſari attacked Scordona, which being but weakly fortified, he entered it by aſſault, and put the garriſon to the ſword, diſmantled the town, and intirely razed the citadel. Vitturi was leſs ſucceſsful before Obruazzo, which had regular fortifications and a ſtrong garriſon: he began with erecting batteries, in which he was diſturbed by the continual ſallies of the enemy: however, before he had made any conſiderable progreſs e in his approaches, he received orders from Peſſari to raiſe the ſiege, and haſten to Corfu with the fleet, as he apprehended a ſecond deſcent upon that iſland[n].

Peſſari takes Scordona from the Turks.

The winter coming on, hoſtilities ceaſed, and negotiations for a peace ſucceeded, before any deciſive blow had been ſtruck. Solyman, by his grand vizier, made ſome overtures to the Venetian envoy, which he tranſmitted to the ſenate. They were ſo little conſiſtent with the power, pride, and ambition of that monarch, that the ſenate ſuſpected their ſincerity;
but they received every propoſal with reſpect. As the emperor Charles and the pope ſeemed deſirous of uniting with the republic againſt the Turks, the ſenate was the leſs aſſiduous to embrace the terms offered by Solyman, until they knew the iſſue of the negociations for a league now on the carpet. A ſtrong party aroſe in the ſenate for peace with the Turks: f they urged the inſincerity of Charles, and impotency of the pope; the ſecret and deep views of the former, and the dilatorineſs of the latter. They ſet forth the low ſtate of the treaſury; the ſtagnation of commerce; the diſaffection of Doria the imperial admiral, whoſe coldneſs had nearly occaſioned the loſs of Corfu; the inability of the people to ſupport a war by additional taxes; the power of the enemy, and the little advantage to be expected even from a ſucceſsful war. Theſe arguments were oppoſed by others no leſs ſpe-cious; the oppoſite party inſiſted that Solyman had no real intention ſo ſoon to end a war which he had undertaken from motives of ambition; that his propoſals had no other view than to break off the intended league with the emperor and the pope, that he might then attack them ſingly and without allies: they aſſerted, that delays would be of dangerous g conſequence, as the emperor might in the mean time conclude a peace with the Porte, and a by this means be rendered incapable of embracing the offers of the ſenate; that their ſo immediately accepting the overtures made by Solyman, would be a declaration of their inability to carry on the war; it would betray their weakneſs, and furniſh him with arguments for riſing in his demands: laſtly, it was urged that as they muſt, however ſupport an army and fleet until the tranquility of Italy was reſtored, they might with the ſame expence watch the motions of Solyman, and keep aloof until affairs could be eſtabliſhed upon a ſolid baſis. After ſeveral warm debates, they determined to amuſe Solyman, until the reſult of their negociations with the emperor and pope could be certainly known. Inſtructions were diſpatched to their envoy to leave no means untried to penetrate into the councils of the ſeraglio, and in the mean time to give the grand vizier hopes that the ſenate would em-b brace any reaſonable terms of accommodation o.

HITHERTO, indeed, hoſtilities had been committed, but war was not declared, and it was expected that the ſword might ſtill be ſheathed without farther bloodſhed. It was always the opinion of the moſt prudent, that the republic ought not to be ſwayed, by the liberal promiſes of Charles, to undertake a hazardous war againſt the Porte, but upon neceſſity; nor, on the other hand, ſhould ſhe be terrified, by the great preparations of Solyman, into conceſſions unworthy of the rank ſhe maintained. The emperor was now ſoliciting the ſenate to join his fleet, to reſiſt the attempts of the infidels upon Italy; and the ſenate replied in equivocal terms. To another requeſt the imperial miniſter made, that the ſix thouſand troops ſtipulated for the defence of Milan, ſhould march into that duchy; they
c anſwered, that it would be time enough to perform their engagements when the Milaneſe was attacked.

IN the mean time all neceſſary preparations were making for ſecuring the territories of the republic againſt incurſions; all the garriſons in the Morea were augmented and furniſhed with ſtores, ammunition, and proviſion. Twenty-five gallies were diſpatched for the ſecurity of Candia; the towns in Dalmatia were put in a ſtate of defence; and Corfu was not neglected. At laſt the intreaties, intrigues, and promiſes of Charles prevailed; the ſenate acceded to the propoſed league, and a treaty of alliance offenſive and defenſive between his imperial majeſty, the pope, and the republic was concluded. It was ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould furniſh eighty-two gallies, the Venetians the ſame number, and the pope
d thirty-ſix men of war and gallies: that his holineſs ſhould ſupport one-ſixth of the expences of the war, and the reſt be equally divided between the emperor and the republic. Doria, the emperor's admiral, was made commander in chief of the combined fleet. Ferdinand, king of the Romans, was included in the league, becauſe it was expected he would be able to make a diverſion in Hungary. Room was alſo left for the French king to join in the confederacy; and the pope was to uſe his influence with the king of Poland to embrace it, and join his arms to reſiſt the common enemy. They even went ſo far as to divide their conqueſts; not doubting but they would ſoon become maſters of all the Turkiſh dominions in Europe. But as Baronius obſerves, it ſeldom happens that thoſe have their wiſhes accompliſhed whoſe hopes are too ſanguine. The event ſhewed the prudence of that advice which e the republic neglected, not to confide too much in the aſſiſtance of allies. The treaty was ſigned at Rome in the month of February, 1538, not one of the articles of which were ever punctually executed by any one of the parties, excepting the republic. Capella was made admiral of the Venetian fleet, Grimani, patriarch of Aquileia, a Venetian by birth, of the pope's gallies. As the pontiff was but badly provided in ſhipping, the Venetians conſented to ſupply his quota for a certain ſubſidy, which he carefully avoided paying. That nothing might obſtruct the vigorous proſecution of the war, the Venetians offered their mediation to eſtabliſh peace between the emperor and Francis. For this purpoſe a congreſs met; but, after tedious debates, broke up without coming to any reſolution. In conſequence, Charles failed in his engagements to the ſenate, almoſt as ſoon as he had entered into them: inſtead f of joining the confederates with a powerful fleet, he turned his whole attention to the ſecurity of Milan, and reſiſting the attempts of Francis p.

League between the pope, emperor, and Venetians.

A. D. 1538.

NOR was this the only difficulty which the ſenate combated: in ſo low a condition were their finances, that they entertained thoughts of ſelling ſome of their poſſeſſions on the continent. A decree was paſſed that all money lent to the public ſhould bear fourteen per cent. intereſt: ſevere proceſſes were carried on againſt the debtors of the public, and impriſonment and confiſcation of goods made the penalties of exceeding the time appointed for payment. Three more procurators of St. Mark's were choſen, who lent the public a ſum of money in the ſame manner as the others lately appointed. As for the tax on the clergy it could never be reduced to any form: the pope had permitted the ſenate to alienate the
g church goods at the rate of ten per. cent. to the amount of a million of ducats; but he afterwards required that this tax ſhould be levied upon the tithes for the ſpace of five years:

however, the ſenate could never procure a brief, for refuſing which he always found ſome new excuſe. This great ſcarcity of money greatly impeded the preparations of the republic; yet nothing that could poſſibly remove the obſtruction was omitted [q]. a Conference between the emperor and Francis.

His holineſs, obſerving that things went on but ſlowly, determined to exert himſelf in conciliating Charles and Francis: this alone could enable the emperor to perform his engagement with the league. He, therefore, laboured to procure a perſonal interview at Nice, where he offered to attend. The Venetians concurred in this propoſition, and joined their intereſt with the pontiff's to get it accepted. After preliminaries had been adjuſted, and every thing determined upon for the interview, it was ſuddenly declined by mutual deſire of the parties. A private conference, however, was held at Avignon, in which nothing appeared concluſive, beſides their reſolution to remain in their inveterate enmity. b

The ſpring being far advanced, the Turkiſh fleet covered the ſea with ſhips, ſcoured the iſlands of the Archipelago a ſecond time, and carried terror and deſolation where-ever it ſailed. It was reported that Barbaroſſa would ſteer his courſe to Candia: this the ſenate expected, and provided againſt. Giovanni Moro, the proveditor, was ſent thither in quality of governor, of whoſe great ability and experience the republic entertained a high opinion. Moro, on his arrival, aſſembled the principal inhabitants of the iſland, whom he adviſed, intreated, exhorted, and even perſuaded into an enthuſiaſtic reſolution of conquering or dying, by an animated and pathetic oration. In conſequence, the levies went on with ſo much vigour, that in a few days an army of twenty-five thouſand able-bodied men took the field, ready to march where-ever the ſecurity of the iſland and orders from the gover- c nor required. The Turkiſh fleet ſoon came within ſight, and they were received with a ſhout from the whole army: this determined Barbaroſſa to alter his intention of landing near Standia, where he foreſaw he ſhould meet with an obſtinate reſiſtance. Coaſting along the iſland he propoſed debarking the troops at La Suda, where there was a good harbour and bold ſhore. The debarkation was no ſooner begun, than Gritti, who commanded in La

Suda, played furiouſly with all the cannon of the town upon the enemy: a ſally was likewiſe made, and the Turks attacked with ſuch fury before they had time to form themſelves, that they were ſoon routed and diſperſed. Numbers, who had not time to gain their ſhips, fled up the country, where they fell into the hands of the armed peaſants, by whom they were murthered without remorſe or pity. Finding nothing could be effected on this quarter, d Barbaroſſa diſpatched one hundred gallies to make an attempt upon Sithia, a little town upon the back of the iſland: this the Venetians had abandoned, not imagining it to be tenable; but they had drawn a line acroſs the country to prevent the Turks from advancing. In ſhort, ſo well concerted and vigorouſly executed were all the meaſures for the defence of Candia, that Barbaroſſa quitted the attempt, withdrew his fleet, and ſailed towards the Morea [r].

The Turks enter Dalmatia.

At the ſame time the Turkiſh army entered Dalmatia, where they committed every ſort of violence and barbarity. They carried off men, women, and children; burnt and ſacked the villages and open towns, laying deſert the whole country through which they marched. So numerous was the army, and ſuch the panic they infuſed, that Camillo Urſino, governor e of the province, had thoughts of abandoning the whole country, and ſhutting himſelf up with ſome troops in Zara; but the ſenate ſent a peremptory order to prevent a reſolution no leſs infamous than prejudicial to the republic. A levy was made of fifteen hundred horſe and twelve thouſand foot, which were immediately ſhipped for the protection of Dalmatia. A number of volunteers undertook the defence of the cities Zara, Sabenica, and Catarra; and the inhabitants of Dalmatia were permitted to ſend their wives and children to Venice, that they might oppoſe and fright the enemy without incumbrance.

Upon this occaſion the doge came into the ſenate, and pathetically running over the circumſtances of the republic, he enlarged upon the duty incumbent on every man to exert himſelf in defence of his country. He recommended 'unanimity and zeal as the ſtrongeſt f
'bulwarks of a ſtate; reminded them how theſe, in the laſt dangerous war, had diſen-
'gaged them from all difficulties, and at laſt procured an honourable and even a profitable
'peace: nor was the preſent danger leſs. Solyman, though a ſingle power, was not infe'rior in riches, courage, or number of forces, to the combined armies of their late enemies:
'his pride and ambition were unmeaſurable, which nothing but their conſtancy, their firm-
'neſs, and attachment to their country, could withſtand. Their expectations from their 'allies were daily vaniſhing; the tediouſneſs of their reſolutions, the ambiguity of their 'conduct was a plain indication that little confidence could be placed in the league, and 'that Venice muſt depend for its ſafety upon her own courage and conduct. Whatever the 'preſent difficulties might be, they would yield to ſpirit and patriotiſm. The treaſury g
'was exhauſted, but there were reſources in the pockets of individuals: he would ſet the

'example,

a 'example, and he doubted not of being followed in ſo laudable a practice, by all who pre'ferred liberty and poverty to ſervitude and wealth, which ſolely depended on the arbitrary
'will of an imperious and deſpotic maſter. It was the teſt of a good citizen, he ſaid, wil'lingly to undergo all dangers, chearfully to advance his fortune, and even lay down his life 'for the benefit of the public. The preſence of the nobility would give life and vigour to
'the conduct of the ſoldiers: they would grudge no fatigues in which they ſaw their 'ſuperiors ſhare. Let every man, ſays he, aſſume that province in which he thinks his 'talents will be moſt uſeful: ſome are qualified for the field, ſome for the cabinet. In 'each of theſe departments exert yourſelves, and let your only contention be, who ſhall
'beſt ſerve his country and annoy the enemy: this will confirm to you the privileges, the b 'reputation, and the happineſs, handed down by your glorious anceſtors. Let thoſe who 'cannot be moved by their duty or affection to the ſtate, remember that there is an obe'dience due to the laws and magiſtrates, who can compel them to contribute their ſer-
'vices. Let the urgency of the caſe make you diligent and vigorous in your meaſures, if 'you are deſirous of continuing the eſteem of good men, and, what is more, the applauſe
'of your own breaſts[s].'

In conſequence of this remonſtrance, ſeveral ſums of money were advanced for the public uſe, the nobility and gentry entered themſelves voluntarily in the ſervice of their country, and a ſpirit and unanimity prevailed, which gave happy preſages of a favourable iſſue to the war.

c Mean time the Turkiſh forces were daily pouring into Dalmatia: their intention was to attack all the fortified places at one time, by dividing their army, and thus prevent their aſſiſting each other. Already Nadin, a place of ſtrength, was fallen into their hands; the ſame fate attended Laurena: Zara and other towns were inveſted and warmly preſſed: Zemona and Antivari were little leſs than conquered, being abandoned by the garriſons, and defended only by the bravery of a few Venetian and Sclavonian volunteers. However, their reſolution, and the ſpeedy ſupplies ſent from Venice, triumphed over misfortune, and obliged the Turks to abandon Dalmatia with precipitation[t]. The Turks are repulſed from Dalmatia.

But the Venetians were not contented with relieving the beſieged towns, and driving the infidels out of Dalmatia, they attacked and recovered ſome of the places poſſeſſed by d the enemy. A vigorous plan of operations was laid down, which, if purſued, would ſoon have obliged the haughty Solyman to ſue for peace; but the luke-warmneſs of the duke of Urbini, who was made general of the land-forces, ſoon convinced the moſt diſcerning, that no great matters could be expected while he commanded.

The Venetian fleet under Capello having joined the pope's gallies, commanded by the biſhop of Aquileia, all men were impatient for the event of this junction. Already the combined fleet was powerful enough to occaſion the retreat of Barbaroſſa to Negropont; and the emperor engaged his word to reinforce it with thirty gallies, fifteen men of war, and three thouſand Spaniſh infantry; a promiſe the execution of which was much doubted. However, contrary to the general opinion, Gonzaga arrived with the gallies at Corfu, the men of war bee ing left behind under ſome ſpecious pretext. His arrival was of little ſervice, as he refuſed to cloſe with the propoſals made by Capello and Grimani. They had agreed to ſcour the Levant ſeas, and ſecure the coaſts from the irruptions and deſcents of the infidels; but with this Gonzaga refuſed to coincide, under pretence that it would be for the diſcredit of his imperial majeſty to attempt any thing with a fleet too ſmall to ſupport the dignity of his arms. Grimani, tired out with tedious expectation, upon this declaration ſeparated from Capello, taking with him the pope's thirty-five gallies. In his courſe he made a bold, but unſucceſsful attack upon the fortreſs of Prevoſa; ſoon after which Doria, with the emperor's men of war, joined Capello at Corfu. An expreſs being ſent to Grimani, to adverti ſe him of this junction, and of their intention to attack Prevoſa with the united fleets, he returned.
f The confederate fleet now amounted to one hundred and thirty-ſix gallies, thirty armed ſhips, and two galleons; a force, if rightly applied, ſufficient to cruſh the whole Othoman naval power. Previous to the deſcent on Prevoſa, they ſteered directly for the Turkiſh fleet in line of battle; Doria, as commander in chief, leading the van. Barbaroſſa, receiving intelligence of their courſe, retired to the ſtraits of Gallipoli, in order to protract the war, which he knew would breed diviſions, and ſoon ſeparate the confederates. He likewiſe tampered with Doria, whom he ſoon gained by liberal preſents and promiſes: a ſeaſonable advantage, as his retreat from Corfu had given his enemies an occaſion to tax his conduct and his courage. To reinſtate himſelf in the public eſteem, Barbaroſſa reſolved to come to an engagement with the confederates: and to inſure ſucceſs, he thought the moſt commo-g dious method was to be on good terms with the chief officer[u].

The baſe conduct of Doria.

Obliged to attack the Turkiſh fleet.

Upon this change of opinion fifty gallies were diſpatched in queſt of the Chriſtians, a and were ſoon diſcovered by the centinels in the tops of the Venetian fleet; upon which a ſignal was made for engaging: they poured broadſides into the Turkiſh fleet ſo briſkly, that they were ſuddenly broke and put in confuſion. The Venetians were preparing to board them, when Doria ordered ſail to be ſlackened, and thus gave the Turks an opportunity to eſcape, when he had them at mercy. It was with difficulty the Venetians obeyed the order; but imagining the admiral had ſome great ſtroke in view, they complied. Finding, however, that he effected nothing for the common intereſt, the whole fleet was enraged, officers and ſoldiers equally reproaching the cowardice or treachery of Doria. Capello carried his reſentment ſo far, that Doria found himſelf under the neceſſity of again proceeding in order of battle againſt the enemy. After he had uſed all the diſſuaſive arguments in his b power, perceiving they had no effect, he commanded the bloody flag to be hoiſted, and led the van a ſecond time. Barbaroſſa, though he was alarmed at this conduct, yet ſtill relied on Doria's engagements. Advancing therefore to meet the enemy, ſeveral motions were made for gaining the windward, which the ſuperior ſkill of the confederates carried: but a calm enſuing, both fleets lay for ſome hours within ſight of each other; the Venetians all the while impatient to engage. Capello ordered his large ſhips to be towed, that no time might be loſt. Theſe he placed in front, to break the firſt ſhock of the enemy, which he knew would be violent. But Doria's conduct rendered every precaution uſeleſs: it was equally myſterious to his own friends and to the enemy. As ſoon as a gale ſprung up, inſtead of bearing down upon the Turks, as was expected, he took a long c ſweep, which ſome conſtrued into an intention of attacking their line in flank. Capello, however, ſaw through the artifice: upon which he immediately got into a ſmall frigate, ſailed round the fleet, exhorting them to ſeize the happy moment of ending the war.
He took upon him to anſwer the conſequences of diſobeying his ſuperior: he openly ac-cuſed him of betraying his truſt, went up to Doria, and intreated him to fall directly upon the enemy; but all to no purpoſe. That admiral, after exchanging a few diſtant ſhot with the enemy, retired with his ſquadron, making a ſignal for the reſt of the fleet to follow.
His pretence was, that the Turks were drawn up ſo advantageouſly, and ſo well covered by the batteries they had thrown up on the ſhore, that it would be impoſſible to engage them with ſucceſs. The enemy, encouraged by this ſhameful conduct, attacked the rear d of the combined fleet with ſome advantage; took ſeven gallies, and nine frigates, when happily a ſtorm ariſing, prevented the purſuit. Doria ordered all the lights to be put out, and returned diſgracefully to Corfu, when he might with equal eaſe have brought both victory and honour. In his flight he was inſulted by Barbaroſſa himſelf, who called him in deriſion, the Neptune of the ſea; a name he had once deſervedly borne on account of his ſkill in maritime affairs [w].

Thus ended the battle of Nicopolis, near the promontory of Actium, from which time the naval abilities of the Chriſtians would ſeem to decline. All blamed Doria, ſome at-tributing his conduct to cowardice, ſome to jealouſy of the Venetians, but the greater number to treachery (A): his future conduct was conſiſtent. The fleet ſailing from Corfu to e Caſtlenuovo, a town formerly belonging to the Venetians, Doria garriſoned it with Spaniſh ſoldiers, retaining it for the uſe of the emperor; after which he returned to Sicily, without attempting any thing farther. Jovius ſays, that Doria deſpiſed all the reproaches thrown out againſt him, ſatisfied that he acted according to his orders; thus transferring the whole blame on the emperor, who wanted nothing more than to engage the republic in a ruinous war with the infidels. His motives, according to that hiſtorian, were to ſeize upon their poſſeſ-ſions on the continent, as ſoon as they were reduced ſo low, as to be unable to ſupport another war. Sigonius and others ſcruple not to charge the whole miſconduct upon the Venetians.
Not contented with vindicating Doria, where he is unjuſtly blamed, he ventures to applaud his conduct, where, if we can at all rely on the concurring teſtimony of all the Venetian f writers, it is utterly indefenſible. What ſets his treachery or cowardice in the moſt con-ſpicuous view is his refuſal, upon the intreaty of Capello, to attack Barbaroſſa, notwithſtanding he had been weakened by the loſs of half his fleet in a ſtorm. In excuſe of this, his panegyriſt Sigonius advances but frivolous and weak arguments [x].

Soon after the departure of Doria to Sicily, Grimani likewiſe drew off the pope's gallies, under pretence of the rigour of the ſeaſon, and the hazard of keeping the ſea longer

[w] Paruta, l. 10. Maurocen. l. 7. [x] Paruta, ibid.

(A) This laſt conjecture is ſupported by the authority of the Turks themſelves, who owned, that a ſcandalous ſecret correſpondence had been carried on between Doria and Barbaroſſa. Baronius has a long detail of this tranſaction, in which he does the Venetians great juſtice, attributing the whole diſgrace to the corruption of the Genoeſe admiral. But the cleareſt proofs are to be found in Peter Bembo's epiſtles to his brother the cardinal (1).

(1) Vid. Ep. 1. l. 1. Baron. t. 8. p. 168. ſub Ann. 1538.

a Thus the Venetians were left alone to oppoſe an enemy ſo greatly ſuperior, which, with the diſgrace at Actium, the inſolence of Doria in putting a Spaniſh garriſon in a town belonging to the republic, plainly indicated the hazard of continuing the war, intolerable on account of the expence. All theſe circumſtances co-operating, the ſenate was induced to think of a peace upon ſuch terms as could be procured. Certain ſecret intelligence tranſmitted to the council of ten, perſuaded them that Solyman was no leſs diſpoſed to a compoſition: however, without diminiſhing the dignity of the ſtate, they could not publicly ſend an ambaſſador to make propoſals. To avoid ſuſpicions of this kind, Lorenzo Gritti went to Conſtantinople, in order to ſound the ſentiments of the divan, but under pretence of ſettling the affairs of his brother, lately deceaſed. Gritti entered upon the affair with the utmoſt deli-
b cacy, firſt propoſing a truce, which was rejected, and afterwards a general pacification. In this his deſigns were ſeconded by the French reſident, who had his ſecret reaſons for acting in the manner he thought would be moſt grateful to the republic. Solyman ſoon conſented to a ſeparate peace with the Venetians, but refuſed to include the emperor, againſt whom he was deſirous of turning the whole weight of the Othoman power. Charles coming to the knowlege of Gritti's negociation, ſent an ambaſſador to Venice to obſtruct the peace: his views were not yet anſwered; the republic was ſtill too powerful to be made a prey: every poſſible means was therefore uſed to oblige her to continue the war. Don Diego de Mendoza, the Spaniſh miniſter, complained in the ſenate of a conduct ſo injurious and diſreſpectful to his maſter, and unfaithful to the alliance. The ſenate anſwered him by rec torting the emperor's breach of engagements, the dilatory meaſures of his councils, and the treachery of his admiral: they told him, that as to the league, it wholly conſiſted of promiſes never performed; that they were made the tools of the emperor's politics, and the whole load of the war was thrown upon Venice. Altercations of the ſame nature paſſed at the imperial court between the Venetian ambaſſador and the Spaniſh miniſtry [y].

In this ſituation ſtood affairs towards the cloſe of the year 1538, when Gritti the doge died, after he had occupied that dignity with great applauſe for the ſpace of fifteen years: he was then in his eighty-fourth year, a prince of prudence, benevolence, and many other amiable virtues; a great promoter of the liberal arts, and of public charities. Some noble foundations of this kind, begun under his auſpices, are ſtanding monuments of his liberality, piety, and taſte; the elegance of the architecture being exceeded by nothing bed ſides the utility and piety of the deſign. Gritti had maintained the people in the full extent of their liberties, and the republic in the poſſeſſion of all her dominions, through a period abounding more, perhaps, than any other in hiſtory, with dark intrigues, deceitful friendſhips, and cruel wars. He died in the full exertion of his mental, and without diminution of his bodily faculties, eſteemed and lamented by all good men, as the father of his country, the patron of merit, and the ſuccour of the poor and oppreſſed [z]. The doge dies.

PIETRO LANDO, Doge LXXVIII.

GRITTI was ſucceeded by Pietro Lando, elected after the uſual forms: he cloſely purſued the meaſures of his predeceſſor, and with equal zeal deſired to put a period to a bure thenſome and pernicious war. The envoy's negociations went on but ſlowly at Conſtantinople, the emperor Charles having thrown many embarraſſments in his way, however ſtrenuous the doge and ſenate were in purſuit of pacific meaſures. This obliged the republic to augment her ſtanding forces, fleet, and garriſons, finding how little they were to rely upon auxiliaries and allies, and how uncertain the proſpect of ending the war. Orders were diſpatched to Contareni, the proveditor, in Candia, to equip twenty-five gallies; levies were raiſed in the city, and four thouſand artificers enrolled in the public ſervice, who ſhould be obliged to practiſe rowing, and make four cruiſes a year, certain privileges being decreed to thoſe who ſhould exceed the number of expeditions ſpecified. The old duke of Urbini being dead, his ſon Guy Ubaldo was created generaliſſimo of the Venetian forces on f the continent. Moro, the proveditor, was appointed to command the naval armaments of the republic, during the abſence of Capello, at that time in Venice for the recovery of his health, impaired in the public ſervice. Moro being ſoon after killed in ſome popular ſeditions in Candia, Thomaſo Mocenigo was appointed in his room by the ſenate. Pietro Lando, d. LXXVIII.

In this manner did the Venetians prepare againſt the precarious iſſue of tedious negotiations. Neither were the Turks idle: Barbaroſſa could not digeſt the loſs of Caſtlenuovo, and was determined, at all events, to attempt the recovery of a place of great importance to the Othoman naval power. He had left a diviſion of the fleet, conſiſting of thirty ſail, under Dragut his lieutenant, to block up the Venetian ſquadron in Corfu, and ſcour thoſe coaſts: this Dragut effectually performed, laying his ſcheme ſo artfully, that he drew a part of the g Venetian fleet into an ambuſcade, by which he drove three gallies on ſhore, where they were ſtaved to pieces, and took one large ſhip of war. Elated with this ſucceſs, he made a deſcent on Candia, burning and waſting the coaſts; but was ſoon attacked by the militia with ſo much courage and impetuoſity, that, after a brisk action, the Turks were defeated, and driven with great ſlaughter to their ſhips [a]. a

About this time young Gritti returned from Conſtantinople, where all he could obtain was a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities for three months, in order to adjuſt the preliminaries of a general pacification; to negociate which Pietro Zeno was ſent in quality of ambaſſador extraordinary to Solyman: during the preparations for this ambaſſy, Gritti was returned as reſident, with advice of the republic's intention to ſend an ambaſſador. Zeno died ſoon after his departure from Venice, and Thomaſo Contareni was nominated to ſucceed him, who, on his arrival at Conſtantinople, ſoon obtained a prolongation of the truce. Barbaroſſa, however, was intent on recovering Caſtlenuovo, which, being held by a Spaniſh garriſon, he thought he might attack it without infraction of the truce with Venice. Coming before it with above one hundred gallies, and a body of troops raiſed by the beglerbeg of Greece, he ſummoned the governor to ſurrender, threatening him with all the horrors of war, if he refuſed. The Spaniards offered to deliver the city to the Venetians; but this they would not accept, ſaying it was now too late: had it been given them according to the expreſs terms of the league, they would then have known how to act, but at preſent their acceptance would be an infraction of the truce with Solyman, and the means of breaking off the treaty in agitation. Barbaroſſa a ſecond time ſummoning the garriſon, was told they ſhould defend it to the laſt extremity; upon which he erected batteries on ſhore, and bombarded the town from the fleet. The beſieged, after perſevering to defend themſelves with great reſolution, were at laſt reduced to extremities; the town was almoſt laid in aſhes, the breach in the walls made practicable, the number of the garriſon greatly diminiſhed by ſickneſs and death, and above all a famine prevailed; for theſe reaſons they capitulated, but on honourable terms [b]. b c

The Turks attack and take Caſtlenuovo.

From hence Barbaroſſa ſailed to Riſano, which he had ſurrendered to him on the firſt ſummons, the governor not believing it tenable. Leaving a garriſon here, he ſteered his courſe to Catarra, where Matteo Bembo, brother to the learned cardinal of that name, had the command of a Venetian garriſon. Barbaroſſa skreened his attack upon this place, under various pretences: he knew it to be a direct violation of the truce now ſubſiſting; but he likewiſe knew that his ſucceſs would be extremely grateful to the Turkiſh miniſtry. The firſt reaſon alleged in defence of this treſpaſs was, that Catarra was a ſanctuary for ſlaves, that deſerted the Turkiſh ſervice; the next was, that neither Catarra or any other town on that coaſt belonged to the republic; he therefore ſummoned Bembo to ſurrender. Bembo penetrated the thin artifice, and ſent him a reſolute anſwer, that nothing leſs than the expreſs command of the doge and ſenate would oblige him to abandon a town entruſted to his charge: and that he would continue to defend it againſt all the power of Solyman, while one ſtone ſtood upon another. Without making any reply, Barbaroſſa ordered the van of his fleet to advance within diſtance to batter the walls. By ſome miſconduct of the admiral they were brought ſo near, that, having been expoſed for half an hour to a hot fire from the town, they were wholly ſhattered, broken, and obliged to retire in the utmoſt confuſion and diſtreſs. The day following the reſt of the fleet advanced, having detached a few ſhips to cover the landing of the troops at ſome diſtance from the town. Bembo plied his artillery ſo warmly, that the Turkiſh general was driven back with loſs: nor did the land-forces fare better; the garriſon, having made a brisk ſally before they had time to draw up, routed them with prodigious ſlaughter, returning triumphant to the town, with a number of priſoners, ſtandards, kettle drums, and other trophies. Barbaroſſa, after reconnoitring the town from the land-ſide, and obſerving the ſpirit of the garriſon, thought it adviſeable to reimbark the troops, and draw off the fleet [c]. d e

The truce being near expired, and but ill obſerved by the Turks, the Venetian ambaſſador demanded an audience of the Grand Seignior. He repreſented to him the little proſpect there was of advantage to either ſide in continuing the war: he deſired a prolongation of the truce, or a peace, telling Solyman, that not the terror of his power, but the admiration of his virtues, made the republic ſo deſirous of entering into his friendſhip. Solyman was paſſive during this diſcourſe, and making no reply, referred Contareni to the grand vizier. His firſt propoſition to the miniſter was, that all places taken during the war ſhould be mutually reſtored; but the vizier anſwered, that ſo far from reſtoring the town he had taken, Solyman would hearken to no conditions, unleſs Napoli and Malveſia were ſurrendered; he even doubted whether he would not inſiſt on all the towns poſſeſſed by the republic on the Greek coaſt as far as Caſtlenuovo; and alſo on being reimburſed the expences of the war. To this Contareni replied, that he was but the ſervant of the ſtate, and had no inſtructions f g a on that head; but he was pretty certain the republic would never grant terms ſo ignominious, until they were extorted after ſhe had ſhed the laſt drop of her blood: that, for his own part, as far as his influence would extend, he would ardently oppoſe ſuch a conceſſion; and that whatever value he put upon the friendſhip of Solyman, he would never conſent to purchaſe it with the price of his country's honour [d].

CONTARENI returned to Venice, and laboured all in his power to prevent the ſurrender of Napoli and Malveſia; but the council of ten, perceiving that their affairs were betrayed to the French king and the emperor; that the people murmured under the burthen of the war; and that if it was continued, they muſt ſupport it without any expectation from their allies, reſolved to accept the conditions propoſed. Both the imperial and French
b ambaſſadors were indefatigable in their endeavours to form a party in the republic, to oppoſe the pacific meaſures; but all endeavours proved fruitleſs. The ſenate was determined, and in this reſolution they were confirmed by the opinion of ſome of the moſt prudent perſonages and the doge himſelf: the great obſtacle was the ſtrong attachment of the inhabitants of thoſe two cities (Napoli and Malveſia) to the republic, and averſion to the Turkiſh government. They requeſted, in the moſt pathetic terms, that they might not be ſacrificed to a cruel enemy; that they might be permitted to defend their liberties, which they were in hopes the juſtice of their cauſe, and their own zeal, would enable them to perform, without expence or trouble to the republic. The ſenate was moved with their remonſtrance; and ſending Mocenigo the general to them, promiſed that all thoſe who were deſi-
c rous of continuing under the government of Venice, ſhould have a proviſion equal to their preſent circumſtances. With this they were quieted, and without farther objections permitted the peace to be concluded. At laſt, towards the cloſe of the year 1540, it was ſigned at Conſtantinople, to remain firm and valid for the ſpace of thirty years. Napoli and Malveſia were ſurrendered to the Turks, the greater part of the inhabitants removing into other towns of the republic. The fleets of the ſenate were laid up, and their armies disbanded, all beſides the uſual ſtanding forces, and the ſhipping neceſſary to protect commerce [e].

Peace concluded with Solyman.

d Containing the pacific Meaſures of the Senate ſubſequent to the Treaty with Solyman; Death of the Doge; Diſturbances in Italy; Death of the new Doge; Reſignation of Charles the fifth; Death of Doge Venieri; a dreadful Plague in Venice; a freſh War with the Grand Signior; the Invaſion of Cyprus; and other Particulars.

AFTER peace was concluded with Solyman, Venice began once more to taſte the ſweets and bleſſings of tranquility, of induſtry, and of commerce: her fleets were ſent in ſhoals to every port of the Levant, Egypt, and the Turkiſh dominions: they even filled almoſt every harbour in Europe. The diſcoveries of the Portugueſe had, without doubt, e leſſened the trade of the republic, but ſtill it retained the appearance of its former grandeur. The Venetians engroſſed the whole Levant traffic, as well as that of Egypt, many ports in Africa and Aſia, for as yet trade had not univerſally changed the old channel: but however aſſiduouſly the Venetians might purſue the pacific arts, they were ſtill diſturbed by the commotions in Germany, and the perpetual rivalſhip between the emperor and king of France. Theſe princes had, indeed, confirmed the truce of Nice, and exchanged many other teſtimonies of mutual love and eſteem, which inſpired hopes that they had intirely laid aſide their animoſities; but a variety of accidents ſoon intervened to interrupt the wiſhed-for harmony. John, king of Hungary, dying, left an infant ſon by his wife Iſa-
f bella, daughter of the king of Poland: his kingdom, which by right belonged to his iſſue male, was claimed by Ferdinand, king of the Romans, in conſequence of a pretended agreement with the deceaſed. After ſeizing upon a number of towns and fortreſſes in Hungary, Ferdinand, perceiving he was likely to meet with a formidable oppoſition from the queen dowager, ſent an ambaſſy to Solyman, requeſting his aſſiſtance, and that he might be permitted to hold Hungary upon the ſame tenure as John; but in this he was anticipated by the dowager, who had procured a ſolemn deputation of the barons of the kingdom to Solyman, and that prince's promiſe that Hungary ſhould be kept for her infant. So incenſed was the Grand Seignior at Ferdinand's claim, that, reſolving to attack him by ſea and land, he revoked the treaty with the French ambaſſador, and determined upon vigorous meaſures for the protection of the young king of Hungary [a].

g NOR were the troubles in the Low Countries appeaſed; Charles having rigorouſly puniſhed the rebellion of the Ghentois, by that means widened the breach between him and France. Francis was the more encouraged in his reſentment, as he foreſaw that a powerful a diverſion in his favour would be made by Solyman in Hungary and Bohemia. Charles's refuſal to comply with the terms propoſed concerning the Milaneſe was another cauſe of grievance; but the greateſt complaint aroſe from the murder of Rinçon and Tregoſa, the French ambaſſadors to the Porte. Theſe demanding a ſafe paſſage through the Venetian dominions, obtained their requeſt, but were overtaken by ſome Spaniſh infantry near Pavia, and murdered. Above meaſure incenſed at this treacherous conduct, and the emperor's equivocation concerning peace and the reſtitution of Milan, Francis diſpatched another ambaſſador to Solyman, with inſtructions to call in his way, and lay thoſe grievances before the republic. The ſenate was provoked at the recital of an inſult upon the laws of nations; but not chuſing to enter upon another war, were ſilent; a galley, however, was diſpatched to b convey the miniſter to Turkey.

MEAN while, as Ferdinand's army had been lately defeated by the Turks, it was expected the emperor would have marched in perſon to his relief; but this did not coincide with his meaſures. In this ſtate of affairs the ſenate determined upon a neutrality: the republic groaned under the expences of the laſt war: peace had yet produced little effects in reſtoring commerce, or enriching the people. They were aware of the conſequence to Chriſtendom the loſs of Hungary would produce, but then they ſaw the emperor decline interpoſing: their engaging for the relief of ſo diſtant a kingdom would only bring themſelves into danger, without anſwering the end. Ferdinand was too weak an ally: the princes of the empire were not well affected to the houſe of Auſtria; they would take no ſteps which could c aggrandize it. The reaſons for Solyman's aſſiſting the dowager were obvious: he deſired nothing leſs than putting the crown upon the head of the young king; but this was a plauſible pretext for annexing Hungary to the Othoman empire. Venice penetrated this myſterious conduct of the different courts; ſhe traced the political clue of intrigue, but determined not to be guided by it, nor to provoke ſo powerful a monarch as Solyman, without her own privileges were immediately attacked [b].

A. D. 1542. THE year following his holineſs petitioned the ſenate, that the general council might be allowed to aſſemble at Vincenza, which they declined from an apprehenſion of giving umbrage to the Porte. Their refuſal had ſome colour of reaſon, on account of an accident which lately happened, that could not fail of giving offence to Solyman. Two Turkiſh d gallies, in their way from Barbary to Conſtantinople, fell in with the Venetian proveditor: as they endeavoured all in their power to avoid him, it afforded a ſuſpicion they were pirates, upon which he came up, engaged, and took them, ſetting all the Chriſtians on board at liberty. This action the Porte, and eſpecially Barbaroſſa, reſented, as the gallies were his property: he threatened revenge, but was appeaſed by the ſubmiſſion of the republic, and her conſenting to repay the damages. On this occaſion Solyman ſent an ambaſſador to Venice, who was treated with high marks of diſtinction: by him the late peace was ratified and confirmed [c].

IN this manner ſtood affairs for the two following years: both the emperor and France laboured to engage the republic in a war, which ſhe was no leſs aſſiduous to avoid. Francis e ſent his miniſter Polin to make any terms with the Venetians; but they would accept of none to break with the emperor: on the other hand, they were equally inflexible to the emperor's propoſals to engage them in an alliance againſt the Turks. Peace was their aim, but in purſuing it too cloſely, they run the hazard of diſobliging all parties. The French king was already highly incenſed againſt them, through the miſrepreſentations of his miniſters at Venice: they complained of an inſult upon their authority, in dragging away by force certain criminals who had ſought protection in their houſes. This affair, however, was ſet in a proper light by the memorials of the ſenate to Francis. Yet an accident of another nature involved the Venetians in diſputes with Ferdinand and the empire: the ſeizure of Maran may be deemed the firſt foundation of a future bloody war. Bertrand de Sacchia, a ſubject f
